I fervently hope that the Government have learned the error of their ways. The Secretary of State has mentioned this week's discussions, and I welcome the fact that they are taking place. During those discussions and the further intensive discussions that will certainly be required and which hopefully will take place in the coming critical weeks before the May elections, and, if necessary, during the six-week period provided thereafter for an Executive to emerge—that is a very tight timetable indeed—there must be a new approach. There should be no more attempts at side-deals and partial implementation, because they simply will not work. There should be no more mealy-mouthed phrases and no more euphemisms. It should be quite clear what the Government mean when they speak of "acts of completion": let them say "decommissioning and disbandment". If they want to use another word that has the same finality as "disbandment", that is fine, but let them not try to deceive themselves—or, worse, anybody else—as to the seriousness and completeness of what is required by way of those acts of implementation.

A settlement, if it is to be viable, must be four things. First, it must be comprehensive, for the reasons that I have explained. Secondly, it must be transparent—I know that this, too, is a new one for the Government—otherwise, there can be no trust, and no one will make the difficult moves if he or she suspects that others are getting a private deal. This is the mistake that the Government have been making all along: creating everywhere the suspicion that somehow, someone else was getting private assurances. Obviously, that made it very unlikely that the party with those suspicions would feel able to put all its cards on the table. Thirdly, a settlement must be balanced. Never again must there be an appearance—I fear that, often, there was much more than an appearance—that all the concessions are going one way. Sadly, as I have explained, that has been the case with, among other things, police Bills such as the one before us today.

Finally, a settlement must be definitive, and for two compelling reasons. First, no one in Northern Ireland will make a significant move unless they know what portion of the total price to be paid such a move represents, what they will get in return and by when, and what will happen if the other party, or parties, do not deliver. In other words, everyone must see, and be signed up to, the end game. That is why there is no such thing as a partial settlement—it must be a definitive settlement. It is no good people holding something back for the next round, and it is no good if people think that there is going to be a next round; this must be it: it must be definitive.

The second reason why the settlement must be definitive is simply that there is very little time. I very much hope that it will be possible to reinstate the Executive during the next few weeks before the elections. However, if it is not, and if there are elections, under the rules there will have to be agreement on an Executive within six weeks. There will be no agreement on an Executive unless there is decommissioning and disbandment by the IRA, because the Unionists have rightly made it clear that without it, they will not rejoin a power-sharing Executive. So unless there is a global settlement—because all these things are interlinked—there ain't gonna be an Executive formed within six weeks of the May elections. If an Executive are not formed within that time, the Secretary of State knows perfectly well what must happen. We must have either new elections, or another suspension of devolution and the restoration—sine die, this time: in other words, indefinitely—of direct rule.

I do not believe that the credibility of the peace process could survive the extraordinary state of affairs whereby we ask the electorate to go to the polls on 1 May to elect an Assembly that has been under suspension for the previous nine months, only for it to be suspended again six weeks later. Equally, if the electorate are told that they must go back to the polls again, six weeks after having voted, the credibility of the Belfast peace process as we know it will be destroyed. Of course, human beings must always have hope, particularly when the situation is desperate, and various theoretical scenarios can doubtless be devised as to how we might move forward in such circumstances. However, the enormous progress that was produced in the first place by the tremendous work that went into negotiating the Belfast agreement would, I am afraid, be set at nought, and we should have to start again. So no one should have any doubt that it is absolutely vital that this matter be dealt with in a very short time scale.

Lady Hermon: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: I have almost completed my remarks so I will not give way. I am sure that the hon. Lady will catch your eye later, Mr. Speaker.

We fervently hope that the attempts over the next few weeks will be successful, but I repeat that they will be successful only if there is a comprehensive, global, full, definitive and balanced settlement. If the Government pursue those discussions and conversations on a realistic basis, they will have our full support. If not, not.

5.10 pm

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): Before I address the Bill specifically, I think that we should remind ourselves of the problem of policing a divided society such as Northern Ireland. The Secretary of State is right to say that the problem is about much more than policing. It is a problem of allegiance and identification with the state. It is a problem with the recognition of the legitimacy of the state within which people live and the Administration who govern them, and the police service that serves them.

It is right to say that policing is much more than what the Policing Board will decide, in its wisdom or otherwise, to do. For that reason, it is worth repeating that the attempt to solve the policing problem in Northern Ireland goes way beyond the operations of the police service. It goes to the heart of the problems that people such as me have had to face, politically and in many other ways. Therefore, we should consider carefully everything to do with policing. That is what I have tried to do these past 30 years. I have tried to examine the problem, even when it was not popular to do so.

It will never be popular to talk about policing in relation to Northern Ireland, but it is crucial that we do so, because if we do not get policing right other things will follow. It will not be possible to keep an Administration or other political institutions going if we do not have a solution to the policing problem. The issues are so closely linked that we must examine—honestly, as I have tried to do—how one is dependent on the other.

What did the Good Friday agreement say about policing? It offered a new beginning for policing. I am convinced that that is possible and that it will happen. What has happened so far has already begun to unlock, in a limited sense—although it will be much less limited before this month is out—the constitutional logjam that policing faced in relation to the nationalist community in the north of Ireland. It has not fully achieved that, but it is on the way. That is why the Bill is crucial.

I am probably regarded as a fairly conservative, reasonable nationalist, although some people might not choose to use the word "reasonable" in relation to me. However, I am not an extreme nationalist and, as such, there are two ways in which I can achieve the changes in policing that are necessary for me to give my allegiance not only to policing in Northern Ireland but to the institutions of the state. The first is through legislation and the second is through implementation.

The business of the political process is to deal with legislation. However, this measure deals with a failure of legislation because the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000 did not adequately deal with how Patten, in his wisdom, suggested that I and the community that I represent could make changes. The very fact that we are holding this debate is recognition of legislative failure on policing. I do not like having to say that. As someone who has supported Labour from the day and hour when I knew what politics was about, I do not like saying that legislative failure put us in this position.

Implementation—the second aspect—will be achieved in several ways, including through the Policing Board. Our party had the courage to join that board. It also had the courage to ask young nationalists and Catholics to join the police service. There were no ambiguities—no ifs or buts: we simply asked people to do it. We asked the community to take part, too. Young people can implement change by joining the police service. Political parties can do so by sitting on the Policing Board. People throughout the community can do so by making it clear to everybody—not least those involved in paramilitarism—that they want a police service that they can be proud of, and that they will defend and sustain it. That is the crux.

As the Secretary of State rightly said, we are a substantial way down the road to change, but we must consider the failure of the 2000 Act. That measure was passed by the House on the basis of a number of side deals—to which reference has constantly been made this evening—even at one minute to 12, to which Members who were present on that occasion and are in the Chamber today can bear testament. I look forward to hearing their confirmation of that fact.

The hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) made great play of the fact that my party—the Social Democratic and Labour party—had committed some heinous crime by taking part in negotiations organised by the Government: at the invitation of the Government, we went to Weston Park and committed the awful crime of negotiating a good position based on what Patten had said. We told the Government for the umpteen hundredth time that, if they did not get to the heart of the problem, we could not be involved in the Policing Board; we would not be able to deliver because they were not giving us the legislative basis on which to do so.

Mr. Quentin Davies rose—

Mr. Mallon: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment; I know that he has much more to say.

What is the difference between negotiating at Weston Park at the invitation of the Government, at Hillsborough castle at the invitation of the Government, in Downing street at the invitation of the Prime Minister or in Castle buildings at the invitation of the two Governments? I am proud that our party went to Weston Park and told the Government: "You have made a legislative hash of this: now start to change it, because if you don't you will not solve the policing problem".

Mr. Davies: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. He had a smile on his face when he was making the remarks that he directed at me, but as the readers of Hansard will not know that I want to set the record straight. In no way did I intend to imply—nor did I imply—that there was something wrong with the SDLP going to Weston Park and negotiating with the Government. Indeed, far from committing a heinous crime, the hon. Gentleman did a very good day's work. As I said earlier, the Opposition do not want to be party to depriving the hon. Gentleman of the fruits of that occasion. There are many much less deserving parties in Northern Ireland and he can be pleased with the good negotiations that he conducted.

I was in fact criticising the Government for having conducted a series of partial deals and concessions. One or two of those concessions were thrown at the hon. Gentleman, but bigger ones were made elsewhere. Given the hon. Gentleman's analysis, I think that he would agree that—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. The hon. Gentleman is starting to make another speech.

Mr. Mallon: I thank the hon. Gentleman for intervening—I know the point that he tries to make—but the reality is that there were no side deals. What happened at Weston Park was put in the public domain—not by us, but by others—within a month of the Weston Park agreement. There was no sideshow; there were negotiations between ourselves, as a political party, the British Government and the Irish Government, whom we demanded should be the guarantor of what was agreed at Weston Park. That was what we sought to negotiate, and it has resulted in the Bill.

Of course hon. Members will recognise some of the flannel that has been thrown in to cover up the legislation—for example, the financial provisions, which cover a number of pages. We all recognise flannel when we see it—we are long enough about the political process—but, in the context of the hon. Gentleman's remarks, I did not apologise for anything that we did at Weston Park. I have a great sense of sadness that it took the Government a year—they wasted a year—to get to Weston Park and that it took a very considerable period to redress the administrative damage that was done.

I am sad that we all lost a year in terms of the Policing Board and in developments in policing. We lost that time because some found it difficult to face up to the facts. There were those who knew better than Patten or than others, such as myself, who live in the north of Ireland, and they thought that they would be able to pull a fast stroke that would solve the problem. However, when it comes to fundamentals such as this, no fast stroke or sleight of hand will work, and this is the classic example of a stroke going wrong. That is why we are debating it today.

Lady Hermon: When the hon. Gentleman's party took the very courageous decision, for which I warmly commend it, to join the Policing Board in the autumn of 2001, the Irish, British and American Governments and the Catholic Church all said that what had been agreed was in the spirit and letter of Patten. I think that my memory serves me well. Does the hon. Gentleman feel that his party has been undermined by further Government concessions to Sinn Fein, which did not take its seats and have the courage of his party?

Mr. Mallon: I thank the hon. Lady for asking that very valid question. That is the humiliation referred to by the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford. Let me deal with it. Before hon. Members cast their vote on the Bill, I would like all of them to go through it to find the changes that were not negotiated by the SDLP and that were not publicly stated before we went to Weston Park. The public were told, "Here's what we are going for. If we get it, we'll go on the board. If we don't get it, we can't." I ask the hon. Lady whether she can identify those things in the Bill that result from negotiations that were not done by the SDLP. She can let me know if she finds them and perhaps then I can answer her question more accurately. I leave that as an offer to the hon. Lady and, no doubt, she will reply to it later.

Mr. Donaldson: The hon. Gentleman knows that the concessions that are to be made to Sinn Fein are not contained in the Bill, but were set out in what the Government described as texts for consideration. The reality is that we will be dealt yet another blow if the Government must persuade Sinn Fein to join the Policing Board by offering further amendments and concessions that go beyond the Patten recommendations and what is in the Bill. Is not that the reality to which my hon. Friend the Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) refers?

Mr. Mallon: I hope that I do not detect a scepticism bordering on cynicism in what the hon. Gentleman says. If he is asking me to put my hand on my heart and say that I know that this matter has been dealt with properly, fully and adequately, I will do so when it gets Royal Assent. I have every confidence that, in this instance, the Secretary of State will deal honourably with our party in negotiations as the Bill passes through the House. I have every confidence that, as a man of integrity, he will stick by the word of the Government. I have every confidence that the legislative process in this House will solve the problem of policing, not little deals done wherever they were done in the past at one minute to midnight. I am confident of that, but, for my answer to be definitive, I shall give it when the Bill receives Royal Assent. I thank the hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) for the point that he makes.

I want to make several other crucial points. I have heard the debates about what will be given to this, that and the other party. I am no longer at the heart of negotiations, so I do not know what has gone on under the counter with Sinn Fein. I do not know what has gone on under the counter with the Ulster Unionist party. I do not know what has gone on under the counter with the Democratic Unionist party. What I do know is that we have negotiated with integrity and honour and that the decisions in respect of the Policing Board were taken with integrity and that our members are applying them. We will continue to do that in relation to policing. I trust that everyone will take that approach to this matter.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim): I regret that I was late in arriving for this debate, but the mother of my hon. Friend the Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell), who is my party's spokesman on this issue, has been taken seriously ill, and I only came here today on a call from the hospital. I hope that the House will give me that indulgence.

It is very unlikely that the Democratic Unionist party that I lead could give anything at the table, as we are never called to the table. We are not there. I have written to the Prime Minister to ask him why he does not call all parties to make representations. As we take an anti-agreement stand, we are not even called to the table to put our views. In those circumstances, it is hardly likely that we have had such a chance. All that I would say to the hon. Gentleman is this: what does he think was the reason that the other paper was produced giving the IRA-Sinn Fein demands? Will the Government not do something—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Gentleman has had a good innings.

Mr. Mallon: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his question and offer my sympathy to the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) on his mother's illness.I am not sure what paper he means. Is it the Weston Park paper, which I can talk about with confidence because I know what is in it? [Interruption.] Yes, it has been published.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I mean this paper.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the House that we are debating the Second Reading of a Bill.

Mr. Mallon: I think that the hon. Gentleman means part of the Bill that is not in legislative form: in other words, the text that is added on depending on how the card game goes between now and the end of the month. The Social Democratic and Labour party does not negotiate that, and he would not ask me to stand over something that we did not negotiate. I agree that independent members of the district policing partnerships should not be disbarred. There is no logic to a situation in which one ex-paramilitary can sit on a DPP because he has been a district councillor but another who served his time in the next cell cannot because he was not elected to the district council. I want to be clear that that is not part of the Bill. The text on that may, or may not, see its way into legislation, which is why some of the debates in Standing Committee could be interesting.

Lady Hermon: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the distinction that the Secretary of State drew in 2000 between those who were appointed to DPPs because they were councillors and those who stood as independent members was the electoral mandate? That is the crucial difference between councillors who go on to serve on DPPs and independent members.

Mr. Mallon: I obviously agree with the hon. Lady, but I thought that the terms that were rattling about related to the principle of the text rather than the definition of electoral mandates. Perhaps I am wrong. I am sure that the Standing Committee will clarify some of those matters.

The hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) referred to Sinn Fein. Our party took a lot of stick—we were attacked—when we rightly decided, on the basis of Weston Park, that we would nominate people to the Policing Board and ask young Catholics to join the police service. Members of our party had their houses attacked and cars burned by people in, what I would widely call, the republican community. If we had taken a different stance, what would have happened? There would be no Patten proposals to move us forward. Would the PSNI exist? I doubt it. Would the symbols used in policing have changed? The old policing authority would still be in place. The Democratic Unionist party and the SDLP would not be appointed to it, so we have that in common. There would be no new Chief Constable because, in the circumstances, he would not have come in. The ombudsman's report on Omagh would have been ignored, and there would have been no changes to special branch visits.

I say clearly to Sinn Fein that we do not deal with problems in the same way. If it wants to retard progress for its own political reasons, it can do so, but we are not going to join in. We did not join it in the past and we shall not join it in the future.

Helen Jackson: Having made the courageous decision after Weston Park to advocate that young Catholics join the PSNI, has my hon. Friend found that they have suffered harassment in his constituency as a result of that advice?

Mr. Mallon: The hon. Lady's question is valid but, unfortunately, I cannot answer it. Nobody can, but we all know of the presence and intimidation in both communities that is not voiced, does not involve any action and cannot be traced—but it is there. Interestingly and sadly, the same problem is experienced in both communities. How did some of the people whom we have seen on television in the past few weeks make millions dealing in drugs and prostitution when everyone knew that that was happening? Was anybody giving that information to the police? Was anybody in the Shankill road, where those poor people were caught, providing information? They did not do so, because they were dead men and women the next morning if they did. We must ensure that people such as the hon. Lady and me support young people who join the police and their families—that is the heart of the matter. We must make it clear in our communities that we will not allow people to be bullied out of the career that they choose.

Governments need to get the legislative arrangements for policing right, but the onus is on us to get the implementation right. Patten made that clear—legislation could only do so much; the rest would have to be done through the Policing Board. I pay tribute to the members of the Policing Board and the remarkable way in which they have conducted their duties since its formation. I include all members of the board in that tribute; at a time when political processes and Administrations were falling, and when north-south bodies and power-sharing Executives were being suspended, the Policing Board was taking the pressure, and it was a revelation that it was able to keep going. I should like to place on the record that that is my view—I appreciate the efforts that those people made.

I look forward to the day when Patten's vision is fully realised. We are in the second year of a lengthy programme. If we are reduced to looking at things in terms of Catholic and Protestant or focus on the inevitably niggly aspects of legislation we tend to lose sight of the larger vision. I am still convinced that, on the basis of the wishes of people in the north of Ireland of all political persuasions and of all religions, we can achieve the protection of our communities and the betterment of society through good proper policing. We all face that challenge now, but some of the challenges that we have faced in the past are behind us. Many people have helped to make that possible. As the Bill goes through Parliament, we must realise that the more we get the legislation right, the easier it will be for people to get its implementation right.

I welcome the opportunity to say again what I believe about policing. With regard to what was said earlier, this is probably the last time that I shall speak on the Floor of the House about policing—at least, I hope this is the last time I speak on the Floor of the House about policing. If we get the Bill right, as we will, we will provide the foundations for the political institutions to be sustained and for the rest of the political developments to progress.

Let us not waste any more years. Let us not waste any more legislative opportunities. Let us take those opportunities and make policing work in its totality.

[Mr. Mallon]

Yes, there are political and practical implications, and implications in terms of religious denominations. I wish those implications did not exist, but they do. That is the reality. But if we get our end of things right, we can help to make sure that other people will do the same.

5.41 pm

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon), who made a thoughtful and well-considered contribution to the debate. I found a great deal of wisdom in what he said. I am acutely aware that on matters relating to Northern Ireland, I do not come close to the pedigree of the hon. Gentleman or hon. Members on the Unionist Benches. Listening to the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh, I feel ever so slightly humbled.

Liberal Democrats are pleased to give the Bill a broad welcome. It comes to us having already been in the other place, so we have the advantage that much of Government thinking is already on record. As regards drafting, the Bill comes to us in much better shape than is often the case with Bills that start their life with Second Readings in this place.

The coincidence of timing—the debate comes in the wake of events in the Shankill last week—gives our discussions of policing a potency that they might not otherwise have had. The importance of policing in the process of normalisation cannot be overestimated. A further indication of that is the fact that, as has been mentioned, the Bill comes fairly hot on the heels of the 2000 Act.

Reading press reports last week as the two factions of the Ulster Defence Association fought it out in the streets of the Shankill, I was struck by the fact that the apparently victorious faction went on record as saying that the drug-dealing scum were all gone. The fact that that man said that at that time and in that way shows the distance that we still have to go in relation to the normalisation of policing. Two thoughts immediately spring to my mind when I hear such things. First, I would require a great deal of persuasion that those who were doing the chasing out were any better than those being chased out. Secondly, it is surely fundamental in any democracy that if drug-dealing scum or any other sort of scum are to be removed from the streets, those who remove them must be in the police force. What we saw last week suggests that we are a great distance away from that.

I was pleased to hear much of what the Secretary of State said. I was curious when he referred to the disclosure offence in clause 20. Subsection (7) of proposed new section 74A of the Policing (Northern Ireland) Act 2000 states that the offence will be "liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale."

It is easy to envisage circumstances in which such an offence could be of the utmost gravity. I should be interested to know why the Government have restricted the penalty that is applied in relation to such offences to a financial one. Why is the option of custodial disposal not given to the courts in their consideration?

The Secretary of State referred to the tremendous progress that has been made by the Policing Board since its inception, as did the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh. I do not intend to rehearse those remarks, but I point out that the appointment of the new Chief Constable and the new badge and flag for the police stand in the board's credit column. Some of the clauses represent a strengthening of the Policing Board's role and give it more flexibility, which may bring it more into line with what Patten envisaged.

In particular, the Liberal Democrats welcome the requirement for the Secretary of State to consult the Policing Board and the Chief Constable before introducing new objectives or codes of practice or altering the existing ones. The extension of an explicit obligation on the Secretary of State to undertake that consultation with the board with a view to reaching agreement seems to us an eminently sensible provision that does not diminish his powers to determine or revise long-term policing objectives if he fails to reach such agreement with the board. The Liberal Democrats have always supported a strong Policing Board, which we hope will bring policing closer to the community and the community closer to the police.

Lady Hermon: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. On that very small point, will he explain how the Policing Board is strengthened by a reduction from 10 out of 19—a majority—in the number of members needed to initiate an inquiry? The original legislation ensured that a public inquiry could be initiated only by 10 members of the board, but the Bill reduces that number to a minority of only eight members. With regard to collective responsibility, how is the board strengthened if a minority can compel the undertaking of an inquiry?

Mr. Carmichael: As ever, such matters are a question of checks and balances. My understanding is that there is a balance to that particular check, as the majority of the board's members have to be present and voting. I am aware of the objections raised by the hon. Lady's party in the other place, but I think that a view has to be taken on such matters. The Government have taken their view and I can see some grounds for objection to it, but that is certainly not a point on which I would die in a ditch, if I may use that expression.

One of the issues about the Policing Board that troubled my colleagues in the other place was the provision reducing the minimum number of public meetings that it should hold each year. The Minister will recall that when Patten produced his report, the board was to meet in public once a month. The 2000 Act reduced the number of public meetings to 10 a year and the Bill further lowers that number to eight. On the basis of what was said from the Government Benches in the other place, it seems that the Government's thinking is that there were low attendances at the public meetings that have so far been held and that that is some sort of justification for the reduction. I caution the Government against pursuing that logic. Public meetings of this House are not always particularly well attended, but if they were to suggest that we should meet less frequently because of that, there would be something of a backlash. I hope to hear from the Minister exactly why this further reduction has been proposed now.

Clause 16, which covers core policing principles, is particularly important and the Liberal Democrats are pleased to endorse it. It places at the heart of policing the concept of community policing, which is something that we have always sought to advance in relation to the remainder of the United Kingdom. It is an indication that we are proceeding down the road towards normalisation that we can talk about the development of policing in Northern Ireland in the same terms as we do for the rest of the United Kingdom. I thank the Minister's colleagues in another place for the reassurances that they have given that these principles represent exactly that, and that they are there to help to guide officers in relation to the way in which they should carry out their functions, rather than to give a ruling on that. I also welcome the reassurances given in relation to the European convention on human rights and the need for police officers to adhere to a code of ethics that is fully compatible with the convention and with other international human rights standards.

I turn briefly to part 2 of the Bill, and, in particular, to the civilianisation of the police. The Government will be aware that we have some reservations about this process but, again, I want to thank them for taking on in the other place our concerns about the use of civilian officers for the performance of intimate searches on people detained in custody. That issue was first raised by my noble Friend Baroness Harris of Richmond during the passage of the Police Reform Act 2002, and I am grateful to the Government for tabling amendments in the other place to make it clear that only medical staff may carry out those intrusive searches.

We still have some concerns about the use of civilian staff and, in particular, about how they will be trained. It is certainly fair that it should be up to the Chief Constable to determine the amount of training that civilian officers require, but we do not think it unreasonable that the House should have a say on what guidelines he will be given on the amount of training appropriate for each type of civilian officer. This is not a criticism of the Minister, but, when I hear her colleagues from the Home Office talk about the civilianisation of policing, I am left with a lingering suspicion that they somehow think that policing is not really that difficult, and that we can pick and choose aspects of it that can be divorced and given away to people who are something between a traffic warden and a police officer. I speak as one who, before coming to the House, worked in the criminal courts, albeit in Scotland, and I feel that this is a subtle but effective way of undermining the professional standing of the police in the community. I hope that the Government will be mindful of the importance of this issue as they go down that road.

Mr. McCabe: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the police themselves have clearly identified a number of tasks that they do not think they should carry out, and that, in those circumstances, there is a good case for civilianisation?

Mr. Carmichael: Of course there is, and that is why we do not oppose civilianisation in principle. But it is a question of where we draw the line—of what powers we expect these civilian officers to have and what areas we expect them to operate in. For example, I have no real difficulty with the designation of civilians for court escort duties and the like, provided that the appropriate safeguards are put in place.

The one area that concerns me is the question of what constitutes proper grounds for a search under section 23 of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971. According to that provision, the law is perfectly straightforward. In fact, such a massive body of case law has built up around that one section that it is now a minefield for working police officers of considerable standing and experience who have had full training, let alone a civilian officer who might stumble into that kind of situation in all innocence. Because such officers would not have the appropriate background or complete training, they might not be in possession of the whole picture. They could therefore jeopardise a significant drugs case without having any intention of misconducting themselves in any way.

Lady Hermon: May I assist the hon. Gentleman by saying that the provisions towards the end of the present Bill have been replicated more or less verbatim from the Police Reform Act 2002? During the Standing Committee on that legislation, the point was raised about intimate searches being degrading treatment, and I understand that the Home Office gave an undertaking at the time that civilian officers would be made familiar not only with the provisions for training laid out in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 but with human rights provisions.

Mr. Carmichael: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for that intervention. It points up the extreme caution with which we must approach the civilianisation of policing. Eventually, we must ask whether, if we have to give civilian officers such comprehensive training on the wider rules of criminal procedure and evidence, it might not be the right thing to do to employ more properly and fully trained police officers in the first place. This is an immensely difficult issue and it is only fair to the community, the police, and the civilians who are going to be put in that position that the fullest consideration should be given to the manner in which this legislation is introduced. The Standing Committee on the Bill will certainly want to examine the matter in greater detail.

The people of Northern Ireland need and deserve a policing service that is responsive and sensitive to their needs, and which is also held fully accountable by the Policing Board. The Bill represents a modest step down the path towards normalisation. In so far as it moves us down that path, it is welcome, and the Liberal Democrats will support it.

5.57 pm

Mr. Peter Mandelson (Hartlepool): As a general rule, ex-Secretaries of State should not try to do the job of their successors. I rise, therefore, with great modesty and trepidation, knowing that, when we talk about policing in Northern Ireland, we are always walking on eggshells. Although the contents of the Bill are really very limited, fairly inconsequential and bordering on the arcane, one or two aspects of it trouble me. That is why I want to speak this afternoon. I have discussed some of these issues with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and he knows that, in my approach to these matters, I have the utmost regard for and trust in the way in which he is carrying out his responsibilities in the very difficult circumstances in Northern Ireland.

I would like to clear up one deep misunderstanding at the outset. The Bill has nothing whatever to do with implementing further recommendations of the Patten report. If it were the case that recommendations had been left unimplemented, or that certain provisions of the report were unfulfilled and now needed to be implemented, I am sure that my right hon. Friend would have identified those provisions and recommendations. He did not. Implementation of Patten was achieved in the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000; that was certainly the Government's view and I was a member of that Government. Indeed, in many respects, that Act was Patten plus, with knobs on. Given the difficult circumstances and conditions persisting in Northern Ireland at the time, we went out of our way, to the very outer limits of our ability, to implement Patten lock, stock and barrel. We did that because of the immense importance of creating a fresh start in policing in Northern Ireland. I do not need to rehearse the arguments. They are well known, I am sure, to all those who are here this afternoon. Creating confidence in the police across the community in Northern Ireland, and securing commitment to a new police service from both sides of the political and sectarian divide, was an immensely and supremely important prize. It is testimony to the application of politicians both here and in Northern Ireland at the time, and, if I may say so, it is testimony to the strength, robustness and durability of the original legislation, that that fresh start in policing has indeed been achieved in Northern Ireland. That has certainly been surprising for some.

We implemented Patten and achieved a fresh start in policing while understanding and bearing in mind two very important things throughout. The first was that the Royal Ulster Constabulary was not being dishonoured. The existing force was not being disbanded. Weight was attached to retaining the good will of serving officers whose morale was crucial to maintaining the operational efficiency of the police service in that very troubled part of the United Kingdom. The second was that the arrangements that were being put in place for the governance and accountability of the new police service had to be sufficiently robust to instil public confidence across the community, but not so robust as to make the job of practical policing any more difficult to achieve. Getting the balance right was difficult, but I thought that it was extremely important that we should do so.

I can remember saying this again and again to the wonderful officials who worked for me on the drafting of the original Bill and throughout its passage. Although we had to accept that policing was political—as, of course, it is, everywhere but even more so in Northern Ireland—my bottom-line requirement was that politics should not so intrude into policing that the police became hampered operationally and less able to do their job with complete efficacy. The systems of accountability and of insight and investigation into the police could not be turned into a battering ram to be used by less scrupulous people against the police. I felt that scrutiny and inquiry into the new police service under the new arrangements should not become a means of constantly raking up the past, thus politicising—more than is normally the case in Northern Ireland—the work of the new service. It is testimony to the tremendous sense of responsibility on the part of the Policing Board that was appointed—and the Policing Board as it is presently composed, a point that I would underline—that all the risks and dangers have, in the main, been avoided, and that the very careful equation that we constructed, with the checks and balances that we wrote into the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000, has been operated with common sense and maturity.

Rev. Ian Paisley: How would the right hon. Gentleman tell the House that there is not a multiplicity of inquiries that hinder the police, when even the firing of one baton round is inquired into, costing £2,000? Over and over again, we have had such inquiries because one man fired a baton round. Surely it is getting right down to the very minutiae of police activity when an inquiry is held into every baton round that is fired?

Mr. Mandelson: The hon. Gentleman's question serves to illustrate the concern that I am about to come on to in the remarks that I will make on the new piece of legislation rather than the original Act.

A police service that is constantly at risk of being inquired into and investigated, with its policies and actions questioned and challenged, its judgments called into question, and its practices constantly put under a microscope by the accountability bodies—and, for the Police Service of Northern Ireland, there is more than one such body—cannot easily get on with the job of policing.

Lady Hermon: If memory serves, while the right hon. Member for Hartlepool was Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, and while the Police (Northern Ireland) Bill was being debated in this House, he wrote a very good article in the Irish News. In that article, he made it clear that the distinction that he drew between independent members and elected members of district policing partnerships hinged on the electoral mandate. Will the right hon. Member explain whether his view has changed? Does he now accept that independent members with criminal or terrorist convictions can come on to DPPs without any electoral mandate?

Mr. Mandelson: I will respond to the apparent inconsistency that the hon. Lady has identified. At the time I said—and this was the Government's view—that an electoral mandate should override any other consideration, even that of a previous criminal investigation. That remains my view. However, I also remember saying at this Dispatch Box that, in time—and time heals a lot, if not all, in Northern Ireland—we would want to revisit the issue and consider it in the light of the experience of the peace process and political developments in Northern Ireland. I suspect that that is what lies behind the Government's contemplation of the change to which the hon. Lady refers.

I want to go back to my remarks on the constant, unrelenting pressure on the police, with their every move, judgment and action scrutinised, brought out into the open, put into a goldfish bowl, and debated. My fear—and I would put it no more strongly than this—is that the provisions of the new Bill will tilt further in that direction, creating risk in the evolution of the Police Service of Northern Ireland.

A balance must be struck between constantly reviewing the police and allowing them to get on with their job—a balance between the need to secure inclusiveness and accountability in the governing arrangements for the police and their ability to get on with their job. A balance must be struck between the party and independent members on the Policing Board and on the district policing partnerships. There must also be a balance between the Chief Constable, who is rightly responsible operationally for what the police do, and the Policing Board, which has responsibility for holding him to account in a general sense but not on particular aspects of the operations that he superintends.

Lembit Öpik: I certainly agree with the right hon. Gentleman that there is always a danger of over-regulation, but that might be the price that one has to pay to build confidence in those parts of the Northern Ireland community that did not trust the police. However, does he not accept that one of the biggest frustrations for a proportion of the police force is not what is in this Bill, but the fact that there is mandatory 50:50 recruitment? To follow the logic of his argument, it would be appropriate for the Government to review that provision if they want to remove some of the pressure on the police.

Mr. Mandelson: That is a matter for the Government. Like the hon. Gentleman, I would be perfectly happy to hear their arguments for any changes that they might contemplate in that regard.

All sorts of checks and balances were involved in the original Act. There was not just a balance between the board and the Chief Constable, but a balance and check between the differing responsibilities of the board and the Secretary of State and a balance relating to the respective roles and powers of the ombudsman, the board and the Secretary of State vis-à-vis the police service. By no means, do I claim perfection for the original Act, but we took great care at that time to get it right in policing terms and not just in terms of what was being demanded politically by the different parties in Northern Ireland.

It goes without saying that everything in Northern Ireland involves negotiation. Given the history and nature of the conflict there, every day, every week, every issue and everything is rightly subject to negotiation. That is in the nature of the peace process and the conflict resolution in which we are all engaged. Compromise is the order of the day, and that is right. However, we must be careful not to confuse compromise with political expediency when such important practical matters as policing and the upholding of the rule of law are at stake. We must certainly not confuse compromise with the political expediency that downgrades or displaces the professional needs of the structures of law and order in Northern Ireland that have such a responsibility placed on them in the particular circumstances of the Province. I certainly do not suggest that Ministers are disregarding the professional needs of the police and the structures of law and order—quite the opposite. I know my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State well enough to know that he would never move an inch in that direction.

However, we must bear in mind that nowhere in the United Kingdom—indeed, in very few places in the western world—are the structures of law and order under greater pressure than they are in Northern Ireland. They are under pressure not just from terrorist activity from the residual number of dissidents, but from organised crime, sectarian violence, intra-community killings and the continuing civil disorder of the sort that we have seen just this last weekend. That provides the backcloth, and the Government need to consider carefully any move that risks unbalancing the existing political framework and the existing system of checks of balances that were so carefully weighed and so carefully written into the original Act. If a wrong move is made, that may make the job of the police even harder than it already is.

For example, the Bill proposes to reduce the already limited safeguard that enables the Secretary of State to question the board's desire to launch inquiries into the police. The board's right of inquiry is of the utmost importance, but the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) illustrated how one can take that right to excess and apply it improperly in a way that discredits the very right that it is important to build into the legislation. In other words, that right must be exercised with caution and not with an excessive political zeal that threatens to destabilise the police or, at the very least, almost drain them of their energy and ability to carry on their normal policing functions.

We must remember that what will take the Prime Minister and the Taoiseach to Hillsborough this week are the possible circumstances in which Sinn Fein and republican members join the Policing Board and the district policing partnerships for the first time. I welcome that; it is long overdue. Sinn Fein has been trading for too long on its commitment to the Good Friday agreement and the peace process without actually signing up to a crucial, central part of the agreement that was made. However, we should not pretend that this would not introduce an entirely new political dimension to policing if and when republican members join the police bodies. We must be aware of the impact that that could have on the governing arrangements of the PSNI.

The Bill also proposes that, out of the Policing Board's 18 or 19 members, the new required number of members needed to approve an inquiry is only eight. If one considers police authorities in most parts of the United Kingdom, most people would think it extraordinary that it would take only eight members of a board to bring about the instigation of what could be a very major and expensive inquiry with major long-term implications for the police. I recall that there was huge pressure to agree to the paltry figure of eight in the original Bill, and the Government believed that the figure of 10 was very much on the low side. We made it absolutely clear that, if we conceded to an ever-lower figure, that would risk exposing the police to unreasonable political pressure that would reduce the credibility of any such decision by the board. After all, it is a major step to set up an inquiry and, if it can be agreed by eight out of 18 or 19 members, that is bound to reduce the credibility of the decision. If the power was unreasonably or improperly used, it could lead to an unravelling of confidence by the police and the public in the PSNI's governance. I have heard the reassurances offered by Ministers on that point, but I have yet to be fully convinced that this particular change is necessary or desirable.

The same is true of the proposed extension, after a short period, of the powers of the ombudsman in Northern Ireland. She is only just beginning to make proper use of her existing powers, and not without controversy. It is important to recall that Patten always intended the focus of those powers to be on individual complaints about wrongdoing by the police, so that someone who had got on the wrong side of the police, or had suffered from some improper use of police powers, would have somewhere independent to go in the knowledge that their complaint would be thoroughly and rigorously examined, as it should be. The Bill expands the role of the ombudsman by shifting it away from the investigation of individual complaints to embrace wider and more general investigations into police practices and policies, which are properly the domain of the Policing Board, not the ombudsman, given the original conception of his—now her—role in the Patten report.

Lady Hermon: Under the Justice (Northern Ireland) Act 2002, the new office of a chief inspector of criminal justice has been established—although the appointment has not yet been made—and the police ombudsman's office will fall within his remit. Does that reassure the right hon. Gentleman about the ombudsman's extensive and increasing powers?

Mr. Mandelson: No, I am afraid that it does not. The ombudsman has a very important job to do in addressing individual complaints brought by members of the community against the Police Service of Northern Ireland. She is only human and cannot be expected to embrace such a wide canvas, or waterfront, of possible calls to investigate not only individual complaints, but the general policies and practices of the police. I am not entirely reassured by the change that the hon. Lady mentions.

Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East): Does my right hon. Friend accept that one of the key benefits of the parliamentary ombudsman is that they are able to identify systemic failures arising from individual cases, and does that not reassure him that some of the changes in the Bill will not be as draconian as he fears?

Mr. Mandelson: If that were the case, one could rely on the undertaking that I gave from the Dispatch Box at the time of the previous legislation that, should the ombudsman identify a pattern of behaviour, she would be able to make it public and present her views to the board and to the Secretary of State without further changing legislation and investing in her, additional powers and responsibilities that she does not have the capacity to undertake at this stage in the development and evolution of her role.

I want to tell the Government this: there is a very complex political situation to be negotiated in Northern Ireland, given the suspension of the institutions and given our overriding desire to restart those institutions, to get devolution under way again and to achieve the full and enduring implementation of the Good Friday agreement. I had to smile slightly when the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) complained that the Government were contemplating doing deals in Northern Ireland. I have to say to him in his absence that if he does not understand that politics in Northern Ireland is about is doing deals to secure the peace process and the advances and progress that we have already achieved, he remains, despite his long service in his job, a stranger to the affairs of Northern Ireland. I make no criticism of the Government's handling of the negotiations or of their present complexity, but care must always be taken never to play politics with the police's effectiveness and ability to do their job, because on that rides the public's confidence in the peace process and political negotiations of which policing forms a part. If the public begin to think that risks are being taken with their security and safety, we will quickly see a rapid erosion of their wider confidence in the political process in Northern Ireland.

We have to be clear that the long-term prize that is at stake is enduring stability, ceasefires and peace in Northern Ireland. The ability of the police, with the rest of the community, to help to transform the Province, for the first time that anyone can remember, into a thoroughly law-abiding, law-upholding place, is fundamental to the achievement of that prize. It is therefore important that nothing is done, for the sake of what might appear to be short-term political progress, to undermine the security of Northern Ireland and the long-term integrity of the peace process.

The Government will take many decisions in the coming days and weeks that bear on the short term and the long term in Northern Ireland, some of which will relate to policing and some of which will relate to the normalisation of security and to the infrastructure that supports its maintenance, and they will of course have my full support in taking those necessary political steps. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State needs to be aware—I know that he is, as I was when I did his job—that he will have to ward off pressures for short-term fixes and concessions that, however expedient or harmless they may look today or in the short term, can bring unforeseen and uncovenanted dangers in the longer term.

David Burnside: Given the right hon. Gentleman's experience of having been Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, and his understanding of the feeling in the wider Unionist community about what is called the transition and reform in policing, can he foresee, in the circumstances that will arise over the next few weeks, that the Government of whom he was a member could start to put together a deal that would make it impossible for the law-abiding Unionist parties—the Ulster Unionist party and the Democratic Unionist party—to continue to participate on the Policing Board if the price was a deal to bring Sinn Fein on to that board when it is still involved in terrorism and violence?

Mr. Mandelson: I would regard it as unthinkable for the Government to contemplate any set of actions that would result in it becoming impossible for Unionist representatives to continue to be members of the Policing Board, and I have absolute confidence that they are not contemplating and would not contemplate such a set of actions.

I know, as does my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, that the Government will need to weigh carefully all their decisions—not only on the Bill, but on bigger and weightier matters that will be on their plate in the coming days and weeks—and I have no doubt that they will do so. I hope that the outcome is political success, completion, closure—in every sense of the word—and restarting devolution and the political institutions in Northern Ireland. Every member of the community can and should take pride in the institutions' work and the extent to which they have served the needs of the people of Northern Ireland. They will continue to do that if they are given the chance.

6.30 pm

Lady Hermon (North Down): It is an honour to follow the right hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson). He was an exceedingly good Secretary of State in his all-too-short time in Northern Ireland. He was sensitive about reforming the RUC and he recognised the sacrifice of the 302 officers who gave their lives defending all communities in Northern Ireland from terrorism. The Patten report did not recognise that properly. During his term of office, the RUC was awarded the George Cross. I regret that he was hounded out of office after the period of suspension that he announced in February 2000.

The hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) is no longer in his place. I was sorry that he felt unable to take several "friendly fire" interventions. I hope that I did not misunderstand him, but he said that the name "RUC" had been abolished. However, the title was changed only for operational purposes. Section 1 of the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000 clearly states:

"The body of constables known as the Royal Ulster Constabulary shall continue in being as the Police Service of Northern Ireland (incorporating the Royal Ulster Constabulary)."

For legal reasons, the title "RUC" continues. For operational purposes, the body is the "Police Service of Northern Ireland."

I am pleased that the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) and I are in agreement. Both of us are weary of the number of measures that amend or introduce police reform. They include the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 1998; the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000 and the Bill that we are considering today. Like the hon. Gentleman, I hope that the Government have now got it right and that we shall have no more piecemeal amendments to policing and police reform. I am sure that the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland appreciates that every time a change is made to policing, it is construed—rightly or wrongly—as a concession to republicans.

David Burnside: Rightly.

Lady Hermon: Perhaps my hon. Friend will elaborate on that later. The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh said that there were no concessions to republicans on the face of the Bill. I agree. However, we anticipate that, if the Provisional IRA is stood down—the euphemism that is being used for disbanding—and it undertakes a final act of decommissioning as it promised the people of Northern Ireland in its statement in May 2000, the Government will further amend legislation. They have such a huge majority that the amendments will unfortunately be accepted, even if they do not implement the Patten report.

I have already alluded to clauses 19 onwards in an intervention on the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael). They repeat the provisions of the Police Reform Act 2002. It introduced four categories of officer: community support officers, investigation officers, detention officers and escort officers. It is therefore curious that the Bill omits community support officers. The Chief Constable, Hugh Orde, is under continuing pressure for resources, and one would therefore expect the Bill to provide for community support officers.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland made a valuable point. The contracted-out services will be given to civilians. Expecting them to abide by a code of ethics is not sufficient. The Secretary of State will recall that the Patten report contained the famous words, in Northern Ireland. If we want the Patten report to be implemented fully, civilians who undertake escort or investigation duties must receive human rights training as well as training under the Police and Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1989. The Bill does not go far enough.

"human rights should be seen as the core of policing"

I am also worried about district policing partnerships. Clause 13 states:

"In appointing independent members of a DPP the Board shall so far as practicable secure that the members of the DPP (taken together) are representative of the community in the district."

"Representative of the community" has become a popular phrase. It was contained in the Public Processions (Northern Ireland) Act 1998, which established the Parades Commission. Hon. Members may be interested to know that Evelyn White, a young lady from the Garvaghy road, challenged the composition of the Parades Commission because its nine members are all men. Not a single woman serves on the Parades Commission. The Lord Chief Justice heard the case and the phrase "representative of the community" was interpreted in the context of the Public Processions (Northern Ireland) Act 1998 as a balance between Catholics and Protestants, not men and women. That is unacceptable.

I ask the Government not to leave the bare phrase,

"representative of the community in the district".

If they genuinely wish to implement the Patten report, they should consider paragraph 6.26, which states:

"Taken as a whole, each DPPB should be broadly representative of the district in terms of religion, gender, age and cultural background."

It would be helpful if those words were included in the Bill instead of the bald phrase, "representative of the community". In previous case law, it was interpreted narrowly. That is unacceptable. All members of the community, including women, should have a say in a district policing partnership.

I hope that the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh will forgive me if I paraphrase him incorrectly, but I believe that he described the Catholic-Protestant provision as "the niggly bit". He said, "Let us not disagree over the niggly bits." I say with the greatest respect to him and to the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford that although both are keen for the 50:50 recruitment procedure to continue, I have a difficulty with that.

Mr. Mallon: That is not what I said. I referred to the Catholic-Protestant divide, purely because it is an element of the overall legislation with which we are dealing. A completely distinct point that I made was that policing legislation in general contained many niggly parts. Perhaps that stems from the fact that we are a niggly people living in what is currently rather a niggly place. My plea was that we should not lose sight of the ultimate vision in Patten simply because we considered some elements to be niggly. In no way was I disparaging either Catholics or Protestants, or indeed making my point in relation to them.

Lady Hermon: I am grateful for that clarification.

As I was saying, my difficulty with the Bill is caused by its failure to deal with the 50:50 recruitment procedure. Why do I find that so terribly offensive? Along with, I would have thought, all who support the Belfast agreement—which I still passionately support—I find it offensive because, in referendums, the majority of people in Northern Ireland and in the Republic voted in favour of an agreement that, unusually, repeated not just once but twice its reference to a commitment that "parties affirm in particular . . . the right to equal opportunity in all social and economic activity, regardless of class or creed."

It also stated that

"the British Government intends as a particular priority. . . to promote equality of opportunity in relation to religion and political opinion."

That was said in 1998, and the overwhelming majority of the people of the island of Ireland endorsed it. I find it grossly offensive that, two years later, in the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000, the British Government legalised religious discrimination in the recruitment of police officers. Had they not negotiated an exemption from European Union directives that would have made it illegal by December 2003, we would not be faced with this terribly divisive and counter-productive recruitment procedure for constables. Young Catholics are warmly welcomed into the new Police Service for Northern Ireland, and I am pleased to see them there; but I am deeply concerned about the possibility of their being made to feel that they are there not on merit, but because of their religion. I find that offensive.

During the time of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, many young Catholics bravely entered the force although they and their families had been targeted. The intimidation was dreadful and harrowing for all concerned. Although, I am delighted that so many Catholics are entering the police service, they should be doing so because intimidation has ended and not as a result of a discriminatory recruitment procedure.

I remind the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford of a High Court decision from July 2002. When a young constituent of mine, Mark Parsons, challenged the procedure, Mr. Justice Kerr, a distinguished Northern Ireland judge, considered its compatibility with our human rights obligations under the European convention on human rights. It is, in fact, tolerated because it is of a temporary nature. Section 46 of the 2000 Act is entitled "Temporary provisions concerning composition of the police".

There should therefore be a review in spring 2004, but the longer the procedure remains the more disenchanted the Unionist community becomes with the Government's failure to keep faith with the Belfast agreement that they supported in 1998. It continues to undermine Unionist confidence in the Government's commitment to the agreement.

Mr. Quentin Davies: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Lady Hermon: I should be delighted.

Mr. Davies: I said earlier that it was possible to make a strong and intellectually respectable, indeed morally respectable, case against the 50:50 provision in Patten. I understand that case, although I explained earlier why I felt that it must be overridden by other considerations. The hon. Lady should recognise, however, that, according to her logic, she rejects Patten. That has serious implications for the peace process, because the question of what she will replace it with arises immediately, as does the question of how any new consensus on policing involving both communities can begin to be built if Patten has been thrown away. If the 50:50 mechanism, with all its imperfections and anomalies, which I fully acknowledge, is thrown away, Patten is thrown away. The hon. Lady must make that choice.

Lady Hermon: I remind the hon. Gentleman that under the terms of reference given to the Patten commission by the Belfast agreement, the commission was asked to produce proposals that could enjoy widespread support from the community as a whole. I hardly think that legalising religious discrimination can gain such support. It is deeply divisive. When the Select Committee on Northern Ireland Affairs took evidence, the Secretary of State said that such action would be counterproductive, and warned strongly against it. I do not think that the Patten commission fulfilled its terms of reference.

Mr. Davies: I am afraid that, rather uncharacteristically, the hon. Lady has evaded the question. The terms of reference do matter; the fact is that we now have Patten as it stands, and she must either reject it or accept it. If she throws away the 50:50 procedure, the whole thing will unravel and she will have rejected Patten. My question remains: what will she put in its place? What better basis has she conceived for bringing in the nationalist community and creating a police service that genuinely commands the support—and in due course, I hope, the affection and respect—of the people of Northern Ireland, on both sides of the sectarian divide.

Lady Hermon: I thank the hon. Gentleman for another helpful intervention. He will know that during my husband's time as Chief Constable of the RUC, his deputy was a Roman Catholic, as were certain other Assistant Chief Constables. The Patten commission confirmed that there was no discrimination whatever in the RUC.

The Northern Ireland Affairs Committee examined the composition of and recruitment to the RUC in 1997. It concluded that the main cause of the low Catholic recruitment was not discrimination but intimidation. If members of a political party—Sinn Fein—hesitate and faff around and cannot condemn, as the hon. Gentleman rightly did, a vicious, nasty, murderous attack on a Catholic recruit in Ballymena, and instead sit on the fence, intimidation will continue. That is shameful and disgraceful of Sinn Fein.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) said that according to the demographic figures there is an almost equal balance between young Catholics and young Protestants of both sexes, so both should be entering the police service quite naturally. It is one of the reasons why I wish Sinn Fein would have the courage that the SDLP showed in the autumn of 2000 in coming on to the Policing Board, because it will mean that the war is over if it is encouraging young republicans to enter the police service. It cannot tolerate them being shot in the back at the same time.

Mr. Donaldson: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Patten report is not holy writ and that the Government are not compelled under any circumstances to accept every recommendation in every report produced by an independent body? Therefore, there was never a question of either accepting or rejecting.

Lady Hermon: I thank my hon. Friend for his very helpful intervention.

After 30 years of some of the most stringent anti-discrimination legislation in Northern Ireland, I find it personally offensive—I ask the House to bear it in mind that I have lived there all my life—that the British Government should legalise religious discrimination and negotiate exemption from a European directive that would make such discrimination as we have before us illegal. I thought that I would never see the day. It is intolerable, and it brings disrepute upon those who maintain this provision and wish to see it in the Bill.

I know that other hon. Members wish to speak, so I rest my case.

Mr. Stephen McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green): I begin by apologising to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to those on the Government and Opposition Front Benches and to other hon. Members for the fact that I may not be here throughout the winding-up speeches. There was a complaint earlier about the conflict of time and interest. I am not sure that I put that down to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. It may have more to do with the modernisation reforms. Perhaps I should leave the matter there.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) raised a point of order with Mr. Speaker earlier, he described this debate as a trivial event in relation to other matters that he wanted to discuss. I think that that is a wrong term. This debate is probably not an earth-shattering event, but having listened to it I have begun to realise why it is important that we are here tonight and why the matters that we are discussing are of considerable significance.

I had wanted to refer to the debate as the further implementation of the Patten report, but, having listened to the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson), I think that it might be safer to say that it is part of the ongoing reform of policing in Northern Ireland. Hopefully, it will get us all out of a difficult situation.

It is clear that the provisions of the Bill are about trying to strengthen the role of the Policing Board, given the early experience of its operation, and about trying to clarify the board's relationship with both the Chief Constable and the Secretary of State. The second part of the Bill relates to giving the Chief Constable more flexibility over the deployment of officers and civilian staff. Although people may have differing views about how that part should be pursued, I believe that most would agree that there is a pressing need to have more front-line officers out on the streets in Northern Ireland, so anything that civilianisation can do in that respect should be welcome.

I should like to echo a criticism that the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee made about the way in which the Bill was pursued, an issue highlighted in the report of an inquiry on which my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Bailey) and I served. I refer to the time scale for dealing with this matter. I appreciate that there is an argument, which the Minister made to the Committee, that elements of the Bill have been widely discussed elsewhere. But there is something rather strange about a state of affairs in which the draft clauses are published on 9 December and the Bill commences its Second Reading in the other place on 16 December. That hardly allows time for pre-legislative scrutiny. If the intention of publishing draft clauses was to ensure that that was the process, then, allowing for comments to the Committee about the other pressures on time, there may be a lesson that we need to allow slightly more time if we are serious about the process.

I want to pick out a few clauses, some of which have already been referred to, and to suggest why they probably make sense and why it is worth our while to pursue them.

I start with clause 3, which is about the meetings of the board. I think it was the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) who said that it was wrong for the board to choose to meet less often and therefore be less publicly accountable. There is little doubt that when Patten reported initially one of the reasons why he stipulated that there should be 12 meetings a year was that he was anxious that there should be a fairly open, consistent, publicly accountable process. But I understand that the board has said that it should not be necessary to lay down in legislation that it must meet 10 times a year. I believe that as well as asking for a reduction it also asked for a provision to allow for occasions when it wants to meet more than once within a 28-day period, so we are simply being asked to show a bit of common sense about its operation in the light of experience so far. If most of us are prepared to acknowledge that the board has acquitted itself fairly well so far, it would be absurd not to listen to its experience and try to adjust matters accordingly.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Over the years with regard to the Belfast agreement, and even tonight with regard to the Patten report, we have been lectured that we should not be cherry picking. Surely consistency would say that we should abide by Patten even on this point. Will the hon. Gentleman accept the possibility that if the board asks permission to meet more often it might be to make a more up-to-date request for an increase in salary for the independent members, since they must be working hard?

Mr. McCabe: I leave the hon. Gentleman to conduct his own trade union negotiations. Everyone will have heard his point.

Of course, when it is convenient hon. Members give dire warnings about cherry picking. My view is that people who are seriously committed to the process in Northern Ireland should be prepared to adjust, reform and review as situations develop. I do not believe that there is no scope for that. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree with me and other members of the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee that there may well be an argument for the Committee at some point to review the whole development and operation of the Patten process. There is nothing wrong with learning from experience and trying to adjust accordingly. In fact, to do the opposite is to put on a straitjacket, and that is hopelessly unhelpful in politics.

I turn to cause 12, relating to changes with regard to the police ombudsman. I have been slightly surprised to hear the differing views in the debate. On the one hand, my right hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool told us that the provisions were to extend the ombudsman's powers. Simultaneously the Select Committee heard during the inquiry that the ombudsman's office had actually complained that the changes were designed to reduce the ombudsman's power. We therefore need to discover what is actually happening in respect of these provisions. In fact, this is one of the clearer parts of the Bill, and I am surprised that people are having trouble making sense of it.

The concerns that were expressed related to whether the ombudsman should have retrospective powers, and the changes made through clause 12 have clarified that issue. The use of the word "current" has sought to address that problem, and the use of the word "investigate", rather than a phrase such as "power to make a report", makes the role of the ombudsman much more specific. There has to be a clear case, incident or set of circumstances that the ombudsman is required to investigate. The use of the phrase "public interest", rather than "public concern", addresses the anxiety that synthetic public concern might be whipped up by those who would want to use, or even to abuse, the office of ombudsman. So the concerns that have been expressed in different quarters have been addressed, and if anything, this clause is much tighter and clearer than it could possibly have been at the outset.

I turn to the question of representativeness, by which the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon), among others, has been somewhat exercised today. When the Minister was questioned on that issue during the Select Committee inquiry, she made it clear that she was referring the Committee to paragraph 6 of schedule 3 to the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000, and to the criteria that must be considered in respect of the nomination of independent members. I will not go through those criteria in detail, but they include the criterion that the individuals concerned must "have a demonstrable interest in the local community, community safety or policing issues; be resident in, or have a close connection with the . . . area; be able to think and exercise sound judgement"— we will all have our own opinions on how that one will be tested—

"be able to present information clearly and logically; and have experience of working with others and maintaining networks."

So although people were right to be anxious about representativeness, which is a thorny issue in the Northern Ireland context, it is clear that it will not be possible to nominate and select anyone we care to imagine regardless of consideration of their background, or to use representativeness as a way to override other considerations.

Lady Hermon: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I am exercised by the composition of district policing partnerships because the Government repeatedly tell us that they want to implement the Patten report, but that they cannot cherry pick from it and do not wish to do so. The report states clearly:

"As with the Policing Board, the independent members should"— should—

"be selected to represent the business and trade union interests and to provide expertise in matters pertaining to community safety."

The Patten recommendations make no mention at all of those with criminal or terrorist convictions. How does the hon. Gentleman square what he is saying about the Bill's proposals with the recommendations in Patten?

Mr. McCabe: I am grateful to the hon. Lady. I square that very easily, because I do not take the view that we should regard the situation in Northern Ireland as frozen or rigid; I am looking for progress and development. It is clear that there are certain people who could not serve on the Policing Board at the moment, but I look forward to a day when that may be possible. The crucial issue is identifying some clear criteria against which nominations should be judged, and they should include interest and competence in the subject. It is fair to say that through the text under consideration, the Government have indicated which other factors might apply to those with criminal convictions—should their eligibility be considered at all at some future stage.

I had not been particularly concerned about the 50:50 question, until I listened to today's debate. I should say to the hon. Member for North Down in particular that applications from the Roman Catholic community have, I think, risen steadily since the introduction of that proposal. Against that background, we should perhaps judge it as a success.

Lembit Öpik: I apologise for having left the Chamber briefly, but I did watch the debate on the television and

I heard what the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) said. Does the hon. Gentleman not accept that a steady rise in applications is not necessarily evidence that the 50:50 rule is responsible for it? More to the point, the real balance that we have to strike relates to whether the resentment caused by 50:50 is worth the benefit, which may indeed have accrued anyway because of changes introduced to the Police Service.

Mr. McCabe: Well, a sustained increase in applications from members of the Roman Catholic community does seem to have coincided with the introduction of the 50:50 rule, but the hon. Gentleman may be right, in that no inquiry or clear-cut evidence has wholly supported that connection. However, if we are looking for areas in which to root out some of the past sense of injustice, we should not ignore that one, on which Patten has rightly focused attention.

Mr. Donaldson: The facts about 50:50 recruitment are actually the opposite of what the hon. Gentleman suggests. Since 50:50 recruitment was introduced, the number of Roman Catholic applicants to the police service has consistently dropped with each recruitment batch. Given the difficulties consequent on that, the Chief Constable has been unable to recruit the number of police officers that he would like, and the full quota for each intake of new recruits has not been met precisely because not enough Roman Catholic recruits are coming forward. So in that respect, 50:50 recruitment is not working.

Mr. McCabe: Well, perhaps this is a phenomenon peculiar to Northern Ireland, but the hon. Gentleman seems to have access to facts that differ from those in my possession. We might have to continue our argument another time, but nothing that was reported to the Select Committee, or which I have seen made available to this House, disputes the notion that there has been a consistent rise in applications from Roman Catholics. I should be happy to continue this debate with the hon. Gentleman at a future date.

When today's debate began, I did not anticipate that we would learn of an entirely new Opposition policy in respect of Northern Ireland, but that is what we got from the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies). I am rather sorry that he is unable to be here at the moment, because I would have liked the opportunity to pursue exactly what he was telling the House. As I understood it, he said clearly that there must be interlinkage—the word that he used—between policies in Northern Ireland. He made it clear that it was not a question of incremental progress or of inch-by-inch reform. Presumably, therefore, he favours the big-bang, comprehensive solution that allows no time for reflection or adjustment. Interlinkage is a permafrost policy. It is not about edging forward or about the disgusting negotiations in which people are inclined to engage in their genuine attempts to avoid further killings or the breakdown of political progress. Interlinkage, as a policy, says that everything is too complex and that if we cannot solve the problem in one fell swoop, we should not bother at all. That approach derides everything that people are trying to do. If it is the policy of the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford, who is now back in his place, I worry about what progress we can anticipate in any area of life in Northern Ireland.

The whole experience of change in Northern Ireland has been inch-by-inch progress, and sometimes we have seen reversals. The last Conservative Prime Minister is often credited—rightly—with taking the first tentative steps and edging the process forward, and he did not get the support that he deserved. If he had not taken those brave decisions, I wonder where we would be today. The present Government have continued that process. At times it has felt like two steps forward one step back, but on balance even those in Northern Ireland who are disillusioned with parts of the process would acknowledge that life for the vast majority of people in Northern Ireland is probably better now than it was 15 years ago.

I was disappointed to hear that the Bill should be dismissed as inch-by-inch reform. That is the sort of politics that we should discount as the way to proceed in Northern Ireland. The essence of the Bill is the reverse of the policy described by the hon. Gentleman. We are being asked to reflect on adjustments and changes to policing reform in Northern Ireland, partly as a result of further negotiations and partly as a result of experiences after the implementation of parts of the Patten report in the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000.

I cannot see a better way forward for policing or any other area of life in Northern Ireland. Unless we have the option of listening to people's genuine doubts and concerns and adjusting policy to reflect the matters that they raise, some elements of the community will be excluded whenever changes are made. That is an atrocious approach which would ultimately wreck the policy. I urge all hon. Members to acknowledge that we should all unite in favour of incremental change in Northern Ireland, with time to reflect and adjust if necessary. We certainly should not be scared of introducing further legislation to change our arrangements in the light of experience or representations from important elements in the community. That is how we should proceed, and I hope that the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman will reflect on his own views before he develops the all-or-nothing policy that he outlined today.

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley): I wish to echo what the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) said earlier, when he mentioned the real reasons for the Bill. My constituents are not writing to me or stopping me in the street to ask for new policing legislation because the Policing Board needs more power: they tell me that we need more police officers. Crime is on the increase. We cannot get police officers to respond to crime when we need them, because there are not enough and they are tied up in other activities. That is the problem.

How can I convince my constituents that the Bill will put more officers on the front line in Northern Ireland? That point is recognised in the report by the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee, which specifically concludes:

> "There is in Northern Ireland a particularly urgent need to release more officers for front-line police work."

There is nothing in the Bill that will achieve that, and that is why I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) when she said that the Bill needed a clause that rescinded the 50:50 recruitment policy. That would enable more officers to be recruited immediately.

Recently, the Chief Constable tried to recruit more civilian staff, which would have released more police officers on to the front line, but because of the constraints placed on him by the 50:50 recruitment policy, he was not able to recruit anything like the 300 civilian staff that he wished to recruit.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Jane Kennedy): The hon. Gentleman provokes me to respond. He argues that the constraint on recruitment is the 50:50 policy, but does he accept that it is the physical structure of Garnerville itself that places the greatest limitation on the number of recruits that the Chief Constable can accept?

Mr. Donaldson: No, I do not agree with the Minister. In the last recruitment batch, the quota for the intake was 60. However, only 36 were recruited. That was not because there was not enough room: it was because only 18 applicants from the Roman Catholic community were successful in the recruitment process. The police had to tell some of my constituents, who had also been successful, that because they were Protestants they could not be recruited as there were not enough successful Roman Catholic applicants. It was not because of a lack of accommodation in Garnerville. The Minister is wrong. The police cannot recruit enough new officers because of the 50:50 recruitment rule.

Lembit Öpik: Does the hon. Gentleman recall an occasion on which I asked whether the Chief Constable would be restricted in that way and Ministers gave the explicit assurance that he would not?

Mr. Donaldson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. He is right, because it would be incredible if we needed more police officers and the only problem that we faced was the lack of accommodation at Garnerville. That problem could be resolved, even if only temporarily, pending the construction of the new police training college. I am afraid that I cannot accept the Minister's contention that the problem is accommodation, not the 50:50 policy. That flies in the face of reality.

Mr. Quentin Davies: The hon. Gentleman is right, in that the Chief Constable has not been able to achieve his quotas. That constraint bit before any constraints imposed by the capacity of Garnerville. Does he recall that one of the recommendations in the Patten report included the need for a new police college? It was recommended that the appropriations for the new college should be made in the next financial year. Does he agree that the Government have been derelict in their response to that recommendation, because we still do not have a new police college?

Mr. Donaldson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. Clearly there have been significant delays in implementing the recommendation that there should be a new police training college. As I understand it, the problem lies in finding the right location. However, I am told that that will be sorted out within the next three months so I hope that there will be no further obstacles and that the new college will be constructed and handed over to the Chief Constable.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Surely, it would not matter if the finest police college was sitting there already. Under the terms of the legislation, Protestants would be banned from it. That is what the rule amounts to. The Chief Constable tells me, "My hands are tied. I can't even get detectives in from across the water because of the rules". If that is so, why are we talking about a college that has not been built? Even if it had been built, the rule would still be 50:50 and the rooms could not be filled with recruits. Furthermore, why persist with the idea that people have constantly to reapply and take the tests even if they have passed them two or three times? Why must they be turned down only to start over again?

Mr. Donaldson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that point. Young Protestant constituents have visited my office and shed tears of frustration. One young lady from Lisburn had successfully passed all the tests and examinations three times, only to be told, "We cannot take you because you are a Protestant". What does it do to enthusiastic young people who want to serve in the police and make a contribution to the community when they are told that because of their religious viewpoint—because of the church that they attend on Sundays—they cannot be police officers? That is downright blatant discrimination; it is a breach of human rights and the sooner the 50:50 rule is scrapped the better for all of us.

It is an insult to young Roman Catholics to tell them that they have been put in a privileged position. They do not want that; they want to join a police service in which everyone is equal, everyone is accorded equal respect and their religious views are not the issue. Sadly, the 50:50 rule sectarianises the recruitment policy of the police and creates a problem that will exist for many years to come.

Two classes of police officer are being created and that will not help to establish the police service that we want for the future. Like the hon. Member for North Down, and, I think, all hon. Members from Northern Ireland, I want to see more Roman Catholic recruits for the police service. An elderly lady in my constituency told me that the police took a considerable length of time to respond after her home had been broken into recently. She was obviously distressed and said, "It doesn't matter to me whether the police officer who answers my distress call is Protestant or Catholic. All that matters is that there is a police officer to help me when I need help." That is the heart of the issue.

Mr. McCabe: I am trying genuinely to follow the hon. Gentleman's argument and I understand that he is making a sensitive point. He says that whether the officer is Protestant or Catholic does not matter to him and I have no reason to doubt him. However, can he conceive of a situation where it might matter? For example, it might matter in a society that is perceived to be unjust and unfair and one group appears to be in the ascendancy and dominates certain functions—[Interruption.] I am not talking specifically about Northern Ireland. That situation has applied in many societies in the past and may still apply nowadays. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that there could be a perception that the police force was not balanced or fair and that we have a duty to address that?

Mr. Donaldson: If the hon. Gentleman talked to some of his own constituents he would probably find people who do not believe that the police are fair or balanced. There are people throughout society—in all our constituencies—who are anti-police or have a grievance against them. That is not unique to Northern Ireland. However, even if that were the problem—which I do not accept—the 50:50 recruitment policy is not the answer.

To clarify my earlier intervention during the hon. Gentleman's speech, it is true that, in general, the number of Roman Catholic recruits entering the police service is higher than in previous years. However, my point is that although when recruitment to the new police service began there was significant interest from the Roman Catholic community, the number has dropped consistently in each subsequent batch of recruits. In the last intake, the number of successful Roman Catholic recruits was down to 18, so the total number of recruits, which was 60, was reduced and restricted to 36. That means that there is a shortfall.

The same policy applies to civilian recruitment. The Chief Constable recently initiated a campaign to recruit additional civilians to free up police officers for transfer or secondment to the district command units. However, the 50:50 rule meant that there was a substantial shortfall in the number of recruits for civilianisation, so officers who could have been released from headquarters duties are not available to the Chief Constable or the district commanders. That is a direct consequence of the 50:50 policy. By not including a provision to rescind that recruitment policy, the Government have created a serious flaw in the Bill.

Other hon. Members have referred to other aspects of the Bill that could undermine the operational capacity of the Chief Constable and make it more difficult. I refer to clauses 9, 10, 18 and 22, which deal respectively with reports of the Chief Constable, inquiries by the board, the provision of information to the board and the disclosure of information and the holding of inquiries.

As the other place acknowledged, some of those provisions change the balance between the Chief Constable and the Policing Board in relation to political or policy issues. We have some concerns about that. Clause 10 provides that the number of members who can cause an inquiry to be held should be reduced from that set out in the 2000 Act. That is unacceptable, as was pointed out earlier. The Bill should include further safeguards to deal with that aspect of the legislation.

As the right hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) said, the problem is one of public confidence. If we want to recruit more young people—male or female—to be part of the new police service, public confidence is essential. As a representative of a majority Unionist constituency, I have to tell the House that public confidence in policing is lower than it has been for some time. Lisburn, in my constituency, has the largest district command unit in Northern Ireland. From talking to the commanders there, I know that officer numbers are a critical problem. Because of the shortage of manpower, they have had to take measures such as closing police stations at hours when they are normally open to the public and taking officers away from community duties to give them other responsibilities.

Patten told us that we were moving towards community-based policing, yet people in the communities that I represent see fewer police officers today than they did during the height of what was known as the troubles. Their community police officers are being pulled away to do engage in other duties. Therefore, if the Patten report is the ideal, as some have suggested, the legislation and its implementation are clearly not delivering what Patten envisaged: community-based policing.

The SDLP recently proposed the closure of a number of police stations, arguing that doing so would free up more police officers. I am not convinced by that argument. Indeed, many of the police stations that the SDLP talk about are almost effectively closed as it is. I should like them to be opened up as community facilities. Why do we not use some of the part-time officers who are being recruited to man those police stations and to patrol the vicinity of those stations? That would at least make a positive contribution to community-based policing.

We were fortunate that the district command unit in Lisburn was identified as one of the pilot schemes for part-time recruitment. I welcome that and have been urging my local police commander to use those part-time reservists to increase the profile of policing in the community so that people can see that there is some substance to the concept of community-based policing, but there is a problem with police numbers, so the police cannot respond to crime in the way that they would like. That is having a detrimental effect on police morale at the moment.

Public confidence—this is crucial—is being damaged by the large outflow of experienced police officers under the voluntary severance scheme, and recruitment has not been able to match that. That is acknowledged by the Policing Board. In fact, one of the key decisions behind the renewal of the full-time reserve for a further period to 2005 was taken precisely because the severance scheme had resulted in fewer police officers than had been envisaged and recruitment had not been able to match the number that had left.

The full-time reservists, who have made a very valuable contribution to policing in Northern Ireland in the past 30 years, deserve a little better. I urge the Government to consider the position of the full-time reserve and to look beyond 2005. I fear that, because of the way things are going at the moment, we will need the full-time reserve for some time to come, and I should like the Government to take a more positive attitude towards it, as well as expanding the part-time element.

The Government have also referred to the text for consideration. It does not form part of the Bill, but it is the Government's very unusual method of indicating to one political party in particular what they would be prepared to do in the event of that party making certain moves. Of course I am referring to Sinn Fein-IRA. The Government have indicated—the Secretary of State used this terminology earlier in the debate—that in the event of the IRA engaging in acts of completion, which he defined as a commitment to exclusively peaceful means and demonstrating that in tangible terms, the Government would be prepared to remove the current bar on convicted terrorists becoming independent members of the district policing partnerships.

We fought very hard against that proposal when the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000 was passing through both Houses of Parliament because we believed that it was unacceptable. I believe that it continues to be unacceptable that someone with a terrorist conviction should have a role as an independent member of a district policing partnership. Public confidence in the DPPs could be seriously undermined if that were to happen. The fact that the Government are holding that out as some kind of incentive and are bartering the issue in return for some political movement by the republicans is unacceptable.

We have heard the phrase "a commitment to exclusively peaceful means" for a considerable time. In 1997, all the paramilitary-linked parties signed up to the Mitchell principles of democracy and non-violence. That was supposed to be about a commitment to exclusively peaceful means, as is the agreement itself, but we are now being told that the IRA needs some further incentives to bring them to the point where they make that commitment to exclusively peaceful means.

What are we getting? We are told that the Government are also prepared to enhance the powers of the four Belfast subgroups. I am concerned that that will result in the Balkanisation of policing in Belfast. In political terms, west Belfast is more or less controlled by Sinn Fein, so it will also control the west Belfast subgroup. I should not like to be the police commander in west Belfast who has to account to a subgroup, with the kind of power that the Government propose, in the event that the IRA engages in some act of completion.

The Secretary of State referred to the text for consideration and said that, in the event of those acts of completion, the Government will introduce certain amendments to the legislation. Perhaps the Minister can tell us in summing up when the Government believe that might happen. Are we working to some kind of time scale? Clearly, the House will consider the programme motion on the Bill, and it must have some implication on whether the Government could accept the additional text. At what stage would the Government be prepared to accept it? The House is owed some clarification about the matter.

The Patten report declared that a clear objective was to take politics out of policing. Well, the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) made it absolutely clear that the Bill is a consequence of a political deal between the SDLP and the Government. That is why the legislation is being enacted. The Government are now saying that they are prepared to do another deal—this time with Sinn Fein-IRA—and to make further changes to policing on the back of another political deal.

There could be no greater politicisation of policing than the way that the Government are doing one-off deals behind our backs with political parties and then amending the police legislation. That is seriously damaging the Unionist community's confidence in the Government's ability to be in any sense impartial about policing.

Policing has become a political deal. If people want a concession or some political movement, they offer something on policing. I do not believe that that will achieve Chris Patten's stated objective of taking politics out of policing. Policing has become a political football. It has become something to barter with, and it has become common currency in the political negotiations. What does that do for the integrity of the policing institutions in Northern Ireland?

Of course Sinn Fein will not stop there. It is demanding the devolution of policing and justice as the next phase in so-called policing reform. Why does it want that? I believe that it has probably set its sights on capturing the ministry for policing and justice. I cannot imagine anything more absurd than a republican Minister in change of a department for policing and justice in Northern Ireland in the context where the IRA continues to exist as an illegal terrorist organisation.

Of course policing is only part of the Sinn Fein shopping list. Reference was made earlier to the policing implementation plan that accompanies the legislation, but the Government are working to a much bigger implementation plan. This implementation plan, which will evolve over the next few weeks during discussions between the Government and political parties, is about addressing Sinn Fein's demands: the so-called shopping list, which it covers by describing as the full implementation of the agreement. Policing is one part of that shopping list, and I am told that republicans are also pushing for retrospective powers to investigate allegations of police collusion to be included in the deal. We know that they want some kind of arrangement for members of their illegal organisation who are presently on the run. We know that they want substantial demilitarisation, as they describe it: the removal of the watchtowers in south Armagh, further troop withdrawals and further security base closures. All those are on the shopping list. They have a string of demands on human rights and equality issues, and they wish to scrap the legislation on suspension so that, if they do in future what they did at Castlereagh, Stormont or in Colombia, we will not be able to suspend the political institutions. No doubt all those items on the shopping list will appear on the Government's new implementation plan, to be published at some time in the next few weeks, as the Government's contribution to resolving the outstanding issues.

The Government need to be very careful. In their quest to win republican support, they may push the unionist community over the edge. The result may be that they secure republican support but lose unionist support. The right hon. Member for Hartlepool said in response to an intervention that none of this would be effective if one section of the community in Northern Ireland withdraws its support for these institutions. If the Government continue along the route on which they seem to be embarked, a real danger exists that that will be the result, particularly if they are seen to concede on a number of the issues that I have mentioned, simply to buy more support from the republican movement on matters to which it should have given support several years ago.

The Government are indicating, as we know, that this Bill is the latest instalment in an ongoing process whereby they barter concessions on policing, justice and security in return for so-called political progress on the part of the republican movement. The right hon. Member for Hartlepool said that we must not barter the security of the people of Northern Ireland, and he is right, but that is precisely what the Government are doing. My concern is that they may do it against the advice being given to them at the moment by Army chiefs who are very concerned about some of the proposals to withdraw military installations. Political expediency demands, however, that those concessions be made to the republican movement. Where will it end? What further price will have to be paid because the republican movement's appetite for concessions is insatiable?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. The hon. Gentleman is now straying rather wide of the matter before us, which is policing.

Mr. Donaldson: I was just coming to a close, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Policing in Northern Ireland cannot be seen in isolation from the wider political context, and I was simply trying to set the context in which the Bill has been presented to the House. The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) said that he hoped that this would be the last time that he would have to debate policing; I fear that it may not be. I believe that the Government intend to make further concessions; indeed, they have indicated and confirmed already some of the concessions that they are prepared to make to Sinn Fein-IRA in return for movement on the arms issue.

The Government should proceed with caution, because there is a real danger that the people whom I represent, and the people who are represented by hon. Members on this side of the House, will lose patience with the direction in which they are going. We want a peaceful, normal society in Northern Ireland. We want an end to the terrorism that has plagued Northern Ireland over the last 30 years. The Government have not so far succeeded in achieving that objective through making concessions, and they need to be very careful that such concessions do not result only in a further collapse in public confidence, particularly in the unionist community.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore): This is the first occasion on which I have been able to speak in a major debate on any aspect of Northern Ireland policy. I am glad to contribute, and I trust that the House will respond to me as someone who has attended many debates, heard many questions and listened to many hours of discussion on the Floor of the House. What I offer may not be to the agreement of the whole House, but it has been long considered.

I have come to this issue by a curious route. For many years in my former occupation as a lecturer, I taught my students about how Belfast was a model of the way forward. I taught them about how Belfast as a city—and Northern Ireland—was reinventing itself. Socially and economically, it was the driving force. It was challenging perceptions of itself—outdated perceptions—as a city with wall-to-wall policing, in which one could not walk safely, and as a city full of slums, which had armed police on every corner. The students were shown how that was changing—the painful way in which it was changing—and how a city could re-engineer itself. Let me say to Members on the Opposition side of the House that we contrasted it, as a shining example, with examples from across Europe of cities that had reinvented themselves such as Barcelona and the port city of Bilbao.

I present that context because, when I went to Belfast in May last year for the first time, as a new Back Bencher only five or six months into my job, my eyes were opened to what had been happening. They were opened, too, to the immense confidence of people on the street, whether I walked down the street with loyalists or with a Sinn Fein councillor, and the confidence that came through when I talked to people involved in a community operation. That confidence that the process was moving forward was in stark contrast to some of the political deliberations that were going on at the time.

From my limited and distant viewpoint, I could see that, in the whole of Northern Ireland, and in Belfast in particular, people were choosing for themselves a way forward that rejected the bloody and wearing conflict of the past. There was an inexorable movement forward. That is not an easy path, but it is an essential one; not a path without pain, but one with a definite purpose. Today, this weekend, and in recent months, we have seen how painful that path is to follow, but we also see with increasing clarity that it is the right path. This Bill is part of that path, which leads away from the rule of the past and the rule of terror towards social, economic and political stability.

If you will indulge me for a moment longer, Madam Deputy Speaker, I want to say that, in May, I also saw two clear images, which impact forcibly on the debate today and on the passage of this Bill—the two faces of Northern Ireland. The first and negative face was the almost complete divergence of views held by the many politicians I met formally—"divergence" is perhaps too insubstantial a word. I understand from recent press reports that scientists have found a new colour, which is known as "superblack". As I went from one discussion to another in Northern Ireland politics, I saw superblack and superwhite, and nothing in between. There was no subtle shading. The reverse and positive face was the recognition by many, if not all of the same politicians, when speaking informally or over a pint, of the many shades of compromise and of the colours and tones. The latter gave me hope; the former—the public soapbox politics—gave me only despair.

As a traveller to Northern Ireland, I know that many people approach the problem with the certainties that only an outsider can have. I was clear in my mind where the solutions lay and knew that, somewhere in between the many positions, a common thread would show the definite way ahead. I came away with all my great certainties much diminished. That was probably right and proper. It was a little too optimistic to hope that the angst that had been generations in the making would be unravelled by a novice in a few days, but I did glean some important insights that are relevant to the Bill.

I came away with the powerful optimism, which many hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber share, that the benefits of the peace process—the oft-named dividend of fewer lives lost and economic growth—were so cherished that the people of Northern Ireland would not let them slip from their grasp. I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) because some of my comments are relevant to his concerns. We have tip-toed around the additional text for consideration, which stands as a separate clause outside the Bill. I am also worried about that and want reassurances on it, but I come at the problem from a different angle. For me, the whole process has been one of painful compromise as we have made incremental progress, inch by inch.

There has been hurt and difficulty on both sides. Much of the anguish has been personal as people who suffered at the hands of former terrorists have had to swallow hard. Many of those same people have also said, however, that they want progress to continue. That has to be done delicately and, as the hon. Gentleman said, we have to keep everyone onside. It is not good enough to move too far to one side to bring one group on board if we lose everyone else off the ship. Everyone has to go forward together.

Despite the reassurances I seek, I am sure that we have made progress on the road to a better future, and that this Bill is right in word and spirit. But the devil is in the detail, and never has the phrase been so apt. Elements of the Bill seem like Faustian pacts. One of the greatest objections from the Unionist community is that it foresees the possibility of Sinn Fein sitting at the top table of the Policing Board and on district policing partnerships. I do not need to rehearse the well-aired objections to that, centring on the failure of the IRA to decommission fully and to put its arms beyond use, but my message to colleagues, Unionists and others, is simple and direct: that particular little devil must be exorcised before representation of Sinn Fein on the Policing Board is allowed. I seek an assurance on that.

We can achieve that by acts of completion. Hon. Members have asked what constitutes an act of completion. By now, after so many hours of debate on the Floor of the House and so many lines within newspaper columns, we know that they mean putting the guns and the arms permanently aside. That applies to the IRA, but it must also apply to any so-called paramilitaries who maintain the idea that the best way to influence a settlement in Northern Ireland is to keep the threat of violence as a bargaining chip. If there are no acts of completion there can be no place on the Policing Board or the DPPs. Accept the rules and become a player, or stay on the sidelines if it is not possible to agree to the rules of the game. I want the process to move forward and to be as inclusive as possible, but I also want the certainty that people are fully committed in word and deed to the peace process. The phrase "turning over a new leaf" is too light and flippant to represent that commitment properly.

Let me make it clear, however, that it is desirable—this is where I approach the problem from a different angle—to have Sinn Fein members on the Policing Board at the appropriate time if the party can demonstrate that its members and elected representatives are completely committed to peaceful democratic processes. That is the ultimate painful path of reconciliation and progress towards long-term peace and stability for Northern Ireland. As we have seen from the long haul in Northern Ireland and in other parts of the world where conflict has ravaged a society, the solution is to bring in the outcasts from the cold to make them part of the process and the political structures.

As we have seen from the faltering phases of the peace process, the inexorable climb towards democracy is painful, but all partners recognise how much there is to lose by opting out. Once the benefits of participating in democracy are realised—once people have worked for and achieved progress—no party that is seriously committed to a peaceful solution will ever want to pull out. That is why, with the right safeguards and at the appropriate time, I am fully committed to all members of the democratic community being represented on the policing boards and elsewhere.

Let me put to the Minister those aspects of the Bill on which I seek reassurance. There are no vacancies on the Policing Board that would allow Sinn Fein or any new candidates to be considered for membership. At present, all 19 members are directly appointed by the Secretary of State under direct rule. If, however, acts of completion were to occur, those conditions would allow the restoration of devolution, which would allow the board to be reconstituted. That would then allow political nominations to be made under the d'Hondt formula, which would give Sinn Fein the opportunity to recommend members.

The other area of controversy, for similar reasons, is the eligibility of ex-prisoners and those convicted and given a custodial sentence, whether suspended or not. Again, I understand that the Government do not feel that the conditions are right to include any changes to the eligibility criteria until and unless further conclusive acts of completion by paramilitaries are carried out to the satisfaction of those involved. While there is a chance that paramilitaries might resume diplomacy down a gun barrel, it is inconceivable that those with related sentences of imprisonment could be allowed to sit inside the criminal justice system. Equally, however, it would be wrong to rule out that possibility for those who have turned their back on their past ways and who may genuinely want to be involved in ensuring the future successful implementation of policing in Northern Ireland.

I understand that the Government have undertaken to review that in the light of a commitment by paramilitaries to acts of completion. That is to be welcomed, although I find it inconceivable that that commitment will be made at this time. The additional texts put in place three safeguards—the triple lock. Any individual who wishes to be considered must agree to a declaration of non-violence and must accept a quarantine of five years before undergoing a separate commencement order subject to an affirmative resolution. That will bring independent members in line with political members. It does not suggest that we ignore past misdemeanours. We would have to recognise, however, individuals who have made it clear that they intend to play a full part in a democratic society. As I said, the idea of turning over a new leaf does not do justice to the transformation that such people would have to make. Such an approach gives hope to those who would renounce violence in any civil society, as we have seen across the world, and who would adopt instead legitimate means of representation.

Above and beyond that, clear criteria are laid out. They include a demonstrable interest in the local community, such as community safety or policing issues, and the requirement that a person must be a resident of, or have a close connection with, a council area. Those have to be satisfied. They are the guiding criteria beyond the triple lock and other considerations. All that is conditional, however. As the Prime Minister stated last year, the phrase "acts of completion"

"does not merely mean a statement or a declaration of words, it does mean giving up violence completely and totally, in a way that gives everyone satisfaction and confidence that the IRA has ceased its campaign, so that we can move forward with democratic process, with every party that wants to be in government abiding by the same rules."

It is not difficult to understand that message. It is not ambiguous or opaque, but clear and direct—disarm, give up violence, sign up to democratic and peaceful means exclusively. You can join the club, but those are the rules, which are set by politicians who believe in democratic debate. "Can you sign up to those rules?" is the message that we must put out beyond the Chamber.

That message has been clear and explicit ever since the Prime Minister's Belfast harbour speech, when he stated that republicans must "make the commitment to exclusively peaceful means real, total and permanent."

If that can be achieved and if the rules are signed up to, we can, as the Prime Minister said,

"implement the rest of the Agreement, including on normalisation, in its entirety and not in stages but together."

In the Bill and the additional text, we are waiting to see if those rules are acceptable to those who are not yet completely weaned off dependency on the threat of violence. How much do they want to join the democratic club? Do they recognise that the majority of people in Northern Ireland subscribe to those rules, and do not want a return to the old ways? Do they recognise the desire of many in the House and outside to see them fully on board and fully engaged with the rules set by rational society? When they are so engaged, they will have too much to lose to let go. I hope that they will engage, because it is in everyone's interest to move forward and regain the momentum on long-term peace and prosperity that has temporarily stalled.

Lady Hermon: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. Gentleman because I was following his speech closely. He will remember that the IRA issued a statement on 6 May 2000 in which it promised the people of Northern Ireland and the people of Ireland that it would put weapons permanently and verifiably beyond use to maximise public confidence. It lied to the people of Northern Ireland then, so why we should we believe it this time when it says that acts of completion have been completed?

Huw Irranca-Davies: That is a hugely valid point, as that sort of incident destroys confidence in the whole peace process. I am therefore categoric in saying that we must seek clear assurances on complete disarmament, the destruction of weapons and taking the gun out of the hand—there can be no grey areas. I began my contribution by saying that, in the politics of Northern Ireland, I was struck by the extremes of opinion on both sides. However, this is one issue where things do have to be black and white—we must have that assurance. I want representatives of Sinn Fein and every other group who have made that commitment to serve on the boards—that is their duty as representatives of all the communities in Northern Ireland. However, the hon. Lady's point is extremely valid.

I have relatives, not in the north of Ireland, but in the south or Eire. I recall a conversation with my relatives in Dublin when the peace process was starting many years ago. They told me, "You are too optimistic about what you see from across the water in south Wales. You see the problem in far too simple terms. It is not going to happen because our troubles are too embedded. The factions in our society are too deep-rooted, and the problems run through generations." However, I think that both we in the House and the people of Northern Ireland are proving them wrong. We must have confidence in the peace process and paramilitaries must put their weapons beyond use. With the right assurances, I believe that the Bill is another step forward in that process. I appreciate the concerns that have been expressed, but we have a duty to move that process forward a little bit more.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim): We listened with great interest and care to the hon. Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies). We welcome his first visit to Northern Ireland and appreciate the things on which he picked up. However, let me tell him that we who sit in Parliament do not speak for people from afar—we go down into the ring. He met people over a pint—he can be sure that I would not drink such a thing at all—and they told him all those things, but they are not elected, are not sitting in the Chamber and do not carry the burden in the heat of the day. They do not know what it is to have their homes bombed, their friends maimed or their families attacked.

Huw Irranca-Davies: I bow to the hon. Gentleman's great experience and the fact that he represents the very communities that we are talking about. However, in case I was not clear, I sat down and talked with people in those communities—not people back in south Wales—who told me what was going on.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind all hon. Members that we are discussing the Police (Northern Ireland) Bill.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I was simply commenting on a speech that you did not rule out of order, Madam Deputy Speaker; I therefore thought that I was in order.

Some of us have to go down into the fight, and have to fight for our votes. When we are returned, we speak with a mandate. I have the largest Unionist mandate of anybody in Northern Ireland, and am not being boastful when I say that I have been elected at the top of the poll five times for Europe. However, the hon. Member for Ogmore has not analysed the character or motivation of Irish nationalism and Irish republicanism. I shall provide a simple illustration. There was a terrible bombing in an Orange hall at Tullyallen on the Armagh border, in which men were murdered. I went down to see families in the neighbourhood who were connected to the church that I belong to. I asked a lady who had lost her husband, "Do you have any idea, dear, who did that?" She said, "Yes, the man who did it is sitting in there, at the top of my husband's coffin. He is weeping and calling him by his Christian name, saying, 'Who would do that to my friend?'" When the net started to close around the murderers, that man left everything and skipped the country, because he was a guilty man, never to return.

That does not change overnight. We are asking tonight not for words but deeds. The IRA must disband and shut down its murder operation. It must say goodbye to that, and its weaponry, stained with the blood of our kith and kin and of its Roman Catholic colleagues and neighbours, must be put to the fire. That is the issue—the House would be foolish to think that one representative standing up and telling us that the war is over will end anything, because it will not. The hon. Member for Ogmore said we should have trust, but he knows perfectly well that the party that I represent is not enamoured with the Bill, the Policing Board or the way in which it has worked. We had no part in it—more than that, we opposed it. The hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) had much to tell us, but our attitude was entirely different in that debate.

However, the Policing Board came into existence, and because we had the numbers, we were told that we could have places on the board. I went to see the then Secretary of State, one back from the present one. I said to him, "Can you give me a promise that if I move on this and put two men on to the Policing Board, you will not use that as a lever to try and get the IRA on the Policing Board?" He replied, "Certainly not. What's more," he said, "if you don't join up on that day"—he pointed to a date in the calendar—"you'll not be in until there is an election, and then the matter will be reviewed." I asked, "Are you telling me what you are telling the IRA: that if they don't come in now, they will not be in until there is an election?" He said, "Yes." I said, "I'd like to believe you," but I did not believe him.

We were hardly into the Policing Board before agitation started to get the IRA on to the board. The police chief has been a propagandist. He wants the IRA on the board. How can I have any confidence in those who say that they will keep the IRA out of the Policing Board? The IRA could have been on the board. Let us not forget that. Some hon. Members seem to think that IRA members were shut out of the board. They shut themselves out of the board. I must be fair: the police chief would not have had members of my party on the board, and I think some of the Unionist members would not have been on the board, either.

We must face the facts, and we do not believe what the Government are saying. We have heard it all before; they have said it all before. The last statement from the hon. Member for Ogmore about what he was asking sounded to me like a planted statement—exactly what the Government would like to respond to. I have sat in the House for more than 30 years. There is nothing green about me. I will listen with great interest to what the Minister says on the matter. I have made my own comment.

In Northern Ireland, we have serious trouble. There is deterioration. I was amazed to hear a former Secretary of State tell us that things were moving and so on. I have only to switch on my radio at 6.30 am and listen to the first news: muggings, murders, elderly women raped, homes ravaged—a catalogue of darkness, every morning. My hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds) knows all about it, because it happens in his area. He sits up half the night taking calls, then takes out his car, goes to the affected area and tries to instil confidence in people who have lost confidence.

What we need is not a fancy Bill, cobbled together to get murderers into position on policing boards. We need real policing in Northern Ireland—policing that will shut up and shut off the people who are doing those things and gaining strength. The amazing thing is that we have, sitting unemployed, a body of men who are fully skilled and fully trained and know all about such matters. They could be called in at a moment's notice and brought back for the current emergency, but because of the 50:50 principle in the Bill they will not be called back and they will not be brought in to do a job that they could do in the present situation. So the bombings, burnings and murders will go on and the situation will deteriorate. Of course, the IRA wants that to happen, because it is only from a state of mayhem that it will get the concessions that it seeks.

On the 50:50 principle, let me say to the hon. Member for Ogmore and the rest of the House that it is not right to make a concession to anybody when that concession is wrong. The 50:50 principle is wrong. It is wrong in European law, it is wrong in moral law, and it is illegal under our own laws. People are told, "Oh, you'll be recruited this time, because it's 50:50." Some of them go away angry because they are not recruited, but the reason they are not recruited is not that they are Roman Catholics, but that they do not come up to the required standards. They are not accepted because they do not have the necessary qualifications. Slowly, however, the standards are coming down.

The general public do not know that the new recruits are allowed to do some things and not allowed to do others. A new recruit in the RUC is not allowed to fire a baton round for a long period, until he is passed to do so. I mentioned in the House this afternoon the excessive expenditure on the ombudsman's inquiries. At present the police have to report to the ombudsman on every occasion a baton round is discharged. That results in an inquiry by her office and a full printed report. Even when the baton round was fired without complaint, it is investigated and reported. The cost of such investigations is £2,000 per baton round fired. That is the situation in Northern Ireland.

An investigator is employed at £13 per hour, and a senior investigator at £41 per hour. To date the reports have simply recorded that the rounds were fired as a necessary part of policing, yet the cost of the investigations is excessive. In the past nine months, the police ombudsman has spent £3.5 million on such investigations and reports, with an average complaint and report costing more than £1,000.

There is mayhem, murder and burnings on the streets. Old people cannot go out at night. There is no peace. I say to the House that our first duty is to give the people the right to live. They cannot live under the present circumstances. That is why the people of Northern Ireland have had enough, and why public representatives in the House must take a tough line on the issue. There can be no compromise. Those who commit the acts that I have mentioned must be made to obey the law. If they will not obey the law, they must be imprisoned.

The Government must be firm. The courts must impose much stiffer sentences. The court system needs to be tightened up and should be a real threat to lawbreakers. We need to devise a new anti-terror law that will bring all agencies together in one common battle to defeat terrorism. We need to postpone the fourth year of the Patten severance policy. We need to offer immediate contracts to former RUC officers to fill the gaps that now exist, but cannot be filled. There is no way in which they can be filled. The police thought that they could bring policemen from over here, but they cannot do so, so we have a serious problem. We must upgrade.

Various Governments have treated the full-time reserves abominably. The reserves have been insulted. They comprise men who gave up their jobs and entered the full-time reserve without proper security for the future, and they have now been dumped simply because they IRA did not like the fact that they were RUC men. Sinn Fein, which did not like the RUC, does not like the present Policing Board. It is issuing the same attacks on the Policing Board as it issued against the RUC in its literature. I come from a constituency where terrorists tried to kill a young Roman Catholic who had been recruited, and his father and mother. The policy is the same. What is more, this House should be aware that the IRA has been feeding into every firm in Northern Ireland a piece of literature saying "Treat ex-RUC men the way we always treated them." That is official. It is in the paper. Would Members believe that, after a man has circulated that at a place of employment, people can get up and say "It's all over"? We believe that such men are liars and murderers. What do they care about the truth? They know nothing about it.

Political policing needs to stop. We have political policing in Northern Ireland. When somebody joins, they are asked "Are you a Protestant or a Roman Catholic?" After they have passed the test, whether or not they are a decent fellow, they are told "We're very sorry, but you're not going to be a policeman here because you don't go to the right church." That is what happens and it is wrong. If that happened on the other side of the fence and Protestants were doing that, we would be hounded. We are told that we must make concessions. To whom are we making concessions? We are doing so to men who have devised the greatest system of terrorism in the world. We are seeing in Colombia their ability to teach others to repeat the same acts.

It is all coming out in the wash, but why do the Government want to put these men into office in Northern Ireland, when at an international level they want us to hound them? It is about time that the Government started to hound these men, no matter what side they come from. I have had my bedroom windows smashed with bullets from so-called loyalists. My wife, a local councillor, has been attacked by them. I know all about them. We have only to read the literature that these men circulate—I am talking about so-called loyalist gunmen—about me to know that they look on me as danger man No. 1. I have been through all that. When my son was at Queen's university, the nuts of his car wheels were screwed off to the last thread. When he came out and started to drive, if one of those wheels had come off, he would probably have been killed and the car would have been wrecked. I have been through all that and I want to say that better men than me have died in this battle. I am here tonight to say to the House and plead with it: let us get the job of real policing done.

Huw Irranca-Davies: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way. He speaks with great passion, but does he agree that the best way to move forward is not to attack the institutions, which I think are being established in the right way and with the right structures, even though there is much comment about them, but to insist that civic leaders of all political persuasions should rally behind them and encourage people to get involved and behave responsibly towards them?

Rev. Ian Paisley: That is a beautiful thing to say in the House of Commons, but we do not have democratic institutions in Northern Ireland. This House, in its wisdom, destroyed democracy. Votes do not count. The people on Shankill road do not get any counts. It is hard-working councillors such as my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, North and others who get the vote, but they are taken by the hand of the Government. What did the former Secretary of State say about Adair? She said that he was an unsung hero of the peace process. That is what we are up against.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I again ask the hon. Gentleman to bring his comments back to the Bill. I understand the background, but I think that we must now concentrate on the Bill itself.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Your colleague led me astray, Madam Deputy Speaker. He will have to be blamed for the sin that he has committed, but I understand your guidance. I am glad to continue, as I need to deal with some matters of utmost importance, but the principles must be established. The principles of good policing are that it is legal and morally correct, and can stand up and face scrutiny.

We have heard about the office of ombudsman. Of course, the ombudsman is currently a woman. When she was appointed, I stood on my feet in this House and called attention to her political relationship—her husband is an active member of the SDLP and I believe that he is to stand as a candidate for election as a Member of the Legislative Assembly at the next election. He is also a serving councillor on Ballymena council. If any Government had given to the wife of an official Unionist the office of ombudsman, Labour Members would have been shouting out and crying aloud about what a terrible thing had been done. If the Government had dreamed of giving the appointment to a Democratic Unionist, all hell would have been let loose on the Labour Benches. Of course, we are not on the quangos. They do not allow us to join any quangos. We are lepers. This Government keep us off everything, but the day will come when the people will have something to say. It is perhaps going to come more quickly than they think. All that I am saying is that the ombudsman's office needs to be made democratic.

[Rev. Ian Paisley]

I do not believe that policemen who have served and retired should have their past dug up by an ombudsman who has the power to investigate all back-cases. A line must drawn in the sand to say "So far and no further." If such investigation starts, what will happen? Every other policeman in the force will be demoralised. That is what is happening. There was supposed to be somebody to oversee the ombudsman's office, but where is that legislation? The Government are not rushing that through the House. Of course, the IRA would not give any concessions if they did so. I am saying that we should have an independent inquiry into the ombudsman's office. After all, the Policing Board wanted her to investigate certain things and she was reticent about doing so. It was only after the board met again that she was prepared to do those things. We know what happened at the debacle in Omagh. These people in Omagh are not DUP supporters; many of them are SDLP supporters.

Let me say to the House tonight that it needs to open its eyes to many things in the Bill. They have not all been discussed, and we could go on all night dealing with this matter. I trust that the House will come to the point at which it is prepared to grasp the nettle. On Wednesday, the two Prime Ministers will be in Belfast. One leader—me—will not be invited, not even to meet them outside the talks to put my case. That means that the majority of Unionists who think like me will not be heard. I say to the House and to the Government: "Ignore these people at your peril, because they are the heart, and out of the heartland came your police, your Army and the people who were faithful on the day when faithfulness cost." I say to the Government: "Have sense, make no more concessions, start doing the job of proper policing and people will rally to you. The Roman Catholic population will rally to you." Some of the Roman Catholic population live in desperate peril because they are under the threat of the gunman, but the police cannot help them. They cannot call a policeman because he cannot go to help them. The Roman Catholic population knows what I am saying, and feels the same way. Let us have proper policing; when we have it, we will not need to argue about some of the things that we have had to argue about tonight, because they will not even be thought of.

8.30 pm

Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East): May I start by apologising for missing some of the debate? I had to go to see some constituents. Some hon. Members will know my background and that I grew up in Northern Ireland. One of my earliest memories as a very young child was pointing out that our neighbour was a police inspector. The lecture that I got from my father still resounds with me, because I had also pointed out that this police inspector was a Catholic. As a five-year-old, I did not know what I was saying, but I had said it in the wrong place. That was pre-troubles, but the lecture that I got still resounds in my memory. I therefore enter this debate with some trepidation.

I try not to speak on Northern Ireland matters, because I get quite angry listening to the selective arguments justifying past actions or inactions, rehashing old positions that do not relate to the debate, fighting old battles or erecting new barriers to progress. I hear what the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) has said—I have heard what he has said all my life—but some of the issues that he raised made me quite angry, so I shall not respond to them. I would say to my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies) that I do not share his optimism; I do not think that he recognises certain aspects of the Ulster psyche. That is an issue to which we need to return in the Bill.

Some of the things that have been said in previous debates about what is to happen to the Policing Board have not proved to be correct. We must also treat the siren voices with caution when approaching this Bill. They will not be proved correct, and we need to concentrate on that fact. We also need to address the fundamental question of how to bring people in from the cold. How do we persuade ex-terrorists to uphold the law? The way in which the Government are approaching that question is absolutely right.

It was stated earlier that the policing of Northern Ireland was political. Policing has always been political there, from the earliest days of the creation of the state. One of the things that worries me is that some people regard no change as acceptable. If such people are going to erect barriers, perhaps the time has come to hold a referendum on Northern Ireland in the mainland of the United Kingdom, to see whether the people here still want the obstructions from the Ulster Unionists, whether they think that the continued investment in Northern Ireland is right, and whether they want to hear the kind of comments that are being made.

Some of us have argued for a much more radical policy than the one that the Government are proposing, but I have long recognised that we cannot move faster than people are prepared to move. The Government's approach is about taking people with them—

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): What would you know about it?

Brian White: I actually grew up in Belfast. The hon. Gentleman may not appreciate that.

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford): And you left.

Brian White: I left when I was 18, at the height of the troubles, but the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) must recognise that the kind of comments that members of his party make were one of the reasons why I left. There was no hope coming from that quarter. It is important, if we are to have hope for Northern Ireland, that we should move forward. I reject the siren voices that are coming from the Democratic Unionist party.

Much of the Bill is uncontroversial: the Select Committee on Northern Ireland Affairs has said as much. However, as others have said, we should move forward inch by inch—for example, on issues such as the Policing Board. This debate has reminded me of the arguments over whether the Metropolitan police should have a police authority. People said, "You can't have that," but when the authority was created, all the arguments disappeared. Many of the arguments that we have heard tonight have been hot air; they will be seen to have been unjustified when the changes arrive.

Earlier today, I thought that the Father of the House was going to be removed from the Chamber because he was talking about the middle east. He rightly emphasised what can happen, in that serious conflict, when dialogue breaks down. We have to remember what has happened in Northern Ireland when talking has stopped. There are other routes that can be taken, and we must be aware of that.

There is a provision in the Bill about which I am concerned. One of the suggested changes is that, instead of the board's objectives being consistent with the Secretary of State's objectives, it should have regard to them. If we consider other legislation—where, for example, independent regulators have to have regard to Government policy, as opposed to being consistent with Government policy—we find that Government policy is actually undermined. I am concerned that the suggested change will have that effect. I hope that the Minister can assure me that that will not happen.

There are those of us who support the Government and who feel that the way in which to make progress in Northern Ireland is through dialogue. We have to try to achieve consensus. We should not listen to siren voices that argue for backwardness and for not making any changes. If we listened to those voices, there would be no peace process.

The SDLP has taken a lot of stick in this debate. However, the party has been courageous in saying that Catholics ought to join the Police Service of Northern Ireland. It should be given credit for that. Unlike Sinn Fein, it has said that it wants the institutions to work. We should respond to that, and not vilify the SDLP as some have tried to do. Much of today's debate has not been about the Bill; it has been about rehashing old arguments.

We have to ensure that the tests on Sinn Fein are of the highest order so as to ensure that the party is committed to the process. If it is not—and it will soon become clear whether it is or not—the Government will have to say that they will not make the proposed changes. The Bill as it stands is the right way to go, developing consensus. This unstable world contains examples of what could happen if we get this wrong. The Bill is another step in the peace process and we ought to support it. We have to make the arguments for change and, if Northern Ireland is to have a future, we have to reject the kind of voices that I have heard all my life. One of the reasons why I do not often contribute to debates on Northern Ireland is that I get angry with some of the comments that are made, and I try not to get angry during debates.

I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to ensure that this Bill goes forward but also to ensure that any changes have the support of the majority in both communities. The SDLP is arguing strongly for people to join the police service and to make the institutions work. That ought to be supported.

David Burnside (South Antrim): Following the previous speaker, I will try to be an optimistic voice on behalf of my constituents. Most of the people in Northern Ireland are happy living in Northern Ireland. We like living there. It is not all depression and bad news. A lot of good things are happening in the Province and there is a lot of optimism. However, we have to be realistic as well as optimistic. I will be opposing the changes and I will do so on principle.

Not many Conservatives are present for this debate—in fact, there are not many Conservatives in the House—but I have an old-fashioned attitude to institutions that are working and that should not change, and they include this House, this Parliament and the Royal Ulster Constabulary. We had a very fine police force called the Royal Ulster Constabulary. Its record against terrorism and crime was unrivalled throughout the world. Even if we take terrorist-defined crime out of the equation, it had the best detection rates of any force in the UK. It had high morale, gained respect and received co-operation from the community—both Protestant and Catholic. That force was treated disgracefully by the Patten report, which is one of the weakest parts of the peace process. It has disillusioned the Unionist community more than any other aspect of the peace process.

If I am re-elected to this place the next time or the time after that, I shall look forward to the elective dictatorship here being more finely balanced. I look forward to a few more Conservatives and a few more Ulster Unionists being here. [HON. MEMBERS: "And a few more from the DUP."] A few more Ulster Unionists within the united Unionist family. I envisage the circumstances in which we could negotiate the legal incorporation to which my hon. Friend the Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) referred. She was right when she mentioned a document in the Library referring to the incorporation of the name of the RUC, but she went to a memorial service at St. Anne's in Belfast for the old RUC. There is no visibility, and that is wrong. Perhaps the problem can be fixed, but the RUC should not have been treated in the way that it was.

Policing concessions are being made and suggested tonight and, as part of the political process, they are being negotiated behind the scenes with the SDLP and Sinn Fein in the nationalist-republican camp further to weaken policing in Northern Ireland. Deals are being done and discussions are taking place. A form of front organisation will appear at Hillsborough later this week, but the deals are being done. I do not want to be pessimistic, but the Government must understand that Unionist Members are not bluffing. We are not bluffing when we say, "If you make further concessions way beyond the Good Friday agreement, such as putting terrorists on to the district policing partnerships"—there is a different position with the Policing Board—"I, as Ulster Unionist Member of Parliament, will refer back to the decision taken by the Ulster Unionist Council before Christmas. We will not be on the Policing Board."

The Government will remove the police authority and replace it with the Policing Board. They will bring terrorists in who will present operational problems to the police's divisional commanders. That will make policing on the ground worse and it will not deal with the threat of crime in Northern Ireland. Whether it is the mafia, the drug dealing and the violence or whether we call it terrorist or criminal activity, I cannot see a difference. Such activities are all intertwined and they are all one. Such activities are committed by both republicans and loyalists.

The Government are weakening policing and they are doing so as the result of political concessions in a political process. Ulster Unionists and Democratic Unionists will not sit in an Executive with Sinn Fein because of its hypocrisy and because of what went on in Colombia, Castlereagh and Stormontgate. If we will not sit in the Executive with Sinn Fein, we will not sit on a Policing Board with its members. Sinn Fein is not a legitimate normal political party. It has not gone through the transition.

I look forward with optimism, because I believe that people can change. I hope that those who have been involved in violence in Northern Ireland—whether they are republican or loyalist—can have a future as well as a past. However, the evidence is that that will not happen in the foreseeable future. Sinn Fein-IRA is playing a double game. The Government may think that these and further concessions on policing will help, but they are weakening policing in Northern Ireland and that will not produce a stable political process that has the consent of the Unionist and nationalist peoples. The Government are getting it badly wrong by misjudging the mood of the Unionist people. They will see that reflected if and when there is an election on 1 May.

I hope that the Government will listen to us, because I am not trying to be pessimistic, but realistic. We are saying to them, "Your legislation is not improving policing in Northern Ireland, and you have done enough harm already." Let us try to restore the morale that existed in the old RUC. Let us try to build up community policing and to get the support of the majority of the Protestant and Catholic population who always supported the RUC. Let us regain and rebuild the morale that existed in a fine force that was decimated and treated disgracefully by this Government.

8.45 pm

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West): In supporting the Bill, I share the humility that was demonstrated by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael), as I am conscious that my involvement in and association with the issues surrounding Northern Ireland are very slight in comparison with many hon. Members who contributed to the debate. Since my involvement with the Select Committee on Northern Ireland Affairs, however, I have developed a perspective that I should like to convey.

The proposals outlined in the Bill are hardly the most dramatic—by and large, they are refinements of existing legislation—but given the passion expressed by some hon. Members about even its seemingly arcane and detailed aspects, I cannot accept the view of the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) that the way to deal with the Northern Ireland situation is to take a multi-party and big banner approach to resolving all the issues involved in policing in one omnibus piece of legislation. It is obvious that the passions generated and the depth of feeling that arises as a result of even the smallest change to the existing position in Northern Ireland are such as to make that approach completely impossible. The way forward is the incremental approach that the Government have adopted in changing legislation as and when circumstances change.

The hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) suggested an apocalyptic outcome for the approach that we have adopted, but I want to contrast what I saw when I first went to Northern Ireland in 1972 with the situation in Belfast now. That clearly demonstrates the benefits that have accrued from the Government's approach. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State talked about the changes that have taken place in Belfast since 1994. I went to Belfast in 1972, when I was relatively young. One in three or one in four buildings had been bombed out, the city was saturated with members of the armed forces, and pervasive tension existed everywhere. It was a frightening experience that I will never forget. I contrast that with my first visit as a member of the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee in 2001, when I saw a city that seemed relaxed, self confident and prosperous—a total transformation from the vision that I had carried around with me for 30 years. It is sad that many who have not visited Belfast have the 1972 rather than the current vision of that city. Apocalyptic pronouncements reinforce that impression.

Every change to effect the transformation happened only because people were prepared to act in good faith, take things on trust, and swallow reservations, and deeply held feelings and prejudices that were based on legitimate personal experience. They did that because the opportunities gave Belfast a future.

The Patten report recognised that for change to accelerate in Northern Ireland, it was necessary to have a police force that was trusted and represented all communities. When I first read the profound changes that Patten proposed, I felt a frisson of foreboding that they would never work. I feared that the prevailing culture in Northern Ireland meant that the changes would not be accepted. However, my foreboding was unjustified. The Policing Board exists. People said that it would not work and that no members of the Catholic community would participate. They are participating and the body is working.

The comments that have been made today about the Policing Board's performance are reassuring. The changes are a testimony to its commitment, ability and inspiration of trust. They would have been unimaginable 10 years ago. As well as the cross-community Policing Board, we have a new name, new badge, new chief officer, new ethical policy, a new commitment to community policing and enhanced recruitment from all sections of society.

No other organisation has undergone such profound changes in such a short time. That is a credit to those in the former RUC who have accepted and worked through the changes, whatever the extent of their initial instinctive resentment of them. It is also a credit to the moderate, nationalist community and the SDLP, which supported the changes, and the courageous young Catholics who joined the Northern Ireland police force in spite of the evident intimidation from some dissident republican forces.

Lady Hermon: If everything in the Police Service is as rosy as the hon. Gentleman paints it, why did the Secretary of State's predecessor speak at length in Liverpool university about Northern Ireland becoming a cold house for Protestants?

Mr. Bailey: I do not claim that everything is rosy. I pay tribute to those in the police force for effecting an enormous number of changes in a short time. In those circumstances, it would be remarkable if everything were rosy.

Rev. Martin Smyth: The hon. Gentleman referred to objections from dissidents. Did he realise that a former Minister of Education in the Northern Ireland Assembly had lobbied in Washington for another investigation into the Police Service of Northern Ireland and British policing in Northern Ireland? Did he know that this morning, the Sinn Fein Member of the Legislative Assembly for West Tyrone castigated the police, who were called out in the early hours of Sunday morning to deal with a riot in Omagh? The police rather than the rioters were being blamed for the riot.

Mr. Bailey: I may not have been aware of those details, but they can only substantiate my basic point that elements of the Catholic and nationalist community are trying to intimidate those who want to make this police force work.

During one of the Committee's visits to Belfast, we had an opportunity to observe recruits in action and training. We had already had an opportunity to interview the Chief Constable, who spoke of the superb quality of the new influx of recruits. After watching them train, we spoke to them individually to try to gain an insight into their personal experience of the process they were undergoing. One could not but be impressed by their enthusiasm and dedication, which in time, no doubt, will be translated into professionalism.

Mr. John Taylor (Solihull): I note the hon. Gentleman's approval of the quality of those young persons. Should we not be equipping them with a new police training college? Is that not one of the most important things we should be doing? The existing staff and personnel are marvellous, the existing cadets are marvellous, but the building is not up to scratch.

Mr. Bailey: I agree. Let me issue a plea to the Minister, however. The one complaint that I heard from the recruits was that the distribution of the new uniforms was somewhat arbitrary, and not very prompt. It strikes me that an easy win could be secured by at least ensuring that the uniforms were provided as soon as possible. That may not be the most profound issue affecting Northern Ireland at the moment, but I hope it will be noted. Once we have sorted it out, perhaps we can think about the new training college.

Much has been said today about the 50:50 issue. The hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) made some logical and passionate observations; her beliefs are obviously deeply held. I recognise that there are matters of concern, but the evidence so far suggests that the system has led to an increase in the number of Catholic recruits.

I think that this commitment is important for more than one reason. It is, for instance, symbolic of the Government's commitment to ending what I accept may have been a perceived imbalance, and perceived cultural problems, experienced by Catholics with the former RUC. Above all, however, I believe that this public commitment and the improved recruitment that has arisen from it undermine Sinn Fein's approach, which, as we know, involves trying to convey to the nationalist community that the RUC has not changed. For that reason alone, I think it is important to retain the policy at least for the time being.

I think it was the hon. Member for Lagan Valley who spoke of "civilianisation". I know that civilianisation has the potential to release more people for front-line policing. He said that that had been a slow process. My understanding is that since effectively it has been farmed out to a private organisation it has improved considerably. Obviously we need to review the progress that is made, because potentially it is a very important way of releasing people for front-line policing.

The overwhelming message that I received when I was over there was that the main obstacle to recruitment was the Sinn Fein objection and the intimidation arising in part from the position it had adopted.

I accept the comment of the hon. Member for North Down that the issue has to be dealt with in the long term if we are to achieve a Northern Ireland police force that is more evenly balanced between the two communities. I see the various matters incorporated into the text for consideration as perhaps an attempt to initiate a debate that may enable us to resolve some of these issues in the long term.

Before talking about the text for consideration, I should like to mention the district policing partnerships. There was concern about the appointment of independent members, which comes under clause 13, and it was recognised that in some areas there would be councils that would result in DPPs being monolithically representative of one community. These points were put to my hon. Friend the Minister and she made it quite clear that she saw the appointment of independent members as a way of balancing the situation, ensuring that there was legitimate representation of all sections within a particular community.

I shall not go through the code of practice and the requirements that my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) read out. I was sufficiently reassured on that matter to think that the fears that had been raised would not be realised.

I should like to speak for a few minutes about the text for consideration. I recognise that this is a hugely sensitive issue, but I would first commend the Government for at least putting this in such a way that it is there for open, honest, transparent debate. I have heard a great deal this evening about deals done behind closed doors and so on, but here we have an issue put before the House that gives hon. Members an opportunity to talk about it, Express their fears and make their points long before there is any chance of its becoming legislation.

It is anomalous that a councillor with a prison record, but not someone who is appointed as an independent member, can after five years be acceptable as a member of a DPP. I acknowledge that there are deep concerns that former terrorists could be appointed and undermine the independence and work of the police in certain areas, but the commitment given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, that this could not happen until after a verifiable completion, should be sufficient to satisfy people that this is not an immediate likelihood. At the same time, it should be debated.

[Mr. Bailey]

What concerns me is that I feel that there are hon. Members who will never wish the issue to be debated, however much the political scene in Northern Ireland changes. I understand the feelings of those who have argued that we should not talk to terrorists, that we should never do a deal. The thought of dealing with people who have a record of murder, violence and so on is unpleasant; it is anathema. But that simply freezes the status quo. We must at some stage have some sort of dialogue that at least gives them an opportunity to play a part in normal, mainstream, civilised society. Otherwise, nothing will change.

Lady Hermon: I am very grateful to the hon. Gentleman for taking a second intervention. Can he point to a single recommendation in the Patten report that suggests that those with criminal and terrorist convictions should become independent members of district policing partnerships?

Mr. Bailey: I do not think that there is one. What we are talking about is the Weston Park discussions and the possibility that things may change at some point in the future, whereby this could become a legitimate issue for consideration. At the moment the time is not right, and the depth of feeling here today has been clearly demonstrated. Such a development would result in the Unionist community's withdrawal from the process, which is clearly not acceptable. However, we cannot rule out the possibility of change in the future, and I therefore think it right that it be included and discussed. However, we must also recognise that this particular way forward is simply not available at the moment, and that a profound change on the part of the IRA and Sinn Fein is required before it becomes so.

I support the Bill, which moves forward community policing by a further few inches. It offers an opportunity to debate the difficult issues surrounding the text for consideration, and above all, it puts further pressure on Sinn Fein to demonstrate that at some time in the near future, it will commit itself to a democratic process in Northern Ireland, and thereby dramatically change the way that people in that area live their lives.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): I approach this debate not as someone who has formed his opinions after an afternoon visit to Northern Ireland and a pint in the local pub, nor as someone who ran away from Northern Ireland in his teens, but as someone who has lived in that community, who has grieved with that community, who has felt the pain of that community, and who recognises that some of the most valuable contributions made in Northern Ireland in past decades have been made by those who served in the Royal Ulster Constabulary, and who now serve in the Police Service of Northern Ireland.

I do not share the view, put forward by the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon), that the Patten report should be treated as if it were holy writ, and that everything that happens in policing in Northern Ireland should be judged by those standards, as if they were something to be admired and attained. The Patten report was a disaster for policing in Northern Ireland, but it was her party leader and her colleagues who were responsible for that contribution. It was the remit set to Patten in the Belfast agreement that led to the destruction of the Royal Ulster Constabulary.

Lady Hermon rose—

Mr. Robinson: I shall certainly give way to the hon. Lady, if she wants to try.

Lady Hermon: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. Since the Patten report is anathema to his party, can he explain why his colleagues have no hesitation in taking their places on the Policing Board, which, of course, was the creation of the Patten report?

Mr. Robinson: I am not sure whether I should get into arguments that I might think justified in answering in a primary school, but which would perhaps be a waste of time in this honourable House. I would have thought it fairly obvious that, just because Democratic Unionists do not get their way, we do not walk off and say that we are not playing. We have to work within the institutions that are there, while we seek to change them. We are present on the Policing Board, even though we did not like its creation and the surrounding structures, and for exactly the same reason, even though we do not like the Belfast agreement, we are in the Northern Ireland Assembly, convincing people that change is necessary, and doing so very successfully. Perhaps it is our success in that area that concerns the hon. Lady more than anything else.

The Patten report led to much of the destruction of the policing service in Northern Ireland and has been the cause of many of the difficulties that we now face. Not least of those is the issue of 50:50 recruitment, which is again addressed in the Bill. It is a grotesque discrimination against the Protestant community in Northern Ireland that 50 per cent. of those recruited into the police service have to be Roman Catholic, while the other 50 per cent. come from all other denominations and none. Roman Catholic recruitment is favoured, even though that section of the community is a minority in Northern Ireland.

As I have said before, in the House, in the Select Committee and elsewhere, I want to see an increase in recruitment from the Roman Catholic community to the police service. That is desirable and would be good for policing in Northern Ireland. However, it must take place on merit. People must be recruited on the basis that they deserve to be so and have been judged against all others who wish to be recruited. People are being judged suitable to join the police service, but cannot be recruited because there are not enough people from another religion to balance them, and that is clearly unsatisfactory. The merit principle has been downgraded and the police service has not had the numbers it needs to do the job that needs to be done.

Changes are required, but the Government's disdain for the Unionist community is apparent when they introduce a Bill to meet the criteria set down by the SDLP for changes in policing, while having in waiting a further draft Bill that they hope will be satisfactory to Sinn Fein-IRA. At the same time, all the complaints made by Unionists in Northern Ireland about policing are disregarded. The Government make no attempt to address our requirements. I question the strength of the Government's position when they have to pander to two small parties—SDLP and Sinn Fein—and disregard the two larger parties in Northern Ireland. That is not a tenable position.

I have listened to the eloquent comments by some hon. Members who look forward to the day when Sinn Fein can be persuaded to represent their community on the district policing partnerships. Where were those people in all the years when the Government discriminated against my party in its representation on the police authority? I did not hear any of them arguing for our representation, but they are prepared to change laws to allow the representation of a smaller party. It shows something of the state of mind of the Government and their supporters that they are prepared to do many a thing for Sinn Fein that they are not prepared to do for the Unionist community.

The Bill is Patten plus. It goes even beyond the love of the Patten report felt by the hon. Member for North Down. The intent is to woo Sinn Fein into the policing arrangements. However, the Government should be alert to the warning signals in their recent discussions with Sinn Fein-IRA, in which the provisional movement has demanded that policing powers be devolved to Northern Ireland, so that it can have direct control over those powers. The Government should listen carefully before they try to do any deal with Sinn Fein-IRA on that basis. For just one moment, they should imagine how people in Northern Ireland who have suffered from IRA terrorism for decades would feel if we ever saw the day when those same IRA terrorist representatives were in charge of law and order in Northern Ireland. Some law, some order—if the representatives of Sinn Fein-IRA were in charge of policing under devolved responsibility in Northern Ireland. I urge the Government to think twice before going down that road, or they will bring down very hot coals on their head.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) argued that the upgrading and updating of legislation is natural and normal, and that one should expect it. One should consider policing experiences and make changes accordingly. As a general principle, there is a lot of truth in that. The House should indeed be doing that. If experience on the ground suggests that changes are necessary to make policing more effective and efficient, the House should legislate for those changes. But does anybody honestly believe that the Bill, and the Bill in waiting that the Government hope to introduce by way of amendment if they can get Sinn Fein to sign up on time, are being introduced for the purpose of ensuring greater efficiency and effectiveness in Northern Ireland? They will do nothing of the kind.

The Minister of State, the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister are all happy to divulge the public reason for the measure. They say that it meets a commitment that was made at Weston Park. Exactly what went at Weston Park is neither precise nor clear. We know that discussions took place, which included matters covered in the Bill and in the further draft that the Secretary of State made available to us. He has not, however, been prepared to divulge the extent to which those discussions involved all the parties. The extent to which they were agreed by all the parties is certainly disputed. The extent to which other leaders might have acquiesced in some of those matters is not clear.

What is clear is that the purpose of the Bill is to make good commitments that were made to at least one party at Weston Park—the SDLP. Perhaps it also gives part of what was required by Sinn Fein. Let us not have the nonsense, introduced in this debate, that we are gathered here because it has dawned on the Government that the experience on the ground of the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000 demands that these changes be made. Nothing of the sort! A sordid, dirty deal was done at Weston Park. The Government have admitted that they entered into a political deal. That is the truth. The Government can spin things however they want; they can coach their Back Benchers as much as they like to drop in a word about the desirability of the changes, but the reality is that they did a deal to win the Provisional IRA and the SDLP over to the political process.

What problems should the Government have addressed in the Bill? Let them go to Northern Ireland and ask ordinary people about the policing problems that need to be addressed. The Government would be told instantly that people ring the police but they do not come round because no car is available. There are not enough officers on the beat. Resources are so low that the police cannot meet the needs on the ground. People would tell the Government that police stations are being closed at a time when a greater police presence is needed. Those are the issues that need to be addressed. The police need to be made more effective, not to be turned into a political tool to satisfy the SDLP and Sinn Fein.

The hon. Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies) indicated that he is angry and therefore does not attend debates on Northern Ireland Bills because he does not like hearing what Unionists have to say, as it seems to have that effect on him. Well, if that were the basis on which some of us entered the House, we would have to recognise—

Huw Irranca-Davies: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robinson: I will save the hon. Gentleman from intervening. Clearly, he does not want to be associated with the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White). I do not want that to happen, so I should make it clear that I was referring to the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East. I welcome the fact the hon. Gentleman wants to distance himself from the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East.

Clearly, the House has to address the reality that it is about time that Labour Members listened to what Unionist Members are saying about such issues, whether or not it fits in with their own thinking. The elections make it very clear that there is a Unionist majority in Northern Ireland. The census makes it very clear that there will be a Unionist majority in Northern Ireland for a very long time.

Instead of attempting to accommodate small political parties in Northern Ireland, it is about time that the Government listened to the voice of—[Interruption.]

[Mr. Robinson]

The Secretary of State seems to think that I have said something outrageous, but I would challenge Labour Members: if they think that what I am saying is untoward, they might like to stand in elections in Northern Ireland. There is always the possibility that they could go around, trying to recruit, and they could send out the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East to find out how many people he could get to join the Labour party.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind the hon. Gentleman that we are discussing the policing of Northern Ireland?

Mr. Robinson: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for bringing me back to the Bill. I urge the House to recognise the fact that the Bill does not address the issues that need to be addressed. It will further alienate those in the Unionist community in Northern Ireland who want only good, sound policing in Northern Ireland. One of the sad realities of the past few years is that police morale has plummeted because changes have been made for political reasons to the disadvantage of good policing in Northern Ireland. That has happened as a result of the Belfast agreement, the Patten report and the Government's action. There is nothing more hurtful to the Police Service of Northern Ireland than finding out that—after so many years in the front line of the conflict, defending the community in Northern Ireland—it is the terrorists against whom they held the line who are being rewarded and the police who are being punished.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North): I am pleased to have the opportunity to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) in this important debate. I briefly want to make a few comments on the Bill. I suppose that "Here we go again" could be the title of the debate because this is, I think, the third time that the House has discussed legislation on the police in Northern Ireland in a little over four years. That any Government should have to legislate so many times on one issue really does raise some questions.

My hon. Friend has rightly pointed to the reason why this Bill and other legislation have been introduced. The Bill has nothing to do with the necessity to address issues to improve the effectiveness and efficiency of policing; it is a result of the need, in the Government's view, to introduce legislation to implement concessions to the SDLP and Sinn Fein, as part of the political process. That is the reality of why we are debating the Bill, which does not address the real concerns of our constituents in Northern Ireland. It will do nothing to improve the police resources, their effectiveness, their numbers or their morale.

I have to tell the Minister that a pipe bomb was thrown through the front living room window of three elderly pensioners in my constituency last night. The police have told me that that pipe bomb is different from those that have been discovered previously—it is more powerful. Had those people been in their living room at the time, they would have undoubtedly suffered serious injury if not death. Their living room has been wrecked. To hear some Members in this Chamber tonight, however, one would think that everything was sweetness and light in Northern Ireland.

We can add to that incident the rioting on the Limestone road in my constituency in recent days, and the dreadful and despicable events on the Shankill road and in other parts of my constituency and the constituencies of other hon. Members. We need only look at the reports of the dreadful rioting in the town of Omagh at the weekend, to which the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) referred. A Sinn Fein spokesman and a representative for that area—not a dissident spokesman, by the way, but a spokesman for the Provisional Sinn Fein movement, part of the Government of Northern Ireland—attacked the police. The police suffered 18 injuries in Omagh, and this man—Mr. McElduff, who is the MLA for the area—criticised the police, not those who were involved in the rioting. When we see those kinds of events—the number of shootings and bombings in the three years since the Belfast agreement was signed have increased in relation to the three years before the agreement—we must ask serious questions about the direction of Government policy.

It is clear that changes and legislation have been introduced as a result of Patten, which was designed to appease the SDLP and Sinn Fein. More changes have been introduced as a result of agreements entered into at the Weston Park talks, which, again, were to appease one section of the community. What kind of message does that send out to the ordinary, decent people of Northern Ireland who want effective law and order? When they ring the police station, they do not want to be told that there are not enough police vehicles to provide them with security and to answer their needs. The Government, however, only seem to be interested in legislating on political grounds and for political reasons.

Lady Hermon: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's unhappiness with the Bill and with the Weston Park talks. Will he outline to the House in what circumstances, if any, Democratic Unionist party members would take seats on the Policing Board with Sinn Fein members?

Mr. Dodds: Given the tenor of the contributions that have come from Ulster Unionist Members in the House tonight, I am amazed at that question. The reality is that Sinn Fein-IRA members are not acceptable on the Policing Board of Northern Ireland. That is the bottom line. In other spheres and in other realms in which terrorism is an issue, we are busy saying that we must hunt down and deal with those responsible. In Northern Ireland, however, an organisation is carrying out and is involved in terrorism as we speak, and as we sit here tonight. It is not something that they have left behind. They are still involved in and running these organisations. They are still racketeering and targeting. In republican areas, the IRA is as active today as it was before in implementing law and order, as it sees it, in terms of its own community. To suggest that somehow, in a week's time, two weeks' time or a month's time, such people will suddenly become acceptable as members who can have some say over policing in Northern Ireland will be at odds with the views of many people whom the hon. Lady represents, and, I hope—on the basis of the contributions that have been made—with the views of her hon. Friends in the Ulster Unionist party.

On the so-called text for consideration—the IRA-Sinn Fein clauses that the Government have waiting in the wings should the appropriate moment arrive—there is great concern in Belfast constituencies at the proposals for the four Belfast boards. They would put the police in a difficult situation, certainly in west Belfast. Serving police officers and senior officers have expressed concern about what that would mean in terms of accountability. They are worried about to whom they would be answerable if the Bill is successful and Sinn Fein-IRA and convicted terrorists and criminals take their places on those boards.

The idea that the Bill will do anything to improve police morale or police effectiveness has to be discounted. That is not the case at all. Police morale is at rock bottom. The Government do not have to take our word for it. If they talk to police officers directly they will tell them about the elevation of the terrorists, the appeasement of Sinn Fein-IRA and the fact that they have been set in positions over policing at a time when the police are starved of resources. Even able candidates who apply cannot get into the police for religious reasons. All of that is unacceptable. The Minister should address those concerns seriously for the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr. John Taylor (Solihull): I broadly agree with the concluding remarks of the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds): much of the problem on the ground relates to police resources and police morale. He put that well and it is not necessary for me to say it again. However, it may be useful for me to tell the House that I shall not detain hon. Members.

I should also explain why I have not been present throughout the debate. I was here at the start and, sure enough, I am here at the end. I do not know whether it is something that we have done to our hours and working arrangements, but for 20 years I have lived with the difficulty of being in two places at once. I now face the more difficult problem of being in three places at once and have not mastered it. It was my duty to be here today, but I also had a summons, with the authority of the House, to attend a Northern Ireland Statutory Instrument Committee of extraordinary importance. The order was 76 pages long and dealt with energy regulation in Northern Ireland. I had to be there, so it was not possible to be in the Chamber. As a consequence, I am ashamed to say that I missed half of what the Secretary of State had to say and, regrettably, all of what my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) had to say. [Interruption.] There is some ribaldry, but I am being perfectly serious.

The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) is a thoughtful and brave man. He has lived through all the problems and I listen to him with respect. Our newer colleague, the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael), who is a native of the beautiful island of Islay, applied his considerable skills as a lawyer and scholar in a fascinating contribution on the issues of civilianisation and intimate searches—a difficult and delicate subject for sure. He told us that a considerable volume of case law is being developed on that. It is essential that the staff involved in such searches, especially in drug-related cases, are well trained and meticulous or, to put it in the vernacular, they could easily throw an important drugs trial. He made that point well.

It was interesting to listen to the right hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson), who spoke with authority about checks and balances, not least between the ombudsman, the Policing Board, the Chief Constable and the Secretary of State. One of our anxieties is that the old so-called tripartite balance between the Chief Constable, the Secretary of State and the board is shifting.

That brings me to the remarks of the right hon. Member for Hartlepool about never playing politics with the effectiveness of the police. I agree, but I am not sure that shifting the balance between the Chief Constable, the Secretary of State and the board is not political. The right hon. Gentleman told my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham and Stamford that people have to do deals in politics in Northern Ireland. There is a fine line between doing deals and playing politics. One day, someone will help me with a definition, but, having participated in politics for a long time, I can say that there is a shadowy interface between playing politics and doing deals.

The hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) rightly said that civilians must have human rights training as well as practical knowledge of the rules of evidence. She also helped the House by clarifying the narrow and wider definition of a representative of the community. In fact, I thought that she and the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland made complementary speeches. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe), who is not in the Chamber—I know why, because I should have been at the same dinner—spoke wisely about pre-legislative scrutiny, and his remarks may well repay reading tomorrow morning, because everyone in the House aspires to such scrutiny as a better way of legislating.

The hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) hit the nail on the head when he said that although numbers are the real problem, the Bill says nothing about that. My hon. Friend the Member for Grantham and Stamford agrees with that and with his analysis of the real reasons for introducing the Bill.

The hon. Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies) reminded us of his conversations with people who live in the Province. I thought that he brought a sincere note to the debate, but it became clear that some Members who have lived in Northern Ireland all their life may not thank those of us who have lived in England all our life for telling them what is good for them. I have always been shy of doing so myself, as hon. Members who have served with me in Committee will know.

Mr. Eric Joyce (Falkirk, West): The hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) made a similar point when he more or less accused Labour Members of dilettante comments because they had not lived in Ireland all their life. However, there is a new practical imperative in some cases, such as the less than happy caravan of individuals who disembarked at Cairnryan at the start of the weekend, creating interesting policing challenges in other parts of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Taylor: I thank the hon. Gentleman for putting some backbone into me. The plain fact is that Members who represent Northern Ireland represent parts of my country. Northern Ireland is part of the United Kingdom, of which I am a citizen. I am elected to Parliament to represent a constituency in the United Kingdom, so perhaps I should have been a bit bolder in the first place.

Mr. Peter Robinson rose—

Mr. Taylor: I have started something now.

Mr. Robinson: I hope that when Members read what was said, they will accept that I have no difficulty with Members from other parts of the United Kingdom giving their advice and views on matters relating to Northern Ireland. However, I object to Members from other parts of the United Kingdom telling us that they know better than us what the people of Northern Ireland think and believe.

Mr. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman would certainly acquit me of that. I have never told anybody from Northern Ireland what was good for them. He may be interested to know that, before he came to the House, the late Enoch Powell said something almost identical to me.

I must move on in accordance with convention and with one eye on the clock. The hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley), with all his experience and power of recall, spoke of deterioration and loss of morale—I agree with what he said—and, in a separate context, of participation in policing boards, about which there is a good deal of domestic argument in Northern Ireland.

The hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White) would have preferred a more radical solution. The hon. Member for South Antrim (David Burnside) spoke warmly of the past record of the RUC—let us not forget the RUC George Cross Foundation—and even anticipated a united Unionist family. I remind him that my party had the word "Unionist" in its old long title, but I do not think he had me in mind.

The hon. Member for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Bailey) spoke with approval of what he called profound changes, and paid tribute to those in the police who had enabled them to take place.

The text for consideration is a disturbing matter, in our view, and is scarcely to be contemplated as it stands. It would be conceivable only in the context of acts of completion, as they have come to be called, and as defined.

The hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) set out the Democratic Unionist party's case for participation in police bodies, but castigated the 50:50 proposals. He invited Labour, I think, to stand in elections in Northern Ireland. Before doing that, the Labour party might allow people in Northern Ireland to join it.

I shall not seek to redeploy the arguments set out so well by my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham and Stamford. We shall not oppose the measure tonight, but we shall seek to amend and improve it in Committee, as my party did in another place.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Jane Kennedy): I begin by referring to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White). The lecture that he received as a young boy, which he described to us, still echoes in his memory. It serves to draw the attention of the House to the dangers continuing to face those who have the courage to serve as police officers in Northern Ireland.

I regret the somewhat churlish response of the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) to hon. Members representing constituencies elsewhere in the UK. It does nothing to enhance his argument when he dismisses out of hand thoughtful, incisive and constructive comments and contributions to a debate that impacts on all citizens of the United Kingdom.

The hon. Member for South Antrim (David Burnside) warned about deals being done to weaken policing. He joined the hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) and a number of other hon. Members to urge the Government to proceed with great care and to listen to the concerns that would be expressed by the Unionist community. The hon. Member for Lagan Valley called on us to proceed with great caution. May I assure hon. Members representing Unionist traditions in the House that I have listened carefully to the comments that they made? In the other place, a great deal of thought and consideration was given to representations received by the Government.

The hon. Member for Lagan Valley, the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) and the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee drew attention to the shortage of police officers. Hon. Members went further and said dismissively that there was nothing in the Bill to put more officers on front-line duty. On the contrary, the Bill proposes important measures that give greater flexibility to the Chief Constable in the deployment of civilian staff, including contracted-out staff. The measures, which have been included at the express request of the Chief Constable, are vital to free up officers for front-line duties. I know that the Policing Board supports him in that regard.

The hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford, in a typically robust contribution, challenged us about what the Bill does not do, as opposed to what it does. Hon. Members who have indicated that they may oppose the Bill in a vote oppose it for what it does not do, in particular because it is silent on the 50:50 procedures for recruitment to the Police Service of Northern Ireland.

Given the exchanges with Madam Deputy Speaker that took place earlier, Mr. Speaker, I venture down this path with some trepidation, but I believe that it will help the House if I try to pick up on some of the debate about the 50:50 policy, which is obviously still an extremely sensitive issue. I shall try to shed some light on the exchange that took place between my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) and the hon. Member for Lagan Valley. My hon. Friend was right to say that there had been a substantial increase in the proportion of Catholics applying to join the police. In the four recruitment campaigns that there have been so far, the proportion has been consistently at or above 35 per cent. The highest proportion applying to the Royal Ulster Constabulary was 22 per cent. Frequently, it was a good deal less. Chris Patten himself envisaged in his report an annual recruitment figure of 370. In the first year, no fewer than 530 recruits entered training. The Police Service of Northern Ireland hopes to recruit a broadly similar figure this year. The Chief Constable is currently considering with the Policing Board the scope for bringing in experienced officers from GB forces.

It has been suggested that 50:50 is not working. On the contrary, we believe that the level of response from the Catholic community since the implementation of Patten's recruitment measures has been unprecedented. Overall, 36 per cent. of applicants have so far been Catholic. The proportion of Catholics in the Police Service of Northern Ireland regulars has already risen from 8 per cent. to 11.3 per cent. That is well on target for achieving the quadrupling of the proportion of Catholics within 10 years, as Patten envisaged.

Hon. Members may be right to question whether that is entirely the effect of 50:50 recruitment. Other factors may well be at play, such as the fact that we now have a police service that is supported by the Catholic Church and welcomed by the Social Democratic and Labour party, and which has also been welcomed by the Irish Government and internationally and is recognised as a new beginning for policing. It may be all those factors that are attracting recruits to the Police Service of Northern Ireland from the Catholic and nationalist communities.

Mr. Carmichael: May I suggest to the Minister that she might be going too far in attributing all that success to the 50:50 policy? Surely, the real contribution is the reduction in intimidation.

Jane Kennedy: That is the point that I was trying to make. Perhaps I was not being clear enough, as I broadly agree with what the hon. Gentleman is saying. The fact is, however, that intimidation remains and continues to be a problem. It is therefore an issue that needs to addressed, and I hope to return to it in a moment.

Although precise figures are not yet available, it is worth noting that the Police Service of Northern Ireland has appointed recruits from areas such as Londonderry, Strabane and Newry. Appointments from such areas would have been almost unheard of prior to the implementation of the Patten report.

David Burnside: I thank the Minister for giving way. As she said, the intimidation still takes place and all of us in the House condemn it and wish that it did not exist. Will she confirm to the House that that intimidation comes from Sinn Fein-Provisional IRA and not some dissident republicans?

Jane Kennedy: The overt intimidation is coming directly from dissident republican organisations. I believe that the failure to condemn it is a serious failing for which Sinn Fein needs to answer. There is no excuse for adopting the position that it took in failing to condemn the attacks on young new recruits to the Police Service of Northern Ireland.

A number of hon. Members asked why applicants to the Police Service of Northern Ireland are required to requalify and constantly to reapply. We have considered that issue afresh and sought advice from the Equality Commission. Hon. Members may wish to test the matter further in Standing Committee. In the light of our further considerations, we have concluded that the current practice of discrete competitions should continue. Rolling the pool of candidates forward to subsequent competitions would present the Police Service of Northern Ireland with major practical difficulties and would not give roll-over candidates any significant advantage.

Mr. Quentin Davies: As I have already warned the hon. Lady, we intend to table an amendment on this issue in Committee, if the Bill is given a Second Reading. Does she recognise that, far from creating problems for the PSNI, this would save a lot of money? At present, not only are people being frustrated by having to re-apply and go through the same procedures many times, but it is costing public money for them to do so.

Jane Kennedy: Given what the hon. Gentleman has said, I look forward to debating the issue with him in greater detail in Committee. I will not answer his question now; I shall consider it so that I can give a fuller response at that time.

The right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) said in an intervention that recruitment was dependent on equal participation and encouragement from political leaders. That is very much the point that we were making on intimidation. Paragraph 15.2 of the Patten report states:

"The key to making that police service representative of those communities"— in Northern Ireland—

". . . is that the leaders of communities now actively encourage their young people to apply to join the police service."

The report goes on to detail school teachers, priests, bishops, sports authorities and others, all of whom it says

"should take steps to remove all discouragements to members of their communities applying to join the police . . . We cannot stress this recommendation too strongly."

It is time for all members of civil society in Northern Ireland to embrace that recommendation.

Rev. Ian Paisley: It has been announced that there has been a bombing tonight in Enniskillen. Does the Minister know anything further about casualties?

Jane Kennedy: All I know about the incident to which the hon. Gentleman refers is that a small explosive device has gone off at the town hall in Enniskillen, causing superficial damage. The area had been evacuated and no injuries resulted from the explosion. Hon. Members may also wish to know that a similar warning was received in Omagh, but no device was found. The incident to which the hon. Gentleman has drawn our attention simply serves to illustrate the environment in which we are working as we seek to resolve these important issues in Northern Ireland.

The hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) also raised the issue of the text for consideration, as did a number of other Members. He wished to discuss it in detail and to test our thinking on laying the text in public in the way we did. The Government published various commitments relating to policing in the revised implementation plan of August 2001, which arose from the talks at Weston Park. These included commitments to consider, as part of a review, the continued need for the bar on all ex-prisoners ever serving on a district policing partnership, and the powers of the Belfast sub-groups. The consideration covered the question of whether the time was yet right to make any changes, and what changes might be appropriate when such a time came. I hope to deal with the concerns expressed by a number of hon. Members on this issue.

Several hon. Members queried whether the time was right. Having given a great deal of thought to the agreement to consider these matters, we made it clear what we would propose to do. However, our conclusion was that the time was not yet right to introduce changes in these areas. In particular, the removal of the disqualification of ex-prisoners could, in our view, happen only in the context of acts of completion as envisaged by the Prime Minister in his speech in Belfast last October. However, we believed that it would be helpful to set out how we would intend to deal with the issues, should we, at some point in the future, conclude that the time was right to legislate on them. That is why we published the separate text in a spirit of openness, wishing to dispel some of the distrust that clearly exists towards the acts of the Government.

The hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) said that these provisions were in the Bill, but they are not. They are for separate consideration. Ex-prisoners can already serve on DPPs as political members if they have been elected as a local councillor. The text for consideration would bring the rules for independent members of DPPs into line with those for political members. This issue is not just about terrorist ex-prisoners; it covers all those who have served a custodial sentence at any point in their lives.

Why a five-year quarantine period? What was the thinking behind making that recommendation as a separate text for consideration? Our thinking was that it would bring independent members into line with district councillors. It is the triple-lock mechanism that was mentioned earlier. As the text shows, the provisions are modelled on those of the Elected Authorities (Northern Ireland) Act 1989. However, the House may wish to know that, in England and Wales, people are disqualified from membership of a police authority if, among other reasons, they have been convicted within the previous five years of a criminal offence and had a custodial sentence imposed. In considering this matter, I took an interest in what applied elsewhere in the UK.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies), in an incisive and deeply thoughtful first contribution to a debate on Northern Ireland, served notice that we should look forward to him brightening our counsels in future. The hon. Member for North Antrim was one of those who dismissed contributions such as that made by my hon. Friend, saying that my hon. Friend did not understand the nature of Irish republicanism because only those who had lived in Northern Ireland and experienced it could do so. I dispute that. I would very much like to debate it at length with the hon. Gentleman, perhaps in a more social setting. Every hon. Member has constituents who could be affected by the issues that we are dealing with today.

A number of hon. Members asked when Sinn Fein would join the Policing Board. That will be a matter for Sinn Fein, but I hope that it will be soon. Will we let the party on the Policing Board now? That is a serious question and it deserves a serious answer. At the moment, there are no vacancies on the board. All 19 members are appointed by the Secretary of State under direct rule. However, if acts of completion were to occur, the circumstances would be created in which the Government would hope to be able to restore devolution.

Mr. Quentin Davies: The Minister refers to acts of completion occurring. She does not say what those are. Will she be absolutely clear that what is required is nothing less than the completion of decommissioning and disbandment?

Jane Kennedy: I could not put it more clearly than the Prime Minister himself, who has said it not only in his speech in October but here on the Floor of the House—as have my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and colleagues in the Northern Ireland Office.

This is not about bartering and deals. When we published the text for consideration, the Government made it clear that the time was not right to introduce changes such as those that we are discussing today. However, as the editorial in the Belfast Telegraph said the following day, when the guns are silenced, all things are possible.

If the current situation changes and we find ourselves in a different set of circumstances where acts of completion are a reality, the environment will be different. In those circumstances and only in those circumstances, the changes that are set out in the text for consideration would be justified. This is not about deals or bartering; it is about looking to the future and being prepared to imagine new possibilities that could arise if we saw an end to terrorism in Northern Ireland.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) complained that the time scale was too short to enable effective pre-legislative scrutiny to take place. I concede that the timetable is not ideal. However, I want to respond to the Select Committee's criticism about the Northern Ireland Office's lack of a consultation period for the Bill. The Government note the criticism about the speed involved but, as the Committee recognised, we were under pressure to introduce the Bill as soon as possible to give it the opportunity of receiving Royal Assent before the start of the campaign for the Assembly elections in May.

Even in the time available to me, I have not had the opportunity to respond to everyone. I hope that I shall have the opportunity to do so in Standing Committee. I look forward to that.

Question put, That the Bill be now read a Second time:—

Illegal Camping

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Fitzpatrick.]

10.14 pm

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire): The problem of illegal camping in my constituency is substantial. It affects, typically, two to three communities in South Derbyshire at any one time. At present the local nuisance is concentrated just outside the village of Barrow upon Trent, and also in the area adjacent to Shardlow, at the junction with the A50, close to the border with north-west Leicestershire. However, I have been able to reflect on serious intrusions over the last 18 months to two years in Foston, Willington, Walton upon Trent, Church Gresley, Findern, Stenson, Coton Park, Shelton Lock and Swarkestone. In all those cases people chose to camp on sites owned not by them but by others, and often to leave large amounts of waste to be cleared by either the landowner or a public authority.

The residents of South Derbyshire are fed up to the back teeth with the problem, and seek from the public authorities—I shall deal with the activities of one of those authorities tonight—relief from both the nuisance caused by the campers and the astounding costs of clearing up the waste, which must be borne by public authorities and landowners.

Illegal waste dumping virtually always coincides with the arrival of people who camp illegally. The law is absolutely clear: this is a crime. What startles me regularly is that it is a crime that seems largely unknown to many of the enforcement agencies with which I deal. I have to explain regularly to the local police that it is a crime. In one extraordinary incident, a police officer watched someone cut up a car on Gresley common. When a local resident asked whether that was not an offence, the police officer said, "No; it is his own car, as far as I know. He was sold it by a local resident." The fact is that creating waste in a place that is not licensed for its disposal, which cutting up a car would certainly do, is an offence. I had to explain that to the police, who went away to consult the law before confirming it.

The position, however, is scarcely happier when it comes to the agency that is responsible for enforcing the law. Section 33 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 covers most issues relating to this, and makes it illegal to dump waste on a site that is not licensed for the purpose. The Controlled Waste (Regulation of Carriers and Seizure of Vehicles) regulations 1991 relate to the carriage of waste. Their purpose is to stop people from using any old van or truck to move waste around.

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon): Paragraph 6.2 of the recently produced Government draft guidance on managing unauthorised gypsy and travelling encampments says:

"There are creative ways in which fly-tipping of trade waste could be avoided or reduced."

Does not my hon. Friend think that it would be helpful if, rather than just saying that there are creative ways, the Government spelt out those creative ways to try to reduce this nuisance?

Mr. Todd: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. It is startling that in the consultation on the new protocols for dealing with illegal camping the Environment Agency is not mentioned at all. When I asked the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, which generated this proposal, whether the Agency should be involved in considering what to do in these instances, I was stunned by the reply "That's a good idea", because no one seemed to have thought of it until now. There is a difficulty in integrating the activities of the various agencies in dealing with this problem.

I turn to one area of doubt in the law relating to the carriage of waste. That is cleared up on the Environment Agency's website, which says:

"If the waste was carried in and deposited from a motor vehicle, the person controlling the use of the vehicle or who is in a position to do so is treated as knowingly causing the waste to be deposited whether or not instructions were given."

That deals with a commonplace reason for failure to enforce. I have known Agency inspectors arrive on some of these sites, see waste in the back of a van or truck, ask about the ownership of the van, receive an evasive answer and then wander off, saying "They wouldn't tell me the truth". That is not a legitimate response. It is clear that the carriage of waste in a vehicle not licensed for the purpose is an offence. Indeed, in certain circumstances it can lead to seizure of the vehicle. Yet persuading the Agency to take that tough stance and impound vehicles is very difficult.

I turn briefly to some experiences in my constituency, beginning, because I like to be positive, with some positive experiences.

During the foot and mouth outbreak it was difficult to persuade the Environment Agency to take action against people who were illegally camping. The reason given then was "We can't go on to the land, because we cannot risk spreading foot and mouth." Eventually we beat through that concern with the obvious point that it was not stopping the travellers operating from the sites. A raid was carried out at Swarkestone, with the police, in which a person was caught clearly committing an offence and was prosecuted locally.

As far as I can tell from talking to the Agency officer involved, that was virtually the only prosecution by the Environment Agency of someone illegally camping. There were quite a number of prosecutions—they are on the Agency's website—relating to people who fly-tip, but those are often settled residents, who present rather less trouble in being tracked down. In this instance the Agency managed to prosecute someone who did not live at that location or anywhere near. It did so with some success, and I am grateful.

The second recent experience touches tangentially on the Agency's role. There is a site of appalling squalor at the junction of the A50 and M1 on the boundary of my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor), a site that has been an unpleasant nuisance to local residents for a considerable time. A person was spotted dumping on the site by an alert police officer. When that person was questioned he declined to give information about who he was. The officer being very determined—I congratulate him on that—took him to court. The fine that was levied was modest, but I commend one step that the magistrates took, which was to demand cash from his pocket before he even left the court, so that he could not feel that he had got away with it.

Those were the positive steps, but I have examples of the Environment Agency's giving an array of excuses for why it has chosen not to pursue what were clear breaches of environmental law. The first excuse was that people are very rude. Well, that is true. I have visited some of these sites, and such people can be extremely rude. Another excuse, which is produced by one of the local offices in my area, is that there is concern about the health and safety of Environment Agency staff. Also, the people involved are not simply rude; they will not give details of who they are, so action is very difficult to take. However, all of those problems are easily dealt with by arranging a visit in co-operation with the police. If someone declines to give details, that is of course an offence, and the police can take action against that individual. If people are rude, that can also lead to an offence, depending on quite how rude they are. Through such steps, the police and the Environment Agency acting together can achieve results.

To add insult to injury, in the particular instance that I am thinking of, the Environment Agency said, "Well, we're not going to take any action while these people are on site. We will send someone down from the local gypsy liaison council"—such a person would know very few of these people, and would have very little influence on them—"and we are prepared to wait two or three weeks while these people lay waste to the site, until the council representative turns up to talk to them. When they eventually leave"—presumably after the landowner gains possession of the site—"we will go through the rubbish, and see if we can find some settled residents who have foolishly given them this waste, and prosecute the settled residents instead." That is certainly aiming for the soft targets.

It can be a frustrating experience from time to time, but there are encouraging signs. I hear that the Environment Agency is considering taking more robust steps to deal with the carriage of waste in particular, by trying to identify those who are committing such offences. That would be a shrewd strategy. Much the most important possessions of the majority of these people are the vehicles that they use. Threatening the seizure of those vehicles would improve the quality of behaviour by a large margin.

Further action is required. First, it is not sensible to have a national consultation on the framework for dealing with this problem that does not involve the Environment Agency. I insist that the Minister say that the agency will actively engage in the process with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Home Office, in preparing guidelines for this problem. Secondly, the Environment Agency should be included in local protocols as a matter of course. The agency in Derbyshire is not so included, and when I put the suggestion to the county council—the co-ordinating authority—it said that it was interesting, and that it would certainly take it on board. Well, that is not good enough. There should be clear guidance stating that, if there is a local protocol, the Environment Agency should be involved in it.

Thirdly, there should be active partnership with the police. It should not be necessary for me constantly to prod and push the two sides together to take action, but I am afraid that that is the case. Prodding the police is necessary in part because, as I have evidenced, there is sometimes a rather incomplete knowledge of environmental law. However, we have got past that problem now, at least in my area. Also, the agency is certainly very unwilling to enter sites that, in its view, might be unpleasant to visit. Fourthly, there needs to be greater proactivity and less concern with the softer targets. Finally, yes, it is a good idea to look carefully at vehicle seizure powers. I look forward to a vigorous response to that idea, and I await the Minister's response, in which he sets out how his Department and the Environment Agency can assist residents in South Derbyshire and elsewhere who are afflicted by this appalling nuisance.

10.29 pm

The Minister for the Environment (Mr. Michael Meacher): I commend my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) on his case, on what is a serious issue. The management of waste generated by illegal camping is a problem in many parts of the country and I am aware of the arguments—which are genuinely made—that the Environment Agency does not pay sufficient attention to that. I hope that I can explain that that is not the case, but I am the first to admit that more resolute and determined action is needed. We need more joined-up activity between the agency, local authorities and Departments, including my own.

I also commend my hon. Friend because this is not the first occasion on which he has raised the issue. He has requested other Adjournment debates, initiated at least one private Member's Bill and, I believe, is currently promoting another Bill.

The key to the problem is the fly-tipping protocol that has been drawn up by the Local Government Association and the Environment Agency. Under that protocol, local authorities deal with the fly tipping of household waste and small commercial and industrial waste, which forms the bulk of waste fly-tipped by illegal campers. Therefore in most circumstances, it is for the local authority to act. The protocol allows the Environment Agency to concentrate on the fly tipping of hazardous waste and serious environmental crime. Given the limitations of resources and personnel, that is probably a sensible division. The agency also, however, sometimes carries out joint surveillance and enforcement operations with local authorities.

My hon. Friend mentioned the case involving the site by the A50/M1 junction in Leicestershire, in which the offender was subsequently prosecuted and fined. The case raises several issues and I shall return to it before I finish.

The Government acknowledge that gypsies and travellers have a right to pursue a nomadic lifestyle—nothing that my hon. Friend said suggested otherwise—and many live peaceably next to their settled neighbours. However, the right of gypsies and travellers to enjoy that lifestyle has to be reconciled with the right of the settled community to enjoy theirs. Both communities need to understand their responsibilities as well as their rights. That is the theory: it is the application that can be a problem.

Some traveller groups camp illegally, which can attract levels of nuisance and distress to the settled community. As my hon. Friend said, the typical consequences can range from unacceptable behaviour, lack of respect—to put it mildly—for other people's property, and the costs of removing rubbish.

Fly tipping unquestionably blights our towns and countryside. It is an antisocial activity, whoever is responsible for it and wherever it comes from. Contrary to the view held by many people, there are stringent controls in place to ensure that waste is managed properly. Illegal waste disposal is a criminal offence. Those caught and found guilty of it can receive penalties of up to five years' imprisonment or an unlimited fine. One of the main problems is getting the magistrates courts to recognise the seriousness of the offences and to apply the necessary penalties to act as a genuine deterrent.

When waste is deposited illegally, local authorities and the Environment Agency have the powers to remove it and dispose of it properly, under section 59 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. My hon. Friend argued tonight, as he has on previous occasions, that those powers are too seldom used. However, it is not the responsibility of the Government to decide how local authorities and the Environment Agency should use the powers that are available to them. I encourage them to take strong enforcement action and to prosecute the perpetrators of such crimes wherever possible. My hon. Friend well articulated the feeling of local people that where powers are available, they are insufficiently used. Both the local authority and the Environment Agency have additional powers to bring prosecutions for the illegal disposal of waste and for breach of the duty of care requirements.

Everyone realises that fly tipping is a tricky issue. The main difficulty is to prevent waste being from being fly-tipped in the first place, and then to catch the culprits. The main problem is not the level of penalty but the perception of the likelihood of apprehension. However, the Government are serious about tackling the growing problem of fly tipping, and we are considering whether to amend legislation to extend the range of powers available both to local authorities and to the agency.

I recently visited the fly tipping forum—I understand that it has been given a new name—which develops policies to try to prevent fly tipping. I was struck by the determination of the group of experts associated with the Environment Agency to investigate all means of trying to apprehend fly tippers. Some of those ideas were innovative and I look forward to receiving a report on how to develop them.

We have already amended the Environmental Protection (Duty of Care) Regulations 1991 to give local authorities powers to inspect the duty of care records kept by businesses. Sometimes, former traveller encampments can become subject to further fly tipping, of business waste. The amendment will help local authorities to investigate fly tipping incidents and to prevent fly tipping from taking place. The power comes into effect on 20 February.

The Environment Agency is establishing a central unit to co-ordinate its approach to environmental crime. I am pleased that both the chairman and the chief executive of the agency are determined to crack down much harder on environmental crime—as am I.

Mr. Todd: Will my right hon. Friend take a look at the experience in Wales where the Environment Agency has set aside a budget for the pursuit of fly tipping and for research into it? Apparently, that is not mirrored in the English Environment Agency.

Mr. Meacher: I am well aware of that. My understanding is that the Welsh unit has been strikingly successful. It is a model that the Environment Agency wants to follow in other parts of the country. I strongly encourage that.

We are also considering further ideas for tackling fly tipping, including those mentioned in the consultation paper that we issued recently, entitled, "Living Places—Powers, Rights, Responsibilities". The consultation period is due to close on 14 February. We shall certainly follow up closely the observations of consultees. We are determined to pursue these matters thoroughly.

We are aware of the agency's desire for powers of arrest for fly tipping, and for other changes to legislation, which is an appropriate point to refer to the case in Leicestershire to which my hon. Friend drew our attention. In December last year, officers from the Environment Agency and officers from the Leicestershire constabulary discussed a strategy for dealing with illegal tipping by itinerants in the vicinity of the A50/M1 intersection.

On 13 January this year, the Environment Agency was contacted by Leicestershire police to confirm that their officers had witnessed about 3 tonnes of soil being deposited among the other waste at the site. The offender was unable to respond satisfactorily to accusations of illegal tipping lodged by the police, and they were able to arrest him under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. An Environment Agency officer assisted the police in interviewing the offender and provided the police with specimen charges. The offender was subsequently bailed to appear at a later date to answer to the charges lodged against him.

The offender, who is apparently known to the police under several aliases, appeared at Loughborough magistrates court and pleaded guilty to one charge of depositing waste without the benefit of a waste management licence, contrary, as my hon. Friend said, to section 33 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. He was fined £250 and ordered to pay £65 costs. I think that that is derisory.

We should learn from the issues that the case has raised. The Environment Agency has said that, without police assistance, it is unlikely that it would have been able to take any action against the man. The problem facing the agency is that, without the power of arrest, many itinerants can give false names and addresses. Many of their vehicles are not registered with the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency, and many itinerants have no fixed abode.

The agency gathers evidence, produces charges and then serves court summonses on offenders. Without correct names or addresses, the summonses never reach offenders. The police have powers under PACE to arrest individuals on the spot if they are not satisfied with the information that they are given. They also have access to identification tools, such as fingerprinting and DNA. We need to learn the lessons about the Environment Agency's capacity to act effectively, given that it does not have powers of arrest.

The police in Leicestershire are very keen to make progress on joint working with the local agency office and are attending a joint seminar on seizing vehicles involved in illegal waste activities. That is exactly the kind of co-operation that we need.

Mr. Todd: I thank my right hon. Friend for giving way again. He highlights the core of the issue—the co-operation currently possible under the law between the Environment Agency and the police—but is he not concerned, as I was, about the very thin knowledge of environmental crime that the police often have and the difficulty of achieving co-working, perhaps without clearer direction from the Home Office? Will he perhaps discuss this matter with colleagues in the Home Office?

Mr. Meacher: I am very pleased to give that undertaking. My hon. Friend puts his finger on it: the difficulty is achieving co-operative working on an issue that he and I regard as extremely serious. Given the range of other duties and functions of the police and the Environment Agency, matters of this kind do not get the focused and targeted attention that is needed. There is a failure to achieve such joined-up activity, and I am pleased to do what I can to try to ensure that it is improved.

Finally, I shall refer to an issue, which, I think, my hon. Friend raised: whether the Environment Agency should be given more specific guidance about travellers. The Environment Agency is, of course, fully aware of its powers in relation to fly tipping, although it is well aware of the lack of powers to which I refer. In most cases, the local authority would deal with the majority of fly-tipping incidents involving illegal campers. Again, co-operation with local authorities, which varies across the country, is very important.

What are the Government doing to tackle the problem of fly tipping? As I have said, we are introducing powers to enable local authorities to check businesses' duty of care waste transfer notes—something that local authorities have wanted for a long time. Businesses should keep those notes whenever waste is transferred from one party to another. Enabling local authorities to check such documents should allow them to ensure that businesses are disposing of their waste correctly. Those powers will come into force on 20 February.

With regard to evicting travellers from illegal sites, there are already substantial powers—

Oral Answers to Questions

HEALTH

The Secretary of State was asked—

Mesothelioma

1. Mr. Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central): What the life expectancy of a mesothelioma sufferer is; and what steps he is taking to improve this. [96673]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Ms Hazel Blears): The one-year survival rate for adults diagnosed with mesothelioma between 1986 and 1990 was about 27 per cent. A number of clinical trials relating to the condition are under way. Once the evidence from those trials is available we will consider whether the National Institute for Clinical Excellence should be asked to develop clinical guidelines for the treatment of mesothelioma.

Mr. Lloyd: Does my hon. Friend recognise that mesothelioma is something of a Cinderella in the world of cancer? Many cancer specialists argue that we actually need access to specialist facilities for mesothelioma so that people can be diagnosed promptly and receive rapid treatment. Survival rates would thus be pushed up massively, as they have been in other countries. The real issue is that mesothelioma sufferers are not diagnosed early enough; GPs and other gatekeepers must be much more aware that that killer disease can cease to be a killer if people are diagnosed early.

Ms Blears: I know that my hon. Friend has campaigned for mesothelioma sufferers in his area. He is right: 90 per cent. of those cancers are linked to exposure to asbestos. Diagnosis is difficult and there is controversy about the type of treatment that is appropriate. There are two clinical trials looking into chemotherapy, surgery and palliative care to find out which combination of those treatments is the most effective. We need early diagnosis and good treatment for that cancer, as for other forms of cancer, and my hon. Friend will be aware of the massive amount of investment that the Government are putting into cancer treatment, with new equipment, more surgeons and new drugs.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): The hon. Lady will be aware that one of the side effects of this lung condition is that it causes great anxiety and that one of the most effective ways of treating anxiety is to use the herb kava kava, which the Government are about to ban despite the fact that there are serious disputes over the medical evidence, including research from the United States. Will the hon. Lady give an undertaking to look at the research again? If she is going to ban kava kava, will she also ban aspirin and paracetamol, which account for a number of lives every year?

Ms Blears: Clearly, this kind of cancer is extremely serious. That is why the Government are exploring all kinds of treatment—from chemotherapy, to surgery and to palliative care. The hon. Gentleman knows very well indeed that the evidence on kava kava has been looked at on five separate occasions by expert medical committees and expert scientific advisers. The evidence is clear: the links with liver disease and hepato-toxicity are such that kava kava needs to be withdrawn from the market. However, the importance of treating this type of cancer is a top priority for the Government.

Hospital Cleanliness

2. Mr. Bill Wiggin (Leominster): If he will make a statement on hospital cleanliness. [96674]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. David Lammy): Patients told us that they wanted hospitals to be cleaner and more comfortable. The NHS plan provided a framework to meet that expectation, supported by £60 million. As a result of that investment, and the efforts of the NHS, there are now no hospitals where environmental standards, including cleanliness, have been assessed as less than acceptable by independent inspection teams.

Mr. Wiggin: A hundred thousand people a year catch hospital-acquired infections; 5,000 of those people die from them. That costs the Government at least £1 billion a year and a 10 per cent. reduction in hospital-acquired infections would free up 364,056 bed days. We are grateful for the Government's attempted response because the matter is so serious, but why are hospitals still dirty after six years of a Labour Government who told us that there were only 24 hours to save the NHS?

Mr. Lammy: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that the issue is serious, although his figures slightly exaggerate the position. What is important is that we have the data collection for a baseline on which to make an assessment. We are doing that for the first time. We have also put £60 million into cleanliness in our hospitals. Our inspection teams say that our hospitals are getting cleaner. It is also important to remember that performance indicators and star ratings will ensure cleanliness in our hospitals.

Paul Flynn (Newport, West): It is offensive and sickening to hear Opposition Members turn this into a political issue when we all know that the cuts made in the health service during the 1980s and early '90s were responsible for the downgrading of hospital cleanliness. My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the work that has been done, but it remains a scandal that illnesses arising from the spread of methicillin-resistant staphylococcus aureus continue to multiply in our hospitals. Sadly, when we visit hospitals we often notice that the standards of cleanliness and hygiene have not returned to what they were a couple of decades ago.

Mr. Lammy: My hon. Friend makes a good point. The introduction of modern matrons will assist in that process, as will a tough, new inspection process conducted by the Commission for Health Improvement.

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire): Why is it that the Government claim to be putting so much more money into the hospital service yet, certainly in Worcestershire, the standards in hospitals and the number of beds are going down?

Mr. Lammy: I am quite sure that that is not true. Clinicians, housekeepers, porters and receptionists are working as hard in Worcestershire as they are around the country. We are putting in that extra investment, and it is important that it is linked to performance and inspection, which will guarantee that we have the national standards across the board. The hon. Gentleman will know that what got us to this point was the compulsory competitive tendering that was brought in by the former Administration.

Bed Blocking

3. Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): How many hospital beds are occupied by geriatric patients who could be cared for outside hospital. [96675]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): The number of delayed discharges continues to fall because of the investment and reforms that the Government are making. Following the £300 million additional investment in tackling delayed discharges that we made in October 2001, delayed discharges have fallen by 24 per cent. Since 1997, the number of delayed discharges for those over 75 has fallen by 39 per cent.

Mr. Robathan: Is it not the case that there is a reduction in residential care homes? Is not that reduction in places for the elderly caused by failed Government policies, motivated in part by prejudice against private care homes? Perhaps the Minister can explain what is the logic in fining local authorities, which will further reduce the ability of social services departments to care for the elderly and others, when the reduction is actually the result of failed Government policy?

Mr. Hutton: No, a 39 per cent. fall in delayed discharges does not equate under any objective analysis to a failure in Government policy. We are improving the range of services available to treat more older people, more quickly, when they can come out of hospital. The hon. Gentleman may disagree with those on the Conservative Front Bench, but the problem that he and, I suspect, probably all his hon. Friends have is that they cannot complain about a lack of funding for social care services—I assume that that is what he is arguing about—when his party has never been able to commit itself to matching the existing spending that is being provided. In their entire time in office between 1992 and 1997, the Conservatives only managed a 0.1 per cent. increase in social services spending. We are doing significantly better than that, and until the hon. Gentleman and his friends can match the investment that we are making, they had better go away and do their sums again.

Mr. George Stevenson (Stoke-on-Trent, South): My right hon. Friend will be aware that the national health service in north Staffordshire is presently in the process of reducing elderly care beds in the NHS by about 50 per cent. At the same time, there is enormous concern that, in spite of the additional resources that the Government are making available to social services and the NHS, there is a growing gap between resources available under the NHS and those available to social services to provide the care that is necessary, particularly intermediate care. Will my right hon. Friend look at that situation because there is enormous concern about it in north Staffordshire? I would be enormously grateful to him if I could be advised what he intends to try to do about it.

Mr. Hutton: I always take very seriously what my hon. Friend brings to the attention of the House, and I will certainly make inquiries into the issue that he raises. We are building up capacity in the NHS and social care to treat more people, particularly more older people, more quickly, with a wider range of more capable services. However, I assure my hon. Friend that I will look into the issue that he raises and I will come back to him with some answers.

Mr. Boris Johnson (Henley): Will the Minister join me in congratulating the many thousands of local people who have raised money in south Oxfordshire and elsewhere to rebuild the Watlington hospital, thus helping to alleviate the crisis in bed blocking because it will provide 60 beds for long-term care, respite care and care for the elderly? Will he take the opportunity now to congratulate all those people on doing so on their own initiative and perhaps to apologise for the Labour Government's decision to close that hospital?

Mr. Hutton: The Labour Government made no such decision. I would certainly want to congratulate the hon. Gentleman's constituents on making that investment and putting the work into Watlington hospital, which I know myself because I used to live very close to Watlington. I am delighted that a future has been found for the hospital. We will be increasingly considering a wider range of roles for smaller community cottage hospitals to play in the NHS of the future, and we will be able to do so because of the investment that we are putting in, which he and his hon. Friends would take out of the NHS.

Health Provision

4. Peter Bradley (The Wrekin): What progress he has made in reducing the postcode lottery in health provision. [96676]

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Alan Milburn): New national standards and the work of the National Institute for Clinical Excellence are spearheading our attack on the postcode lottery of care. However, the biggest lottery in health care is between patients who have to wait for treatment on the NHS and those who can afford to pay for it privately. I can tell the House today that, building on the choices already offered to NHS heart patients, it is my intention to make choice of hospital available to more NHS patients who need an operation, so that by December 2005 all NHS patients will have choice within the health service, instead of having to opt out.

Peter Bradley: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer, but I wish to direct his attention to a different kind of postcode lottery. I acknowledge the significant increase in funding for the Telford and Wrekin primary care trust of 34 per cent. revenue and 14 per cent. capital over the next three years, which is the top of the range in both orders. However, will he acknowledge that Telford and Wrekin start from the position of having £719 to spend per patient per year, compared with an average nationally of £819, and that we start £12 million, or 9 per cent., behind our fair shares target? In three years' time we will have closed that gap to £10.5 million, or 6 per cent., but will he use targeted funding to help Telford and Wrekin and other PCTs to close that gap more quickly?

Mr. Milburn: My hon. Friend makes a good point about the problems that his local health service and primary care trust face. As he knows, that is why we adjusted the formula for redistributing cash, and I made a statement to the House in December announcing new resources and a new formula. Those will inevitably take time to kick in, but he is right to say that the PCT in his area has received a well above the national average share of resources—more than 30 per cent.—which will allow the local health service to plan to meet needs in the local community. It is better that such decisions are taken at a local level, instead of through extra targeted funding that we could provide nationally.

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest): When will the document on configuring hospital services, which will have the aim of preventing inequalities and the postcode lottery, be published?

Mr. Milburn: Very shortly.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East): My right hon. Friend will know that the Royal Bolton hospital is very short of capacity, and I hope that he will come to see that for himself before too long. Does he agree, therefore, that the introduction of the Greater Manchester choice programme will alleviate some of that pressure and help my constituents to access operations in the hospitals in the Greater Manchester conurbation?

Mr. Milburn: Yes, I hope to visit the Bolton area before too long to fulfil a promise that I gave to my hon. Friend. He will be aware that parts of the north-west, including his own, have some of the highest waiting times for hospital treatment. Overall, waiting times are falling, but they are still too long in some areas. That is why we will announce plans today for patients to exercise choice. If they cannot get a short waiting time at their local hospital, they will be able to choose another hospital. That will be the case in Greater Manchester and in other parts of the country, so that we can test the new approach and ensure that patients can exercise informed choice in elective surgery in all parts of the NHS. We intend to bring forward that scheme in July and to extend it to the whole country next year.

Mr. Andrew Rosindell (Romford): Will the Secretary of State acknowledge that one of the worst aspects of the postcode lottery is that relating to coronary heart disease? Has he had time to see the figures published by the British Heart Foundation, which were printed in last week's Romford Recorder, showing that the London borough of Havering has one of the worst records for that? Will he outline what the Government intend to do to improve that service?

Mr. Milburn: I regret to say that I have not read the Romford Recorder—

Mr. Rosindell: Do so today.

Mr. Milburn: If the hon. Gentleman insists and provided that he is not in it. He is right to raise the issue. Coronary heart disease is the biggest killer in our country—it kills between 125,00 and 150,000 people a year. We know two things: first, many of the deaths and morbidity are preventable if action is taken, which is why I am pleased that, over the course of the last three years, the prescribing of cholesterol-lowering drugs, which prevent heart attacks, has doubled because of extra resources going in. Secondly, in too many parts of the country, where the incidence of coronary heart disease is highest, the rates of heart surgery have been lowest. That is why targeted funding is being made available to ensure that we close the health gap between the poorest areas and the more prosperous parts of the country. All that I would say to the hon. Gentleman, in all candour, is that if we want to achieve a 20 per cent. cut in heart surgery waiting times, that cannot be achieved by making 20 per cent. cuts in funding.

Andy Burnham (Leigh): May I warmly welcome today's extension of the choice programme to patients in Greater Manchester? In doing so, will the Secretary of State assure me that all patients across Greater Manchester will be included under that scheme, and not just those nearest the available capacity? In the long term, will he consider developing sufficient diagnostic and treatment capacity in the west of the Greater Manchester area, closer to the homes of my constituents?

Mr. Milburn: We will certainly consider that latter issue. As my hon. Friend is aware, late last year, we issued invitations both to the national health service and to private sector providers to build new diagnostic and treatment centres in those parts of the country where waiting times are longest. The DTCs—which are surgery centres—separate emergency work from elective work so that operations are not cancelled and waiting times can be brought down. On my hon. Friend's first point, choice for waiting, whether for an orthopaedic operation or for an eye operation, will apply from the summer of this year in all parts of Greater Manchester, and will apply in all parts of the country from next year.

Carers

5. Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire): What assessment he has made of the needs of carers before introducing the Community Care (Delayed Discharges Bill). [96677]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Jacqui Smith): We have considered the needs of carers carefully when developing policy on delayed discharges. Patients being in hospital when they would be more appropriately cared for in the community is bad for them and their families and carers. At the Report stage of the Community Care (Delayed Discharges etc.) Bill, several Government amendments were accepted that will bring services to carers within the scope of the Bill.

Andrew Selous: I thank the Minister for that reply, but does she accept the real distress caused to carers by the omission of any reference to their needs in the draft Bill? Can she assure the House that as a result of this legislation there will be no repetition of the type of incident that happened in my constituency recently, in which a mentally ill patient was sent home from hospital without his carer even knowing, causing a great deal of distress, as the gentleman could not be found for some considerable time?

Jacqui Smith: Both through the Bill and the hospital discharge workbook that we have published recently, we are improving and building on good practice and ensuring that, as the hon. Gentleman rightly points out, carers are involved in the important decisions about discharge and the services that need to be put in place afterwards. I agree with him that that is a priority. That is why Carers UK welcomed the amendments to the Bill and said that they are "an important step forward for carers' rights."

I am therefore very pleased that the Government brought forward those amendments. They represent, along with the considerable extra investment that the Government are putting into providing services for carers, the priority and recognition that the Government have for their extremely important contribution.

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West): While welcoming the huge contribution that carers make, does the Minister agree that relatives should not be forced into an excessive commitment of care because of a lack of adequate social services support? In that context, does she agree that the decision of the Liberal Democrat-controlled Milton Keynes council to increase maximum home care charges from £21.25 a week to £100 a week is not helpful? If my constituents are unable to afford those charges, what does she advise them to do?

Jacqui Smith: My hon. Friend makes an important point. I have no doubt that, as she usually does, she is campaigning on behalf of people in her constituency who need those social care services. I hope that all local authorities, when taking decisions on provision and charging, will bear in mind the considerable extra investment that the Government have put into social services. There will be a doubling of the real-terms increase over the next three years. I hope that local authorities will ensure that that is reflected in better services and better access for vulnerable people.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire): Does the Minister recall that this Bill had a rough time in this House, being criticised on Second and Third Reading by hon. Members on her side of the House as well as on this side; and does she realise that it was mauled on Second Reading in another place? There is now little prospect of it reaching the statute book by 1 April. Would it not be best to withdraw the Bill?

Jacqui Smith: No. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Lammy), pointed out that our considerable extra investment has already brought about reductions in delayed discharge. We believe in the need to back up that investment with reforms to the system. Those reforms should put the needs of people—especially the older people who are currently trapped in hospital—at the centre of our system. I am disappointed that Opposition Members talk a lot about delayed discharge and the needs of older people but fail to support the investment and reforms that will ensure that progress can continue.

Nurse Recruitment

6. Mr. Ivan Henderson (Harwich): If he will make a statement on nurse recruitment in the past three months. [96678]

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Alan Milburn): The latest figures show that the number of nurses who are working in the national health service rose by an estimated 22,500 in the 18 months leading up to March last year. The target in the NHS plan for an extra 20,000 nurses by 2004 was therefore met two years early.

To increase the number of nurses, therapists and health care scientists still further, the latest phase of our recruitment campaign will be launched later this month.

Mr. Henderson: Last week, on one of my regular visits to Colchester general hospital—which serves my constituents—a number of nurses asked about the introduction of foundation hospitals. Will my right hon. Friend assure me and those nurses—who included newly recruited nurses and nurses in training—that their job security and pay and conditions will be protected under any changes that arise through the introduction of foundation hospitals?

Mr. Milburn: That is our intention. As my hon. Friend knows, our agenda for change negotiations that we concluded with the NHS trade unions late last year are currently being debated among members of a variety of trade unions. Providing that there is a vote in favour of the result of those negotiations, the agenda for change will go ahead. It will apply to NHS foundation trusts and NHS trusts. I hope that nurses and others will see the advantage of that. It promises fairer and better pay for nurses. Clearly, the more responsibilities that nurses take on, the more rewards they can get.

In the past, nurses' pay was staged, the number of nurses in training was falling, and the number of nurses in post was being cut. Today, the number of nurses in the NHS is rising, more nurses are in post and more nurses are getting fairer and better pay as a result. All of that has resulted from the Government's decision to put extra resources into the NHS; and all of it will be jeopardised, as my hon. Friend knows, by the policy of the Opposition to remove those resources.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon): If all the targets for nurse recruitment have been met, why did agency spending on nurses rise to nearly £500 million last year? That spending has doubled under this Government. Is it not the case that NHS Professionals is failing and that the Secretary of State has had to order a review into its working as several large hospitals have withdrawn from it? Is it not the Secretary of State's failure to retain nurses that has led to wasteful spending on agency nurses? He has eventually shown that he can spend more, but he has not shown that he can spend wisely.

Mr. Milburn: Well, on the number of nurses in the NHS, the hon. Gentleman knows fine well that the targets that were set in the NHS plan—which he and others said could not be met—have been met well ahead of target. I am talking not only about the number of nurses working in the NHS, but about the number of nurses who have been recruited to the NHS. The hon. Gentleman knows also that vacancy rates among nurses are falling. It is true that nurse vacancies exist in many parts of the country, including his own. That will take time to put right. Therefore, in the short term, bank and agency nurses will be used. It is important that the NHS comes together to use its purchasing muscle to ensure that it gets the best deal where agency and bank nurses are used. That is what NHS Professionals has been trying to do, but I know that there is more to do. However, because resources are going into the NHS, more nurses are working in the NHS. It is our intention to keep the momentum moving forward.

Mrs. Ann Cryer (Keighley): I am delighted at the increase in recruitment, but has my right hon. Friend any figures about what percentage of recruitment is taking place in the United Kingdom and involves training in the United Kingdom? I ask because I have spent quite a lot of time over the past 18 months visiting the Bradford royal infirmary and St. James's in Leeds. I am aware of the high quality of nursing that is provided in those two hospitals by nurses from throughout the world. However, I am concerned about the impact that our recruitment is having on places such as the Philippines.

Mr. Milburn: My hon. Friend is right to raise these concerns. As she knows, the national health service has for many years relied on nurses and, indeed, doctors and other health care professionals from overseas. It is worth saying that, without those overseas clinical professionals, the NHS would not be able to provide the quality of care that it does. We in the NHS owe those people an enormous debt of gratitude.

We will continue to recruit where it is appropriate to do so. For example, we have signed a memorandum of understanding with the Government of the Philippines, because the unusual situation there is that it has a surplus, rather than a shortage, of nurses. I can also report to my hon. Friend that, over the past two or three years, 13,000 nurses who had left the NHS have returned to it. A further 1,800 are in the pipeline and are preparing to return. That has come about because of the policies that are being pursued, the reforms to the career structures of nurses and, most important, the extra resources that are going into the NHS.

Mr. John Baron (Billericay): Further to that last question, the Secretary of State will know that in the five years since Nelson Mandela appealed to Britain to stop poaching nurses from South Africa, the number of them entering this country has risen more than fivefold. Meanwhile, we suck in more and more nurses from developing countries across the world. Despite the Government's code of conduct on the issue, a major part of the problem is that only about a half of the private agencies that are used by the Government and the NHS to recruit nurses from abroad have signed up to the code. If the Secretary of State accepts that poor countries need their nurses even more than we do, when will the Government stop sidestepping this issue and ban the NHS from dealing with agencies that ignore the rules?

Mr. Milburn: There is no question of sidestepping this important issue. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman thinks that it is an important issue now because, when his Government were in power, they did nothing about it. As far as this Government's actions are concerned, as he is aware, we do not actively recruit from developing countries, including South Africa. What is more, I can assure him and the House that we do not use agencies that actively recruit from developing countries, including South Africa.

General Medical Practice

7. Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney): What action he is taking to attract more people into general medical practice. [96679]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): The Government are committed to recruiting and retaining more GPs. That is why we have introduced new financial incentives for doctors coming into general practice and to delay their retirement. That goes together with more flexible working and better child care. The new general medical services contract will also act as a further incentive to recruitment and retention.

Mr. Blizzard: My right hon. Friend may be aware of a recent survey of GP vacancies carried out by the British Medical Association. Is he aware that some of the figures in the survey are out of date? For example, in my constituency the vacancy rate is 3.5 per cent. and not 7.8 per cent. However, there are still 4.5 vacant GP posts in my area, and they are in surgeries that serve the least prosperous neighbourhoods. What more can my right hon. Friend do to attract GPs to those areas so that the poorest communities do not suffer from the general difficulty in recruiting people to general practice?

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for pointing out those facts. More GPs have been recruited in his part of the country, and we will continue to explore ways in which we can improve recruitment and retention. I have told him and the House that the new contract that we are negotiating with the British Medical Association and the NHS Confederation will address many of his concerns. We have not reached a final agreement on that contract, but I hope that we will be able to do so shortly. I am confident that if we can reach an agreement we will find a better way of recruiting and retaining more GPs in general practice and dealing with the funding issues that my hon. Friend raised in his pertinent question.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): These promises are not new. The NHS plan promised to recruit an extra 2,000 GPs between 2000 and 2004. How many have been recruited so far?

Mr. Hutton: Four hundred and eighty-three.

Dr. Fox: With a year to go, the Government have not even achieved a quarter of the number that they said was required to make the NHS plan work. Up and down the country, PCTs are telling us that because of Government-imposed commitments and deficits carried by the PCTs there will be little or no money for primary care development this year. The GP contract keeps slipping back and morale is falling; 28 per cent. of GPs say that they are seriously contemplating a career change; the number of GP vacancies has risen by 70 per cent. in the past year; and the number of applicants for each vacancy has fallen from 8.5 in 2000 to just 4.4 now. Will the Minister admit that his stewardship of general practice has been an unmitigated disaster?

Mr. Hutton: No, I certainly would not. The hon. Gentleman's game is clear and transparent to all of us. He wants to talk down the national health service because he wants to convince the British public that it can never be the service that we want it to be. In truth, the picture is very different, as there are 1,500 more GPs working in the NHS now than when he was in government, when his right hon. and hon. Friends were cutting the number of GPs going into training. However, those numbers are now increasing substantially. Yes, there is more recruitment and retention work to be done, and we will do it. However, we will take no strictures from the hon. Gentleman, because his policies would take money out of the national health service, which is something that we simply will not tolerate.

Mr. Gareth Thomas (Harrow, West): Does my right hon. Friend think that further measures to improve the nation's public health will help to increase the numbers going into general practice? Such measures could include a ban on smoking in restaurants and other public places. If another brave, bold Government Back Bencher could be found to make the case for such a ban, perhaps under the ten-minute rule, would my right hon. Friend undertake to listen to such a case?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Minister does not need to answer that question.

Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon): Can the Minister explain why so many GPs in my constituency are complaining about the increasing burden of paperwork and form-filling? If he wants to recruit more GPs, would it not be better to look after the GPs that we have by removing some of that form-filling and all that red tape, enabling them to treat patients, which is why they entered the service in the first place?

Mr. Hutton: I agree. We need to reduce bureaucracy and the red tape associated with general practice, which is precisely what the new general medical services contracts will do.

Care Homes

8. Hugh Bayley (City of York): What steps he is taking to increase the number of nursing home beds and improve domiciliary nursing and social care services in areas with a shortage of such beds and services. [96680]

9. Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford): How many places are available in care homes in England; and if he will make a statement. [96881]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Jacqui Smith): The latest data show that there were some 528,000 places in care homes for residential or nursing care in England. On 23 July, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced new targets for older people's services, along with an investment of £1 billion to meet them. Those funds will help to provide 500,000 more pieces of community equipment, 70,000 more social care intermediate care places, 30,000 more home care services of over five hours a week, and higher fees for care homes where councils judge that that is necessary.

Hugh Bayley: My hon. Friend will be aware that there is a continuing, acute shortage of nursing-care beds in and around York, so it was with great pleasure that I noted that last April the Government made £1.4 million available to my local primary care trust to provide intermediate care. Regrettably, however, there is still no plan for where those beds will be provided, let alone a construction process. Will my hon. Friend speak to the local primary care trust and get a clear statement of the time scale for providing those much-needed additional beds? When she does so, will she also look at the possibility of the PCT providing 24-hour district nursing services, which might reduce the demand for beds, because some people who would otherwise go into care homes would instead be able to return to their own homes?

Jacqui Smith: My hon. Friend makes an important point about the need to develop intermediate care as a bridge between hospital and home, and often as a way of keeping people out of hospital in the first place. Notwithstanding his concern about the additional investment, I am pleased to note that in his area there are an extra 579 places for intermediate care, over and above that provided in 1999–2000. Given that we are, in addition, making extra investment available, as he pointed out, I undertake to look into the time scale for the development of further additional intermediate care provision in my hon. Friend's constituency.

Mr. Prisk: In my constituency, yet another care home, Park house, has just closed, turning away many vulnerable people. Rather sadly, a few days later, three of the former residents had passed away. Because the Government's care standards apply to newly registered homes, there is a financial barrier to us being able to turn that back into an operating establishment. Does the Minister recognise that the standards are a barrier to new homes being opened? Will she be more flexible about the way in which the standards are applied, so that new home places can be provided?

Jacqui Smith: As I discussed with the National Care Homes Association last Thursday, the introduction of national standards is an important step forward for provision, and many providers have argued for it over the years. The hon. Gentleman knows that we have been and are being flexible about environmental care standards with respect to existing homes, but we have a responsibility to improve provision for our older people in the care home sector, in particular. That is why we have maintained the standards, which received wide agreement for new provision and extensions to existing provision. Alongside that, we have ensured that local authorities have the investment necessary to pay the level of fees that will allow us to improve quality for our older people, not just in care home provision, but more broadly across the services that they need.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): How many hospitals employ social worker teams to draw down provision of care in the community? I understand that the Minister of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton), visited Ealing hospital, which has done pioneering work on bed blocking. The interconnection between that and care provision in the community is extremely important.

Jacqui Smith: Increasingly, with the extra investment made available to social services departments, they are taking more seriously their responsibility to maintain a presence in hospitals and to consider particularly the needs of older people and ways of ensuring that they are discharged more quickly, and they are undertaking that work more effectively. I know that there are also increasing numbers of accident and emergency departments where there are social workers and other professionals who can ensure that older people who come through that route can get care elsewhere, if they do not need to be admitted to hospital. My hon. Friend makes an important point which, with reference to the hospital discharge work book that I mentioned earlier, we are promoting through new investment and new guidance.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford): When will the Minister come out of her perpetual state of denial and recognise that there is a serious crisis in long-term care? Does she fully appreciate the distress and the problems being caused in certain parts of the country because of the loss of more than 60,000 beds over the past five years and the reduction of more than 100,000 care home packages for domiciliary care for households? More and more individuals cannot find places in their immediate vicinity and have to move further from home, family and friends to find a bed. The Minister cannot continue to live in her Alice in Wonderland-type world. She must face facts and come up with realistic ways of addressing the problem, which is causing so much distress to so many in this country.

Jacqui Smith: I very much agree with the hon. Gentleman that we need a realistic approach in addressing the problem. In particular, we need to provide local authorities with the resources to be able to support the kind of provision that is necessary. [HON. MEMBERS: "Where has the money gone?"] Out of the £300 million that we made available as the building care capacity grant, over £7 million went to the hon. Gentleman's county of Essex, which, for example, spent £413,000 to create new posts for older people's mental health services and spent money on additional assessor capacity and additional home-care training places. That is why it has been able to reduce delayed discharges from 16.9 per cent. in 1997 to 3.4 per cent. in September 2002 and to increase intermediate care places by 139 over 1999.

We live in the real world, but we provide the money in order to ensure that that real world can be made a reality for the people that we serve, unlike hon. Members opposite.

Teenage Cancer

11. Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): If he will make a statement on provision for teenage cancer patients. [96683]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Ms Hazel Blears): We are aware that teenagers with cancer have specific needs, and we are taking action to meet them. We are providing funding to enable more teenage cancer patients to enter trials of the latest treatments, and we are looking at how teenagers can participate in the design of health services centred around their particular needs.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I thank the Minister for that answer. Will she commend the work of the Teenage Cancer Trust? Because these units have been set up, cancer specialists have noticed a 15 per cent. improvement in recovery rates. Surely this improvement should be spread throughout the country.

Ms Blears: I am delighted to welcome the work of the Teenage Cancer Trust. I have no doubt that by providing an environment in which teenagers with cancer can be together it is aiding their recovery. It must be devastating for any family to discover that their teenager has cancer, and providing them with services appropriate to their needs is extremely important to us as a Government. I am hopeful that the Commission for Patient and Public Involvement in Health will begin to draw the views of young people, children, teenagers and adolescents into designing our health services, an area that has been lacking in the past. The Teenage Cancer Trust can help to show us the way in this regard.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford): A great deal of interest in this subject was shown at the palliative services care conference, hosted by my local primary care trust, that I attended last Friday. Can my hon. Friend say what success the Government are having this year in getting to the front-line services, especially the services provided by hospices, the £50 million of additional spending they announced last year for palliative care services for cancer patients and those others who suffer from terminal conditions?

Ms Blears: My hon. Friend raises an extremely important area of concern to hon. Members across the House. He highlights the fact that we have put an extra £50 million into specialist palliative care. We have set up a unique mechanism, a national partnership group involving the voluntary sectors—Help the Hospices and all those other partners who work in this area with us—chaired by the national cancer director, Professor Mike Richards, to ensure that the money not only reaches the front line but is spent in a way that makes a real difference to people in these circumstances. I look forward with great enthusiasm to the work of that national partnership group, which will make a significant impact in this very important area of care.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton): The Minister will be aware of the success of King Edward VII hospital in Midhurst in treating teenage and other cancer patients. The residents of west Sussex are grateful to the Government for the two-month moratorium for that hospital. Can the hon. Lady set out the latest position on whether the hospital will remain open for the long term?

Ms Blears: As the hon. Gentleman knows from the debate in Westminster Hall just a couple of weeks ago, the NHS has been working closely with the liquidator of King Edward VII hospital, and we have been able to provide some interim support to the hospital to ensure that it can continue to care for NHS patients. Clearly, the situation is still developing. The matter is in the hands of the liquidator, and the NHS will continue to work extremely closely with the hospital because our top priority is to ensure that NHS patients get continuity of high-quality care. That will be our foremost priority in relation to King Edward VII hospital.

Foundation Trusts

12. Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon): What non-financial freedom will be given to foundation trusts. [96684]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): The non-financial freedoms that will be open to NHS foundation trusts were set out in "A Guide to NHS Foundation Trusts", which was published on 11 December 2002.

Ms Drown: That guide said that foundation trusts would not have to have patients forums, but it did not mention much else. Some of the trusts that hope to gain foundation status are hoping that they will not have to supply information to the Department of Health and that they will be able to abandon Government initiatives such as modern matrons. Will that be the case, and if so, how will we deal with parliamentary answers? For example, will we no longer be able to say how many nurses the NHS has because we can only say how many there are in non-foundation trust hospitals?

Mr. Hutton: It is important that we strike a better balance between what is done at the centre in the NHS and what is done on the front line. That is very much what our proposals on foundation trusts are designed to do. It is perfectly possible to strike that better balance without compromising what my hon. Friend rightly identified as very important information about the performance of the NHS that all hon. Members would want to have. Those data will not be compromised or lost. That is one issue on which I hope I can at least reassure her.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I hope that the Macclesfield district general hospital, which has a three-star rating, will apply for foundation status. Is it the Government's view that that new status will give hospitals an opportunity to respond more quickly and positively to local needs? Is it not very important that the hospital trusts have a very close liaison with the primary care trusts? Otherwise, conflict could occur between them.

Mr. Hutton: Yes; I can certainly say to the hon. Gentleman that local service delivery and responsiveness are very much what we want NHS foundation trusts to be able to provide. We want them to be able to respond more effectively and quickly because less weight from the centre is bearing down on them. Generally, it has been my experience that, in all the hospitals that I have visited, people are able to identify problems, but it is usually local people who are best able and best placed to design solutions. I think that we should let that happen wherever possible. The Macclesfield hospital is an excellent hospital and the staff there are doing a brilliant job and thoroughly deserve their three stars. Of course, precisely what happens in relation to its application for foundation status is a matter for the trust and the local community.

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): As part of the Government's proposals on foundation trusts, the idea of local governance has been brought forward, which is very interesting. In developing that idea, will my right hon. Friend assure me that local communities will have a say in whether applications for foundation trusts will be made in the first instance? In an area such as west Yorkshire, for example, where the three-star Bradford trust may well be a foundation applicant, would it not be appropriate for my constituents in Wakefield to have a say in the process?

Mr. Hutton: We spelt out in the guide a clear process whereby applications would be made. I think that I can give my hon. Friend a very clear assurance on the point on which he sought clarification.

Ambulance Services

13. Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): If he will make a statement on ambulance services in England and Wales. [96685]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. David Lammy): The ambulance service in England has made real progress. Compared with 1997, trusts are responding significantly more quickly to a significantly larger number of calls. Ambulances are better equipped and paramedics better trained. The service still faces challenges, but with support and investment it will continue to succeed.

Sir Patrick Cormack: I thank the Minister for that rather general answer, but does he agree that the Staffordshire ambulance service, both in response time and general efficiency, has an exemplary performance? [Interruption.] I am glad that the Secretary of State is echoing those remarks from the Front Bench. What is the Minister doing specifically to encourage Staffordshire and to encourage other services to be as good as Staffordshire?

Mr. Lammy: The hon. Gentleman is right: Staffordshire has done particularly well, especially given the outbreak of a diarrhoea and vomiting bug last month. What is happening in Staffordshire is that the emergency care networks are requiring the ambulance trust to work with the primary care trust, the A and E department and also the emergency care collaborative, bringing best practice to Staffordshire as to the rest of the country.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell): While echoing the compliments paid by my hon. Friend to the Staffordshire ambulance service, hon. Members should be aware that in almost every part of the country ambulances with patients inside are sitting outside accident and emergency departments that are unable to admit them because managers will not take them in order to meet the four-hour waiting targets. At an extreme, we have discovered that ambulances have had to wait for 414 minutes for a patient to be admitted. Two weeks ago, in the west midlands, 50 per cent. of ambulances were tied up at A and E departments. Ambulance services have warned that they may not always be able to answer 999 calls. The situation is a scandal. Will the Minister say what he is going to do to put a stop to it? Will he explain why he has told ambulance service chief executives—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Lammy: I have to ask the hon. Gentleman not to talk down the ambulance service in that way. He is mistaken about the target—the clock starts to run after 15 minutes, so there is no incentive to wait outside in the manner that he suggests. What are we doing about the situation? The emergency care network requires our primary care trusts to work with the community, ambulance trusts, A and E departments and emergency care collaboratives. I recommend that the hon. Gentleman goes to see the collaboratives and the network at work.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): Will the Minister write to all ambulance trusts to ensure that they are complying with the Department's requirements on combating methicillin-resistant staphylococcus aureus—MRSA—given that corners are being cut regarding ambulances' cleanliness because they are being used so intensively?

Mr. Lammy: My hon. Friend may know that the chief medical officer is considering that matter and issuing best practice advice. At the same time, we are attempting to collect the right data across the NHS so that we can measure the incidence of hospital-acquired infection.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon): As regards ambulance services in England and Wales, in the last quarter the average response rate for category 8 calls—eight minutes in urban areas—was 51.8 per cent. For the best area it was 70 per cent. and for the very worst it was 38.5 per cent. Does not that suggest to the Minister that his colleague in Cardiff is either not doing her job or is not up to her job?

Mr. Lammy: That is very much a matter for Wales.

Hospital Treatment (Waiting Times)

14. Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton): If he will make a statement on progress with the reduction of time for patients waiting for admission to hospital for treatment. [96686]

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Alan Milburn): Waiting times on virtually every indicator continue to fall. The latest figures show that the number of patients waiting more than 12 months for hospital admission has fallen by 62 per cent. in the last year. Almost half of NHS trusts now have no patient waiting more than 12 months for hospital admission, which is ahead of the target set for April this year.

Mr. O'Brien: I thank my right hon. Friend for his response. Although there have been drastic improvements in waiting times, there are still areas that require greater attention. Will he examine the situation, especially in west Yorkshire and in my constituency? Will he also consider the problem of delays for people who are waiting for digital hearing aids, as it could be two years before my constituents receive that service?

Mr. Milburn: First, on digital hearing aids, my hon. Friend will be aware that last week I announced that an extra £94 million will be made available so that the 1.8 million people who are hard of hearing or deaf will get access to digital hearing aids on the national health service, for free.

Secondly, on waiting times for treatment, my hon. Friend is right to say that although waiting times across the piece are falling, there are pockets where they remain too long. As a consequence of the announcements that I will make today, from July this year, in his area of west Yorkshire, patients needing eye operations will have the choice of an alternative hospital where the waiting time for treatment is shorter. That will apply not only in parts of the north, but in parts of the south.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney): Is the Secretary of State aware that the reason for delayed admission to hospital in Oxfordshire is our dreadful shortage of nurses? Does he realise that we are short of approximately 400 nurses—a vacancy rate of 14 per cent.? When will he extend the freedoms that he plans for foundation hospitals to all hospitals so that we can pay the right rate for recruiting, motivating and retaining nurses? Without that, we shall never make progress.

Mr. Milburn: We want as many NHS hospitals and trusts as possible to gain the advantages of foundation status. However, the increase in resources is the main reason for the fall in waiting times in the NHS. The hon. Gentleman cannot acknowledge that because the Conservative party wants to decrease rather than increase NHS resources.

North Atlantic Council

12.30 pm

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Urgent Question): To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about yesterday's meeting of the North Atlantic Council.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): The North Atlantic Council has been examining the technical procedure for tasking NATO military authorities to undertake contingency planning to deter or defend against a possible—[HON. MEMBERS: "Where is he?"]

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is bad manners. I have granted an urgent question, which a Minister is required to answer. The Minister is here and should be heard.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has been here long enough to know that points of order are taken after the urgent question.

Mr. Ingram: Perhaps I should begin again because I do not know whether the country heard the answer that I was giving to the request for an urgent question. The Secretary of State is on his way to Washington to undertake important consultations with a major ally. [Interruption.] I am pleased that the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) shows some sensitivity.

The North Atlantic Council has been examining the technical procedure for tasking the NATO military authorities to undertake contingency planning to deter or defend against a possible threat to Turkey. Yesterday, three allies broke the silence procedure. They sought further information on the timing of such tasking. I emphasise that there is no debate on the need for the alliance to provide assistance to a NATO member if so requested.

Yesterday, Turkey requested consultations under article 4 of the north Atlantic treaty. The North Atlantic Council meeting that was scheduled for this morning has been adjourned until 4.30 pm Brussels time for further consideration of the proposal. It is too early to speculate on the outcome of the continuing deliberations.

Mr. Jenkin: First, it is astonishing that the Government had to be dragged to the Dispatch Box to discuss a major international crisis in NATO instead of voluntarily making a statement. It is even more astonishing that the Secretary of State did not come to the House yesterday, when we asked for a statement, instead of scuttling out of the country, albeit on legitimate business, to avoid cross-examination.

The Opposition broadly continue to support the Government's determination to disarm Saddam Hussein. We gave our fullest support to UN resolution 1441, which demanded "a currently accurate, full and complete declaration".

That has not been forthcoming. It also stated that Saddam Hussein should

"co-operate fully in the implementation of this resolution".

He has not done that. It further demanded

"immediate, unimpeded, unconditional and unrestricted access".

He has failed to provide that. Resolution 1441 also made it clear that it was a final opportunity for Saddam to comply, and that failure to do that would mean serious consequences.

It is now time for all those who supported United Nations resolution 1441 to hold to their course. Times when international unity is of such paramount importance are rare. The world and the people whom we represent demand clarity, resolve and unity. I warn the Minister that we are worried about the Government's undermining of British public opinion with such appalling, reprehensible and cack-handed initiatives as the dodgy dossier that No. 10 published last week. Can it be overstated how utterly counterproductive that action has proved to be? How can the Prime Minister now restore his personal authority after he has been so abjectly found out? When did the Secretary of State or the Minister first see the document? Did they give their approval for its publication?

Even more importantly, unless Europe and the United States can unite, what hope is there that other nations or our own people will follow our lead? All the Saddam Husseins and bin Ladens of this world must be delighted with the allies' present splits and confusion. The Queen's Speech reaffirmed just a few months ago that NATO was

"the cornerstone of Britain's national security."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 13 November 2002; Vol. 641, c. 4.]

NATO is needed above all today to be the focus of international unity. Instead, it faces an unprecedented crisis because of the French-led refusal to allow it even to plan for the defence of one of its member states. It is a pity that the Secretary of State's prior engagements prevented him from attending the Munich security conference with me at the weekend. All the other NATO Defence Ministers were discussing this issue there. What hope is there for our peace and security in Europe if this cornerstone of our security structure is now crumbling? What action are the Government taking to shore up the Atlantic alliance?

I have to tell the Minister—he will not wish to be reminded—that I and my colleagues have long been warning that the Government's support for the European Union's foreign and defence policy was playing into the hands of those who would destroy NATO. Today's chaos stems directly from the St. Malo declaration of 1998, which gave birth to an autonomous EU defence capability outside NATO. This was followed by EU declarations from Helsinki, Cologne, Nice, Faro, Copenhagen and, to cap it all, last week's Le Touquet summit with France. What on earth possessed the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister to sign a declaration last week with President Chirac proclaiming, with a certain irony, that "European security and defence policy should match the worldwide ambitions of the EU's common foreign and security policy"?

It is just a few days later—that declaration has hardly stood the test of time. It just added to the chaos that the Prime Minister first created at St. Malo.

[Mr. Jenkin]

Even if France eventually supports a second resolution, and joins in military action against Iraq, how will the Secretary of State and the Government prevent the minority in Europe from continuing to undermine NATO? The Government's complacency about NATO, about which we have been warning for years, has now been overwhelmed by events. We have always argued consistently that NATO must remain the paramount alliance for British and European security—the cornerstone of Britain's security.

Will the Government now commit themselves to restoring the primacy of NATO in Europe—a move that could command majority support in Europe, as it is France, Belgium and Germany that are now isolated? Will the Government now stop promoting EU security structures outside the NATO alliance, and put their diplomatic money where their mouth is and stop aiding and abetting France and its long-held ambition to destroy NATO?

Mr. Ingram: Let me try to deal with all the salient questions that the hon. Gentleman asked. There were not many. First, the Government have not been dragged to the House on this issue. We have responded to this urgent request, and our assessment of it was set out in the response that I gave to the hon. Gentleman. I hope that he listened to that, but if he did not absorb what I said at the time, he should read it tomorrow in Hansard.

The hon. Gentleman described the Secretary of State "scuttling out of the country". That is a very strange description of a senior Minister meeting our major ally as we seek to deal with one of the greatest crises that we have faced for a long, long time. That relates not to the future of NATO, but to all matters pertaining to Iraq and what will flow from it.

The hon. Gentleman referred to resolution 1441. He should be aware, as I am sure the country is only too well aware, that the Government have made their position clear time after time. We are determined that Saddam Hussein be held to account to the will of the international community. That is set out in resolution 1441, and in the 16 resolutions that preceded it.

The headline, as it were, for the hon. Gentleman's comments was the "dodgy dossier". That dossier is a Government document based, as is stated on the front cover, on a number of sources, including intelligence material. The first and third sections, which gave rise to most of the media coverage of its publication, are based largely on intelligence material. The first describes the extreme lengths to which Saddam has gone to hide his weapons and obstruct the inspectors: fact. The third describes the impact of the regime on the Iraqi people: fact. The second section describes the way in which the regime is structured: fact. Some of that is based on a work by Dr. Ibrahim al-Marashi, which, as has been made clear in retrospect, should have been acknowledged. [Interruption.] I ask the hon. Gentleman and others who find this humorous to bear in mind that I have listed the three facts on which the dossier is based. Do they disagree with any of those facts?

Let me now deal with the great moment in my life that occurred at the weekend, when I recognised that the hon. Gentleman was at the same conference as me in Munich. I did not know he was going; the Secretary of State did not know he was going. Perhaps if the Secretary of State had known that the hon. Gentleman was going, he would have changed his arrangements in order to hear the wonderful contribution that the hon. Gentleman made. The hon. Gentleman will have heard me, at the closing session of the conference, setting out very clearly our position on matters to which I have referred before, and also on some of the debate that was emerging over that weekend.

During a series of questions based on his obsession with the European Union, the hon. Gentleman alighted on his obsession with the French. Let me say this about NATO and the European security and defence policy and all that flows from it. All the NATO countries support this development; America supports it. Our reason for proceeding on those two fronts is to do with lifting capabilities so that there can be the best delivery and best possible interoperability in order to meet the threats that must be faced on a range of fronts.

If there is any doubt in the hon. Gentleman's mind that NATO is the cornerstone of the Government's security policy, I ask him to look at all the answers that have been given time and again. We have never called into question NATO and our commitment to it. Moreover, if the hon. Gentleman examines our present involvement in current decisions on Iraq, he will see that we are standing alongside the majority in NATO, trying to find a resolution to a difficult question.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): The hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) demonstrated the Conservative party's ability to sink to any occasion. Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that those of us who support the Government's determination to pursue the United Nations route, and who commend the Prime Minister's quest for a second Security Council resolution if need be, are nevertheless deeply concerned about the possibility that the "bull in a china shop" antics of Donald Rumsfeld will inflict serious damage on NATO cohesion, and also demonstrate how important it is for the Government to stress the fact that the next important stage in the essential disarming of Saddam Hussein is the appearance of the inspectors' report on Friday?

Mr. Ingram: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his broad support for the Government's approach. We have said where the Government's preference lies on the second resolution, but I should point out that in fact, it would be not the second resolution but the 18th. I shall not respond to his criticisms of the United States Secretary of Defence, whom I heard at the Munich conference give a very clear exposition of what needs to be done in support of the United Nations. The United States clearly has very strong views on this issue, and I would guess that the vast majority of the countries that were represented at that conference wholly supported his arguments. There were differences among one or two countries on the question of how we move forward, but that is the nature of an alliance. If differences exist, they have got to be expressed and understood by all the other members of the alliance. Then, we must find a consensus in order to move forward.

My right hon. Friend concluded by mentioning the need to ensure that Saddam Hussein does disarm—a point that we have made time and again. If he is not going to disarm in line with the will of the international community, he will be made to disarm.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford): I welcome this timely question from the shadow Defence Secretary, and I congratulate him on it. The reality is that one thing is certain in NATO, in this House and in the country: the case for war has not yet been proved by this Government, and anything that can help to inform the British public about the very important times ahead is to be welcomed. Does the Minister agree that the responsibility for resolving the current crisis in NATO lies with both sides, and that we must not allow multilateral treaties, international law or even the UN and NATO to become collateral damage in the legitimate desire to disarm Iraq? Allies on both sides of the Atlantic should take a step back and tone down the rhetoric.

Does the Minister agree that it is rather contradictory of the French to block planning on the ground that it will endorse war, while at the same time dispatching the Charles de Gaulle to the east of the Mediterranean? Does he also agree that if Turkey requests protection under article 4, it should be granted? France, Germany and Belgium have made their point—they should back down now. Does the Minister further agree that our focus should be on disarming Iraq, preferably through peaceful means, and not on squabbling within NATO? The allies have disagreed before, and no doubt they will disagree again. If Britain has a pivotal role to play, as the Prime Minister claims, now is the time to play it.

Mr. Ingram: Let me disagree with the hon. Gentleman's saying that the case has not been made. I do not think that he has been listening to what Hans Blix reported to the United Nations, or to the questions that he then raised, which still need to be answered. However, if the hon. Gentleman is still not convinced, he should wait until 14 February, when the final report is made; he should not close his mind now and make a prejudgment. This has been a balanced process.

I shared a platform with the hon. Gentleman not that long ago, when he made the bold statement that the Liberal Democrats would tell this Government that they should not be dictated to by the United Nations. I do not know exactly what he meant by that—perhaps he will have the opportunity to clarify his position during another debate. I know that his party is split between those who are anti-war, who will be marching this weekend, and those who are saying, "Let's not march." So they are all over the place on this issue, including the very leadership of the party. He made a typical Liberal Democrat response—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House is far too noisy. I point out that there was a great deal of keenness yesterday to get an urgent question. That request was put and, obviously, granted. I ask only that the Minister be allowed to respond. Also, when further questions are asked, they should be very brief.

Mr. Ingram: The hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch) said that the fault for the crisis lay with both sides. I do not accept that at all. Indeed, I see no question of fault in this matter. What I see is argumentation as the different countries in NATO try to articulate their position. The Government's position is clear: we stand with 16 of the 19 NATO members in moving towards providing the very thing that the hon. Gentleman said that he wanted, in the final part of his question.

This is about solidarity with Turkey and about defending a NATO member. It is not about NATO involvement in any operations against Iraq. The proposals to the NAC amount to prudent planning for defence and deterrence in relation to one ally, Turkey. They are consistent with NATO responsibilities and obligations. They do not imply any automaticity of NATO actions or deployments. We are obviously disappointed that three allies broke silence about what we believed were sensible proposals put forward by NATO Secretary-General Lord Robertson. The lack of consensus is to do with timing, not substance. The large majority of allies believe that prudent planning should begin now.

Those discussions continue. The hon. Member for Hereford has used rhetoric and bluster to try to allocate fault and say that one nation is worse than another. That is no way for allies to go forward. The hon. Gentleman asks that the rhetoric be toned down, but he exacerbates it with his bluster.

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, although this is a great crisis in NATO, it is more a sad comment on the parlous state of a once-great party? The Conservative Opposition have turned the crisis into an excuse for slagging off the French and the EU. Will not that seriously undermine the prospects for getting a second resolution in the UN, and a peaceful resolution of the Iraq crisis?

Mr. Ingram: My right hon. Friend makes the important point at the end of his question. The aim is to resolve the situation in Iraq. All of us wish that that can be done by peaceful means, but only Saddam Hussein can deliver the peaceful route. He can do that by delivering on what the UN has said in resolution after resolution. I am sure that, if we get a second resolution—although I repeat that it will be the 18th resolution on this matter—all allies will respond to the will of the UN, as set out in that determination. That is what we, collectively, must work to achieve.

I do not believe that this is a great crisis for NATO, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster) suggested at the beginning of his question. Those who study the history of the organisation will know that it has been at crisis' door before. Problems tend to get resolved, as all the allies share the same objectives—to defend borders and provide security, as well as to ensure peace and stability throughout the world.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden): I am one of those Opposition Members who are predisposed to support the Government on matters of national security. We have urged those of our constituents who have found the case less than compelling to trust the Prime Minister, on the ground that he must have intelligence information not available to us. Does the Minister realise that the publication of a document suggesting that the Government had so little information that they had to pad more than 50 per cent. of the document with material culled from the internet undermines the support that we have given, betrays Labour Back Benchers, and embarrasses those allies that rested their defence in the UN on that document? Who accepts responsibility for publishing the document? Have they resigned?

[Mr. Peter Lilley]

Mr. Ingram: I do not know whether anyone has resigned yet, but I am sure that, if that were to happen in the future, there would be great excitement among Labour Back-Bench Members about a possible reshuffle. I am grateful for the support of the right hon. Gentleman, and of those hon. Members who have looked at the facts of the situation, at the barbarity of Saddam Hussein's regime, and at the way he has consistently refused to accept the will of the international community. The right hon. Gentleman should think about what I said earlier in response to the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin)—that the dossier was based on three significant facts. The right hon. Gentleman should go forward consistently with those messages. In that way, I am sure that he will continue to build support in his constituency for what we believe to be right.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Does not the Minister accept that the stance taken by the French and some other countries in this time of crisis reflects a desire for peace rather than war? Is not it time that the Government reflected on the feeling, around the world and in this country, that George Bush is leading us by the nose into a war that is neither necessary nor wanted by anyone, and which will result in an awful lot of deaths of innocent people? Is not it time to stop, reflect—and, possibly, to turn around for once?

Mr. Ingram: I do not accept the premise of that question. All countries in the UN, and certainly the members of the Security Council, are committed to peace and not war. That is certainly true of those countries that may find themselves engaged in the conflict. Everything that this country has done with its allies has been aimed at finding a peaceful solution. I should respect my hon. Friend more if, in his question, he had condemned Saddam Hussein and the Iraqi regime. I heard nothing from him about that. We get an anti-American rant all the time, from people who forget that the matter is about the will of the UN. I disagree with my hon. Friend's premise, but I join him in wanting peace. He should come over to our side and help to show a unity of purpose among democratic countries. In that way, that tyrant and dictator can be thrown out.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal): Does the Minister accept, on reflection, that the Government are not convincing large numbers of people? Does it not therefore behove the Government to show that they are open in these matters? Would not it have been better if the Secretary of State for Defence had come to the House of his own volition yesterday and made the statement that the Minister has now made? Would it not have been better if someone had explained to the House before about what has come to be called the "dodgy" document? Would it not be better now if the House were to have a proper debate of this matter, on a substantive motion, so that the public could be reassured? The Minister must understand that many of us would like to say, "Trust the Prime Minister," but that we are unable to do so, given the evidence that is before us. Will he accept that this is a serious crisis, in this country as well as everywhere else?

Mr. Ingram: I do not think that the Government have said anything to indicate that we are not aware of the significant amount of doubt in people's minds, both in Britain and internationally. That doubt is evident in the US and every European country, and in other countries too. We have to accept that. As to openness, we have lost count of the number of statements made and of the number of the debates held on the matter. The arguments have been given proper ventilation. I remind the right hon. Gentleman that the matter will be determined not in the House, but in the UN. To my mind, and I suspect that the right hon. Gentleman agrees, Secretary Powell made a powerful and convincing case for the current position in Iraq, based on the inspectors' analysis. Another report will be made on 14 February. The strength and quality of the arguments in that report will be what convinces people in this country, across Europe and in the US. When that is explained, we have to ensure that we stand behind the UN when and if it determines through a second resolution that further action is required, if Saddam Hussein, at that stage, is still not complying with the will of the UN. It has to be determined at the bar of that house as well as at the Bar of this House.

Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate): Is it not the case that the Government have markedly failed to convince the British people, most centrally because people have lost trust in that Government? It was not the dossier that my constituents found dodgy but the Government's attempt to present it as exclusively the work of British intelligence agencies and as containing up-to-date material. My constituents are also concerned that the Prime Minister gave a clear commitment that a decision on whether to deploy British troops would be for our Government, our House of Commons and our people—a commitment that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence completely overturned last Thursday, using the somewhat lame argument of security. Surely the Government must understand that, if the people of this country are to be convinced, far from setting themselves up against the proposals that have been made by France, Germany and, yes, plucky little Belgium, and if the Prime Minister is determined to go down—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I asked for brief questions, not three questions.

Mr. Ingram: In my earlier answer, I tried to deal with the way in which we are taking forward the debate on whether we had trust. We have to make the arguments and win them. That is clearly the case for any matter of great importance. I recall, however, some of the lurid language that was used in the House—mainly by my hon. Friends—when we debated Afghanistan. They asked what would happen if there were bombing attacks on Afghanistan and said that if we put troops into the country the whole Islamic world would go up in flames and we would be faced with a cataclysmic response such as we had never seen before. They were wrong then and I ask them to reflect on that this time.

I note that my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Glenda Jackson) spoke about trust in "that" Government. I remind her that the Government are her Government. She stood on that manifesto and I hope that she can find trust both in the Prime Minister and in the Ministers who are trying to take forward some difficult decisions on behalf of the party to which I am proud to belong and to which I hope she, too, remains proud to belong—

Glenda Jackson: I am not.

Hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Ingram: On the question of commitment and the deployment of our troops and resources, that rests with the Government and with this country and, ultimately, with the House of Commons.

Mr. Michael Portillo (Kensington and Chelsea): I draw attention to a registered interest.

Does the Minister agree that the action that has been taken by France, Belgium and Germany is a severe blow to the alliance? Does he not recognise that that display of disunity within the alliance actually makes it less likely that this matter can be resolved peacefully? Will he confirm that in Kosovo and in Bosnia Europe was unable to settle matters and had to call upon NATO to do so? Does he, therefore, agree that the result of this action is more likely to damage Europe than the United States? Finally, is it not naïve of the Minister not to admit that a longstanding French objective has been to achieve defence arrangements for Europe that do not involve America?

Mr. Ingram: The right hon. Gentleman accuses me of being naïve, but I do not think that I was asked a question on that point, so it is not a matter of refusing to admit to anything. We can all have a view on the geopolitical stance of our allies and neighbours, and every country comes to its conclusion in a different way. That is what makes the strength of the alliance; we can hold and articulate different points of view and find a way forward. I think I have already replied on the way forward for the European Union, the European security and defence policy and NATO—they are complementary and NATO remains a cornerstone of our security policy.

I do not accept that this situation is a severe blow, because it depends on how one defines "severe"—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] Well, Lord Robertson may use a different definition from the right hon. Gentleman's. Lord Robertson has said that, yes, there are difficulties. However, consultations are going on and there will be another discussion at 16.30 and there may be further discussions. What are those discussions about? Reaching consensus. Let us wait and see the end of the process and not jump in halfway through, as the right hon. Gentleman's party has done.

Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): Would my right hon. Friend confirm that the fundamental purpose of NATO is to provide mutual self-defence for its members—one for all and all for one? To deny a loyal ally—Turkey—that defence when it is needed undermines the very purpose of the alliance. If that door is blocked by certain countries, will my right hon. Friend confirm that we will ensure, in co-operation with the United States and the Netherlands, that our ally, Turkey, receives that help in terms of Patriots, AWACS, aircraft and planning? Will my right hon. Friend also give the Government's position on Monday's proposed EU conference on Iraq? Is it not true that, at this stage, that can only further illustrate the disunity in the European Union and cast doubts on the possibility of a common foreign and security policy?

Mr. Ingram: With respect to my right hon. Friend, may I ask him to put some of those questions to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office? They do not relate specifically to what is happening in NATO and the discussions that are taking place.

I accept that there are linkages, but the way forward will be progressive. There is potential for damage at the moment, but any breaches that arise will be healed. That is the history of NATO and the same will apply—if it does not already—in any ESDP or in the relationships between EU countries.

The role of NATO is about mutual self-defence. I have set out exactly what is happening. If Turkey comes under attack or is threatened by attack, the countries that are currently seeking a different approach—France, Germany and Belgium—have made it clear that they will stand 100 per cent. by their commitment to NATO. There is no question about that. Let us put the matter in its true context.

Mr. Francis Maude (Horsham): Is not the point that Turkey needs protection before it comes under immediate threat? I strongly support what the right hon. Member for Swansea, East (Donald Anderson) said: Britain should be prepared to come Turkey's aid even before there is a NATO resolution.

On the dossier, which the Minister has accepted was unfortunately misrepresented, why cannot he just say sorry?

Mr. Ingram: Well, the right hon. Gentleman—[Interruption.] I am a bit perplexed as to why we are talking about the dossier when the question was about NATO and the current situation that some people are calling a crisis. However, I understand that the linkages can be made, that the matter is for discussion and that as I am the first relevant Minister to come to the Dispatch Box, I am being asked all these questions about it. I answered in depth on the Government's approach to the dossier. I ask the right hon. Gentleman to look again at the facts in the dossier; if he then disagrees with the dossier, he can call it anything that he wishes.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about whether Turkey needed support now. Perhaps I have not been clear enough and he has not understood the Government's position. The answer is yes, but as I have said, 15 out of the 19 countries also support that decision. We are clear about what we want from the NAC.

[Mr. Ingram]

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): May I ask the Minister not to cease repeating the fact that 16 nation states in the NATO Assembly support the resolutions and upholding the constitution? Will he repeat that Turkey's request under article 4 is before NATO today? It is very important to use tact and diplomacy at this time. Is it not a fact that the 18th resolution will enable every nation state in the Security Council to decide whether it wishes to uphold resolution 1441 and the charter of the United Nations and to render a signal service to the international community in relation to Saddam Hussein?

Mr. Ingram: I agree entirely with the three points that my hon. Friend makes, and I repeat that 16 out of 19 states wish to comply with his request. That is a significant figure which all of us should remember.

On my hon. Friend's point about the need for diplomacy, my opening response and, I hope, all my answers have indicated that that process is currently under way in the North Atlantic Council. Of course our ambassador to NATO will be working with those allies who are on side and those with whom we may have a disagreement to find a resolution. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for picking up the fact that this is the 18th resolution, not the second resolution. We have got to ensure that Saddam Hussein and his regime comply wholeheartedly, without question, with the will of the international community. That way lies peace.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): Will the Minister ask the wholly admirable Lord Robertson, who is doing such a splendid job, gently to remind the Germans, French and Belgians of just what they owe to the United States, this country and the collective security that NATO has provided?

Mr. Ingram: All the nations attended the Munich conference, and those points were made. There was no question at all in the minds of the three countries to which the hon. Gentleman refers but that they remember all too graphically what we went through in the middle of the last century and what spawned NATO, as well as the purpose of NATO and why it has to remain the cornerstone of our collective security; but I will certainly pass on his comments to my noble Friend Lord Robertson.

Mr. Tony Banks (West Ham): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is hardly helpful to restoring NATO unity for US politicians and members of the US Administration to make insulting remarks about our close allies—the French and the Germans?

Mr. Ingram: I will certainly draw my hon. Friend's remarks to the attention of my US friends, some of whom are US politicians, but it is not surprising that people descend to name calling at a time of what some would call crisis. It is right to say that we have got to take the heat out of all this. Let us get into the meeting and find a resolution to the current difficulties.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West): Will the Minister tell the French that the way the French ambassador in Washington, who was president of the Security Council the day after the events of 11 September, explained the need for collective action in dealing with Saddam Hussein and the horrors that he has visited on his own people and his neighbours was very convincing? I hope that the meeting this afternoon will lead to an overcoming of the difficulties.

Does the Minister agree with me and, I hope, the British people in general that the best way to stand with the people of Iraq, their neighbours and Turkey is for us to go on standing with the United States?

Mr. Ingram: I do not know whether I will get the chance to say anything to the French President, but again, I am sure that those from that country who study the debates in this House will ensure that the hon. Gentleman's comments are reflected through their diplomatic channels to their Government. There is no question at all but that all the countries, including the one he mentions, are resolute in their determination to ensure that Saddam Hussein complies with the wish of the United Nations. The debate is about the route to that, wherein lie some of the differences.

On seeking the resolution to support Turkey, if there were an ultimate threat to or an attack on Turkey, the three countries to which reference has been made would not say, "No, we will not stand by NATO." They have consistently said that they will do so. So this is more about timing than substance. I am sure that diplomacy will prevail, and we have to await the outcome of that diplomacy.

Ross Cranston (Dudley, North): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is wrong to over-dramatise this? Article 4 of the treaty imposes an obligation to consult. That has to be done in good faith. Certainly, since the 1950s, an obligation of solidarity has grown up in practice, but this is not an unprecedented crisis; it is nothing like a breach of the treaty and NATO is certainly not crumbling.

Mr. Ingram: In the interests of brevity, I agree entirely with everything that my hon. and learned Friend has said.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher and Walton): Does the Minister understand that some people in this country admire what the French are doing to hold us back from over-precipitate action? Some of the damage to NATO has been caused by our American friends, not at least in the disdainful way they treated the triggering of article 5 just after the events of 11 September and in the way that, over the past few days, Donald Rumsfeld has been virtually pre-empting Hans Blix's statement, which will come on Friday and which will in itself determine whether the United Nations believes that there should be war. I hope that he will convey that to President Bush, because we must reconcile the damaging threat to NATO's credibility, but that will not happen just by putting pressure on France.

Mr. Ingram: Of course the hon. Gentleman has a right to respect any country that he wishes and to criticise any other country. That does not happen in Iraq, and I know that he would stand four square behind what we are seeking to do to disarm Saddam Hussein and to bring stability and, I hope, peace to that country and that troubled region. I do not accept what he says about the United States pre-empting the United Nations. The US is setting out its case. That is part of open diplomacy. We are asked for our views because we are a democracy. Does the hon. Gentleman expect Secretary Rumsfeld to say, "I have nothing to say until 14 February"? That would be a ridiculous position to adopt.

Mr. Malcolm Savidge (Aberdeen, North): Having regard to the Prime Minister's repeated promises to treat war as a last resort and to the opinion poll in The Times today, showing that 86 per cent. of the British people believe that inspections should be given more time, may I ask my right hon. Friend whether serious consideration can be given to the proposals from our German, French and Russian allies or to any alternative option to allow more time to try to disarm Iraq peacefully?

Mr. Ingram: We have made it clear that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has repeatedly promised that that war must be the last resort. I hope that my hon. Friend takes that as a sincere and total commitment by the Prime Minister, the Government and every Minister who has responsibility in this area. I have said in response to earlier questions that peace, not the alternative, is a route that we want, but we cannot deliver that alone; only Saddam Hussein can do so. How can he do so? By complying with the wish of the UN.

My hon. Friend has consistently argued that we should recognise the will and wishes of the UN. We now have resolution 1441. I ask him to read it again and to realise that very clear commitments are laid down in that resolution. He now argues for more time and more inspectors, but how many more? How much more time does he want, and whom will that satisfy? It will satisfy Saddam Hussein, and it will continue his tyranny over the people of Iraq.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): Does the Minister acknowledge the primacy of the House of Commons' right to be kept informed and to take decisions on such matters? Does he acknowledge that he has been unable or unwilling, perhaps for very good reasons, to intimate to the House in detail during the statement what the Secretary of State is doing and saying at this moment to resolve this crisis? Will he give an undertaking now that, when the Secretary of State returns, he will come to the House to make a full statement on his meeting?

Mr. Ingram: The hon. Gentleman misunderstands what I said. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is not going to Brussels to involve himself in the NAC; he is going to meet senior—[Interruption.] Well, he will go a bit beyond that, but he will certainly meet Secretary Rumsfeld and others to consider—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let the Minister answer.

Mr. Ingram: I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker. I am trying to get to the nub of the question, in case there is any doubt in the mind of the hon. Gentleman. I accept the primacy of the House of Commons, as do the Government, and that is why we have had so many statements. I remind the House that we had a substantive vote on 25 November, and we will have another if we have to come to the ultimate decision that we do not want to reach.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): May I associate myself with the comments by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman)? I am one of the people who have put their trust in the Government, but I wish to address the question of the dossier. It must have been printed on rice paper and all been eaten, because no copies are available in the Vote Office. The Minister of State mentioned the facts, but part one of the dossier implies that Hans Blix and the other inspectors have been intimidated by the Iraqis. Where does that evidence come from? Surely if there was any sense of intimidation on the narrow issue of the inspections, Hans Blix would not be there. It must have been made up.

Mr. Ingram: That is a question of interpretation. I welcome the strong position that my hon. Friend has taken, and the resolute way in which he has continued to pursue what he believes to be right. He also constantly questions the basis on which he has come to his conclusions, while keeping in mind the centrality of what we seek to do. If he thinks that the inspectors have not been frustrated, I ask him to read again what Hans Blix reported to the United Nations. It is a central feature of what we seek that unrestricted access should be allowed to key people in Iraq, many of whom know where the dangerous weapons—and the means to build more—lie. The inspectors have had a difficult job to do, so let us wait to see what the report says on 14 February.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon): Will the Minister dissociate himself from the intemperate remarks on the "Today" programme by Washington-based hawks, in which they rubbished the efforts of France, Belgium and Germany in the attempts to disarm Iraq? Will he assure the House that the Government have given serious consideration to those countries' proposals?

Mr. Ingram: I speak for myself, not for those whom the hon. Gentleman calls hawks. I have set out the Government's position and I hope that the hon. Member agrees with us on the need to stand by the United Nations. I am glad to see that he nods at that, because that is progress. Will he also stand by the 18th resolution, if it means that Saddam Hussein has not complied with the will of the international community? If war is inevitable, will he support that position? I do not see him nodding to that.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We must move on.

Points of Order

1.23 pm

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We have just had a debate for the best part of an hour on the need for the House of Commons to be kept informed. By way of written answer, the Government today made an important announcement on asylum centres, in which they said that they will not proceed with the asylum centre in Hemswell in my constituency. As a Member of Parliament, you will appreciate that such issues are of enormous importance locally. Would not it have been polite of the Minister to have rung me up or to have tried to keep me informed in some other way through my office here, instead of informing my local press and sending a fax to some distant constituency office? Can you encourage Ministers who have such an announcement to make to come and speak openly to the House, or at least ring up the Members of Parliament concerned?

Mr. Speaker: I hope that the Minister concerned will have heard what the hon. Gentleman has had to say.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The House is grateful to you for allowing questions on the urgent question for almost an hour. That is much appreciated. You will be aware that events are moving very fast, and the British Government are now apparently drafting a resolution to the UN in support of the United States. Next week we will be in recess, but we could be at war by then. In these difficult times, what arrangements can be made for the House to be recalled or for an urgent debate and vote to take place before the recess?

Mr. Speaker: The recall of Parliament during a recess is not a matter for me. It is for the Prime Minister, and the hon. Gentleman should approach him on the matter. I can understand the concern of the House, but I have been assured by the Government business managers that the Foreign Secretary will make a statement on Thursday, which will provide an opportunity for hon. Members to make their case. Those who did not catch my eye today will be top of the queue on Thursday.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am grateful for that assurance, but—on a separate point of order—can you confirm that the Secretary of State for Defence has not requested leave to make a statement yesterday or today? We had an opportunity to put questions today only because my hon. Friend the Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) tabled a question that you deemed urgent. Was it not totally incorrect of the Minister of State to suggest that he came here willingly to answer questions today? He came here only because you rightly deemed that the question was urgent and forced him to come here.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Gentleman should not draw me into the argument.

Human Fertilisation and Embryology Amendment

Mr. David Stewart (Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend and extend certain enactments regulating the treatment of women undergoing IVF procedures and to extend the range of information and counselling provided by health authorities.

My constituent, Margaret Grant, is a highlander. She was born in Wick and moved to Inverness, in my constituency, to live and work. She married in 1984, but she was unable to have children naturally. In 1995, she started in vitro fertilisation treatment on the NHS in Aberdeen Royal hospital. Following a local press campaign, eggs were donated by another woman and fertilised by her husband. The five embryos were cryo-preserved and placed in storage.

Unfortunately, Mr. and Mrs. Grant separated at Christmas in 1998, and divorce proceedings were initiated. Shortly after that, Mr. Grant insisted that the embryos be destroyed, as was his right under the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990. The hospital contacted the appropriate authority, which confirmed that my constituent had no veto over the destruction of the embryos as they did not come from her eggs. Mr. Grant underwent counselling and insisted that his estranged wife should not be informed about the destruction of the embryos. IVF treatment is started as a partnership. Why should it be ended as a sole trader?

Almost a year later, in February 2001, Mrs. Grant found out that the five embryos had been destroyed. I shall quote her description of how she felt:

"When I heard the news I was absolutely devastated. I thought they were still there for me. It came totally out of the blue. I just went hysterical, absolutely hysterical. I could not speak about what he had done. It was my only chance of having a family, my one and only chance, snatched away from me in the blink of an eye—just like that, gone! I could not calm down. I just was not making sense of what happened. It's hard to describe what it was like. It was like losing a child and having real grief for a child that you could not have. Not a day goes by when I do not think about it. I still grieve for the child I cannot have. It is like a physical pain in the pit of your stomach.

It is too late for me but I will have some kind of peace of mind and closure if I know that I have helped other childless couples not having to go through this hell that I have been through."

In vitro fertilisation is a difficult issue that raises fundamental moral and religious issues. That is apparent in the Hansard reports of the debates on the 1990 Act. I understand the sensitivities surrounding the issue, and it is not my intention to reopen that debate today in a 10-minute speech. I want to ensure that no other woman in Britain undergoing IVF treatment suffers the same trauma, anxiety and depression as my constituent.

How can that be done? Relatively simply, I want to insert a new one-line clause in the 1990 Act, requiring that women undergoing IVF who have had eggs donated be informed prior to the destruction of embryos, so that guidance, counselling and advice can be afforded. I want to make it clear that I am not suggesting any change in the current law, whereby the two providers of the gametes involved—the woman who provided the eggs, and the man who provided the fertilisation—will need to give effective consent for the embryos to remain in storage. There will, of course, be no extra cost to the Exchequer, as the number of women involved in IVF in these circumstances is low, and counselling will be provided from existing resources. I also understand that the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority may be changing its code of practice to reflect this proposal later in the year.

I would like to thank the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Salford (Ms Blears), for her positive and constructive meeting with me about these proposals. I know that she supports the changes in the code, but has genuine concerns about opening up the Act as a whole. Even at this late stage, however, perhaps a Pauline conversion on the road to Damascus would be welcome. I commend this Bill to the House. Let us ensure that no more women in this country suffer the devastation, loss and pain experienced by my constituent

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. David Stewart, Mr. Alistair Carmichael, Julia Drown, Mr. George Foulkes, Mr. James Gray, Lady Hermon, Glenda Jackson, Ms Oona King, Miss Julie Kirkbride, Mr. Andrew Mitchell, Mrs. Eleanor Laing and Dr. Rudi Vis.

Human Fertilisation and Embryology Amendment Bill

Mr. David Stewart accordingly presented a Bill to amend and extend certain enactments regulating the treatment of women undergoing IVF procedures and to extend the range of information and counselling provided by health authorities: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 28 February, and to be printed [Bill 56].

Orders of the Day

National Minimum Wage (Enforcement Notices) Bill [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

1.32 pm

The Minister for Employment Relations, Industry and the Regions (Alan Johnson): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The minimum wage is now firmly established as a feature of the UK labour market and widely recognised as an outstanding success. Since its introduction in 1999, more than 1 million people have benefited from increased pay and we have tackled the appalling situation whereby poverty wages of £2 per hour or less were being paid. That has been achieved without a significant adverse impact on business, and the most recent Low Pay Commission report said that the vast majority of employers were complying with the minimum wage and that the enforcement system was working well.

When the Government introduced the national minimum wage in 1998, we had to create an enforcement system that was fair and effective, without putting unnecessary burdens on business. We did not want workers to have to take action on their own behalf against employers, although that remains an option for them if they wish. Low-paid workers are a vulnerable group and are sometimes unable or unwilling to take action on their own behalf. Fear and intimidation can also deter people from making a complaint.

For that reason, we created a network of 12 enforcement teams across the United Kingdom, operated by the Inland Revenue. Since April 1999, those teams have completed more than 21,000 case investigations and identified more than £12 million of minimum wage arrears. I should perhaps add at this point that the minimum wage legislation and this Bill cover both the national minimum wage and the agricultural minimum wage. Since 1999, minimum wage officers from both the Inland Revenue and the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs have been issuing enforcement notices to require employers either to pay the minimum wage in future or make good arrears of the minimum wage, or both.

For three years, therefore, our officers have issued those notices on behalf of current workers, who are still working for the employer in question, and former workers, who have left the employer. In August last year, however, the Employment Appeal Tribunal ruled in the case of Inland Revenue v. Bebb Travel plc that officers could only issue enforcement notices requiring the employer to pay the minimum wage in respect of current and future pay periods or in respect of current, future and past pay periods. That ruling means that enforcement officers cannot at present issue notices for past periods alone, and, therefore, that we cannot now issue notices to recover arrears due to former workers.

The Government are determined to restore the position to what we believed it to be before the Bebb decision, for two reasons. First, former workers are entitled to the minimum wage in the same way as current ones. If someone was not paid the minimum wage for some work that they did, for example, over the Christmas period, we believe that the employer should be required to make good the shortfall, regardless of whether the person concerned is still in their employment.

While former workers can take independent action against their employer, that is not as satisfactory as action by our officers for several reasons. The worker may need a reference from their former employer, or may believe that their chances of success against the employer are limited. As I mentioned earlier, low-paid workers are vulnerable and sometimes unable or unwilling to take action on their own behalf.

Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Cunninghame, South): My hon. Friend may not be aware that I had a case, which was properly represented by my union, the Transport and General Workers Union, of a young girl who was not being paid the minimum wage. The tribunal upheld the case six months ago, and the girl is still waiting for compensation. What will the new measure do for her?

Alan Johnson: If she is a former employee who claimed arrears since August 2002, the enforcement officers would not be able to act on her behalf. Her trade union would be able to represent her at an employment tribunal—that is unaffected. The issue is whether enforcement officers can act for former employees to claim arrears. That is the focal point of this particular amendment to the legislation.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): The Minister will be aware that my noble Friend Baroness Miller of Hendon, on behalf of the Conservative Opposition, supported this thoroughly sensible Bill in the other place, and I am glad that the Opposition are doing so today. Will the Minister reflect on the point that I made in moving an amendment to the National Minimum Wage Bill in 1998 that, when employees are deprived by cowboy or skinflint employers of their legitimate entitlement to be paid the minimum wage, and are obliged subsequently to take steps to recover it, a powerful moral case exists for them to be paid interest on top of the wage that they should have received?

Alan Johnson: The hon. Gentleman was a veteran of the National Minimum Wage Bill. As I recall, his mum advised him to support it; he ignored her advice, but now wishes that he had not. He raises an interesting point, on which, although it is not the specific focus of this legislation, I will reflect.

I was explaining why the situation whereby enforcement officers are not entitled to claim in respect of former workers is unsatisfactory. I noted that the worker may need a reference from their former employer or believe that their chances of success against the employer are limited. That is why we believe that former workers should enjoy the protection of Revenue officers—or DEFRA officers, if the agricultural minimum wage is at issue—in the same way as current workers.

It could also be argued—this is a very important point—that if we do not amend the Bill in this way today, we would create an incentive for unscrupulous employers to dismiss workers as soon as they knew that they were being investigated to escape the arrears of minimum wage payments. That would obviously be undesirable.

The second reason for restoring the previous position is that former workers tend to be much more willing to complain to the minimum wage helplines, which then kick-start the enforcement system. Current workers tend not to complain, for obvious reasons. When our officers follow up the complaints of former workers, they often discover that the minimum wage is being withheld not only from former workers but from current workers. We must not fall into a position where former workers think that we can do nothing for them and therefore stop making complaints. Such complaints can lead to benefit for everyone.

I hope that I have explained clearly why the Bill is needed. This is not a party political Bill and—as the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) said—it enjoyed support from both sides in another place. It is a small but important Bill that deals with complex issues that I will briefly summarise.

The Bill proposes to insert a new subsection (2A) after section 19(2) of the National Minimum Wage Act 1998. According to the decision of the Employment Appeal Tribunal, the existing subsections (1) and (2) of section 19 allow an enforcement officer to issue a notice only in respect of current and future pay periods or in respect of current, future and past pay periods together. The proposed subsection (2A) allows an enforcement officer to issue a notice on an employer to require him to pay minimum wage arrears to a worker or workers who have, at any time, qualified for the minimum wage. The notice will not have to cover future pay periods, so, if required, officers will be able to issue notices that cover minimum wage arrears for former workers. The proposed subsection will restore the position that the Government believed existed before the recent tribunal ruling.

Subsection (2A) has been drafted deliberately to allow enforcement officers to issue notices in respect of pay reference periods that ended before or after this Bill comes into force. I will say a few words about why that has been done. As matters stand, our officers have not been able to issue any notices on behalf of former workers since August 2002. That was a result of the Bebb Travel Employment Appeal Tribunal decision. Some workers may have taken independent action against their employers, but, although we do not have precise figures, I suspect that many will not have. Unless we allow officers to issue notices covering pay periods before the Bill comes into force, we will not be able to recover, on behalf of former workers, minimum wage arrears that might have arisen in the past.

The vital point to stress is that subsection (2A) will not change anyone's existing entitlement to the minimum wage but merely create a new means of enforcing existing rights to help former workers to recover their proper entitlement. We have approached the Attorney-General on this point and he has advised us that he is content for the subsection to apply in that way.

The proposed subsection (2B) will limit the period that an enforcement notice may cover. Any period that is "more than 6 years before the date on which the notice is served"

will not be covered. We expect few cases to go back for more than three years. That is because the minimum wage regulations require employers to keep pay records for only three years. We therefore expect it to be difficult for the Inland Revenue to pursue cases that go back further, unless there is no dispute about the hours worked, or the worker holds clear evidence, such as payslips.

Mr. Bercow: I understand the rationale behind proposed subsection (2B), but may I again ask the Minister about underpayment? He offered a bird's-eye view of underpayment, but will he help us further by telling us what proportion of the total amount of underpayment, or of the total number of underpayment cases, is represented by existing employees—who may have been given reassurances about their current and future pay entitlements, but not yet have been reimbursed for their previous entitlement? In other words, what is the extent of past underpayment for existing employees?

Alan Johnson: If I understand the hon. Gentleman correctly, he is asking about employees who have not left their employer, and is wondering how many of them are claiming arrears, in relation to the number of previous employees who are claiming arrears.

Mr. Bercow indicated assent.

Alan Johnson: I do not have precise figures. Of cases that are reported to the Revenue and DEFRA for action by our enforcement officers, we understand that the majority, perhaps the vast majority, are from previous employees—that is, employees who have left the work place. For various reasons, previous employees feel safer and more relaxed in pursuing claims. As I said earlier, when such claims are pursued, we often find that existing employees are not being paid the minimum wage. That is an important reason for introducing this Bill.

Mr. Bill Tynan (Hamilton, South): If the changes proposed in the Bill are accepted, enforcement officers will be able to pursue the past claims of individual employees. Would employees who had left employment still be able to pursue their claims through an industrial tribunal, or would the three-month period kick in, which would mean that they would have to use enforcement officers?

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend asks an important question. Since August 2002, when the Bebb Travel Employment Appeal Tribunal decision prevented enforcement officers from acting on behalf of former employees, those former employees have still been able to pursue their cases themselves. The three-month rule is very interesting. The reason why most enforcement orders go through the county courts—where the six-year limit that I mentioned earlier already applies—is that they are not governed by the three-month rule. That is why the vast majority of enforcement cases and of individuals pursuing cases on their own behalf go to a county court rather than an employment tribunal. The number of cases going to employment tribunals is tiny compared with the thousands of cases that enforcement officers take through the county courts.

Mr. Donohoe: What will happen in Scotland, where we do not have county courts? Would cases go to the sheriff courts?

Alan Johnson: I am not an expert on the Scottish legal system, but cases would go to whatever the equivalent of the county court is.

Proposed subsection (2B) is very important. I was explaining that we expect few cases to go back further than three years, primarily because the National Minimum Wage Act 1998 requires employers to keep records for only three years. In addition, the average minimum wage case goes back less than a year, and the Limitation Act 1980 means that the vast majority of cases that go through the county courts can go back only six years. Enforcement officers can also take cases to employment tribunals. Although the tribunals could allow enforcement officers to claim for underpayments of the minimum wage going back more than six years, that jurisdiction is rarely used. That is because—as my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan) suggested—claims in employment tribunals must be made three months from the date of the last underpayment of the national minimum wage.

Annabelle Ewing (Perth): Is the Minister aware that the Limitation Act 1980 does not apply in Scotland? Has the Minister had discussions with Scottish Executive Ministers about that potential inconsistency? Our general prescriptive period for civil recovery is five years.

Alan Johnson: I have indeed had discussions with Scottish Executive Ministers and I will come to that when I talk about agricultural wages. I did not have an answer to the question about county courts and their Scottish equivalents, but I will do by the time I reply to this debate.

John Robertson (Glasgow, Anniesland): Does my hon. Friend agree that it is a pleasure to see the nationalists turn up for a debate on the minimum wage? When the previous legislation went through the House, they could not be bothered to get out of their beds.

Alan Johnson: I shall skate gently over that intervention.

On the six-year limitation, let me stress that we do not propose to limit the existing rights held by individual workers, who can currently take cases that go back more than six years to tribunals. That point is at present irrelevant to the application of the national minimum wage, which was introduced only in April 1999, so six years of arrears have not been built up anywhere. We are not interfering with that individual right of employees. To do so would put workers claiming in respect of underpayments of the minimum wage in a worse position than workers claiming in respect of other contractual underpayments.

[Alan Johnson]

The Government believe that the proposed new subsection (2B) will bring clarity to the situation and ensure that the rights of both the worker and the employer are respected. The subsection was introduced following helpful debate in the other place.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): On the rights of workers, does my hon. Friend accept that one of the most difficult provisions of the National Minimum Wage Act 1998 to enforce for workers in the service industry relates to the difficulty of obtaining a true valuation of the wage given them from the tips of customers who, like me and my hon. Friend, are generous tippers? Those tips are intended to go into the workers' pockets, but how much is considered to contribute to the minimum wage? How would an enforcement officer settle disputes about the rights of the worker and the rights of the employer?

Alan Johnson: I have never been a generous tipper, but I was generously tipped as a postman at Christmas. I give due thanks to my previous customers.

The Low Pay Commission has considered this point. The national minimum wage legislation says that tips that are paid in wages from a pool that is intended for all the employees and that go through the proper channels of insurance and so on should be taken into account for the national minimum wage. Individual tips given to a waiter, postman or postwoman are not to be taken into account. The commission keeps such important but esoteric and sensitive questions under constant review, and we expect to receive advice on whether the system is working.

As I was saying, we believe that proposed subsection (2B) will bring clarity to the situation. It was introduced following helpful debate in the other place and follows the thrust of an Opposition amendment that the Government were happy to accept.

Clause 2 provides for the Bill to extend to Northern Ireland as well as to the remainder of the United Kingdom. That is the same arrangement as for the 1998 Act. The clause also deals with the enforcement of the agricultural minimum wage in Scotland. Agriculture is a devolved matter in Scotland and Northern Ireland and the agricultural minimum wage has been in place throughout the United Kingdom for more than half a century. Schedule 2 of the 1998 Act made a number of amendments to the Agricultural Wages (Scotland) Act 1949 to incorporate some of the provisions of the national minimum wage into the agricultural minimum wage.

The Scottish Executive have decided that they intend to lay independent, parallel legislation in the Edinburgh Parliament that is similar to the Bill but that covers just Scottish agriculture. The relevant subsection ensures that the provisions of this Bill will not be carried across into the Agricultural Wages (Scotland) Act 1949. For the sake of total clarity, let me say that this does not affect the existing structure of the national minimum wage or agricultural wages legislation.

I shall say a few brief words about Northern Ireland. Although agriculture is also a devolved matter in Northern Ireland, the House will be aware that the Stormont Assembly is temporarily suspended. My Department has confirmed with the Northern Ireland Office that it is content for the Bill to cover agriculture in Northern Ireland.

The Bill will not concern or trouble the vast majority of employers who are already paying the minimum wage. The only people who will be affected by it are the minority of bad employers who do not pay the minimum wage. I feel that it is right and proper that all workers—whether they are current or former workers—should enjoy the protection of our enforcement officers. I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk): I am extremely grateful to the Minister for that comprehensive and clear explanation of the Bill. Although it is a small Bill, parts of it are quite complicated. As he clearly explained, the Bill will effectively overturn the Employment Appeal Tribunal decision in the case of the Inland Revenue v. Bebb Travel plc. It will restore the position to what business, the unions and Parliament believed it to be. The Bill will allow employees or enforcement officers to claim for past wages. We obviously support the Bill, which has the backing of the CBI, the TUC and most business organisations.

I have a number of questions and points to put to the Minister. I refer to the retrospective nature of the Bill, about which there was much debate in the other place. As he explained, under the main 1998 Act, employers can take action on their own account or—this is the more likely route—action is taken on their behalf by departmental enforcement officers from the Inland Revenue or DEFRA. Civil legal action can be pursued in the county courts or in the employment tribunals, using the powers in the Employment Rights Act 1996.

In practice, virtually all the cases so far have been brought in the county courts, largely because cases in the employment tribunals must be brought within three months of the last underpayment. In the case of the former, the six-year statutory limitation applies but, in the case of the latter, cases could, in theory, have been taken in respect of underpayments going back more than six years. That was the position until my noble Friend Baroness Miller of Hendon tabled an amendment to introduce a six-year time limit for both categories of court. I am pleased that the Minister in the other place tabled a Government amendment restricting the work of Government enforcement officers to a six-year limit.

In the light of the Government's acceptance of the broad thrust of our amendment in the other place, my next remarks may sound a little churlish. However, as the Minister in the other place pointed out, companies are required to keep records for only three years. Bearing that in mind, should we not be thinking in terms of an overall three-year limit? After all, what would happen if a company does not keep records for more than three years—it has no legal obligation to do so—and, as a consequence, vital information is destroyed? For the sake of argument, let us suppose that the employee who is claiming underpaid wages has kept pay slips and other information. It is easy to envisage a situation in which the company—probably a small business—is seriously disadvantaged and is brought to court. It might have a strong case, but might be unable to produce the documentary evidence because it has quite legally been thrown away.

Will the Minister comment on whether he thinks that there is a case for having an overall limit of three years? Perhaps we can return to this issue in Committee, especially in the light of the fact that—Lord Sainsbury made much of this in the other place—companies do not have to keep records for more than three years. That may surprise some Members; it certainly surprised me when I first took this particular brief.

Mr. Tynan: If the employee could produce documentary proof such as a wage slip that showed that he had been paid below the minimum wage, would the hon. Gentleman still consider having a limit of three years instead of allowing it to remain at six?

Mr. Bellingham: We should certainly discuss this point in detail in Committee. I think that I am right in saying—the Minister might clarify this—that the Government amendment tabled in the House of Lords does not restrict the right of the individual employee to go back as far as he likes for cases going to the Employment Appeal Tribunal. The six-year limit applies to Government enforcement officers. I merely flag that up as an anomaly that may lead to conflict, particularly in the small firms sector. We must keep an eye on that—the Opposition are very concerned in deed that we should not overregulate that sector. However, we obviously support the Bill and the minimum wage.

Mr. Bercow: Does my hon. Friend accept that our wise support for the Bill will necessarily entail a future rise in employers' costs, for the simple reason that the logic of a minimum wage is that it will be periodically and affordably increased?

Mr. Bellingham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention. We have made it clear that we support the minimum wage in principle, and shall go into the next election campaigning in favour of it. If we return to power, we will look carefully at the levels recommended by the Low Pay Commission and, above all, at the burdens on business. My hon. Friend is right, as our priority in government will be to look at the many other burdens that the present Government have put on business which need to be removed quickly.

Mr. Connarty: Could the hon. Gentleman turn his fine mind to the point about records that I made to the Minister? There is a dispute in the service sector about whether someone should give a tip to the person serving them or to the management. How do we reconcile the enforcement process with the constant barrage of complaints that money given to people who are serving ends up as part of their minimum wage, and does not go directly into their pocket?

Mr. Bellingham: I accept the hon. Gentleman's point. When we give a tip to someone, whether a taxi driver or a helpful waiter in a restaurant, we expect it to go to the employee. Even if it does not go straight into that person's pocket, we expect it be pooled and given to them later, with no consequences whatever for the minimum wage. If employers are abusing that practice, the Inland Revenue or other enforcement officers may like to look into that. Perhaps the Minister could comment on the problem when he makes his winding-up speech at the end of this short debate.

Baroness Miller moved, then withdrew, an amendment in the other place that would have brought the Bill into effect immediately, not in two months' time. Lord McIntosh, like the Minister, confirmed that the Inland Revenue believes that well over 250 cases involving former employees are currently on hold. It is only fair that those cases are dealt with as soon as the Bill receives Royal Assent. Two months may not seem long to wait, and Lord McIntosh made it clear that the two-month delay will not affect entitlement, but many low-paid employees have been deprived of their rightful wages. Their cases are outstanding, mainly in the county courts, but some in the Employment Appeal Tribunal. Surely, those cases should be heard immediately, not after a two-month wait.

We have had a look at what has happened to other measures. The Minister may or may not be aware that quite a few Bills are enforced immediately. The Northern Ireland (Elections) Act 1998 was enforced immediately, as was the Education Act 2002, the Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001, the Armed Forces Act 2000, and the Freedom of Information Act 2000. Furthermore, an investigation was carried out in 1979—I know that that is some time ago and that Government practice has changed—by a working party from the Statute Law Society which looked at 105 Acts passed between 1 January 1978 and April 1979, a period of 14 months, to ascertain when they came into force. It found that 41 Acts came into effect on the exact date on which they were passed; 12 Acts came into force on a date specified in the Act; and 14 came into force on the expiry of a two-month period.

As I pointed out, that investigation was conducted a fair while ago, but I do not believe that there has been a recent appraisal of enforcement. I cannot understand the argument by the Department of Trade and Industry that there must be pressing reasons for a Bill to be passed and enforced immediately. The Attorney-General has apparently advised that there are no pressing reasons for the Bill to be enforced immediately, so two months can elapse. We are going to a lot of effort to pass this small Bill, and a lot of people are waiting for their due entitlement in wages. We should therefore get rid of that two-month delay—as soon as the Bill receives Royal Assent, those cases should be dealt with. The less time that is lost, the better.

In an earlier intervention, my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) made a point about underpayment. People have been underpaid and deprived of something that is their legal right. I agree with my hon. Friend—there is a strong case on the payment of interest, which the Government could consider. The Minister seemed to show approval when the suggestion was made. Surprisingly, at no stage in the debate on the National Minimum Wage Act 1998 was there any amendment about or discussion of interest being paid.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend's sense of equity and fairness never deserts him. On a point of fact, may I emphasise that such an amendment was tabled. I spoke to it shortly after 5 o'clock one morning.

Mr. Bellingham: I humbly accept my hon. Friend's correction. I read in detail the debate on the 1998 Act, but I must have missed that amendment. I apologise to my hon. Friend, who has just made a bid to serve as a Committee member. He will have ample opportunity in Committee to table another amendment, which I very much hope will succeed. Perhaps the Minister will comment on the payment of interest when he winds up.

The Government made an appeal against the Bebb decision. The Bill has been introduced to obviate the effect of the tribunal's decision, but will the Government pursue their appeal in any event? If so, what is the logic behind that? There was mention of such a course of action in another place, but no satisfactory explanation was given. The Bill will obviously cost a certain amount of public money. We hope that the Bebb case is a unique one-off. The parliamentary draftsman may have examined the 1998 Act with enormous expertise and in great deal, and the relevant parts of the measure were debated here and in another place. However, debate in the Commons was sometimes curtailed, although not as much as debate on Bills is now curtailed, by a timetable motion. I very much hope that the drafting mistake was not the result of lack of scrutiny.

The 1998 Act was controversial when it was first introduced, but far too often the Government impose a timetable motion on Bills that are not necessarily controversial. In the previous Session, I served on the Committee that considered the Adoption and Children Act 2002, which contains about 120 sections, the overwhelming majority of which are non-controversial. However, a timetable motion was imposed, so about 50 sections were not debated in the House. Much of the measure went to the other place undebated. That is an intolerable and wretched state of affairs. Perhaps a small lesson can be learned. Although the Bebb decision may not have been the result of poor scrutiny in either House but of unfortunate drafting, if more time had been spent going through the 1998 Act section by section and looking at every detail, perhaps such an omission would have come to light.

Perhaps we should examine the drafting in this and other Bills. For example, the Minister and I know what clause 2(4) means, and he has tried to explain it, but there may be other hon. Members who do not know what it means. It states:

"But, notwithstanding section 20(2) of the Interpretation Act 1978 (c. 30) (construction of references to other enactments), the reference in section 1 to section 19 of the National Minimum Wage Act 1998 (c. 39) shall be taken not to include a reference to that section as applied by section 3A of the Agricultural Wages (Scotland) Act 1949 (c. 30)."

The Minister explained succinctly that the amendment made to the National Minimum Wage Act 1998 by clause 1 is not to have effect in the application of section 19 of that Act in relation to the agricultural minimum wage in Scotland. That is simple. Why must the drafting be so convoluted? Why is the clause so complicated, when the guidance in the explanatory notes makes the matter so simple? If we used common sense a little more, we might avoid some of the mistakes that were made in the 1998 Act.

Mr. Bercow: Does my hon. Friend agree that such drafting recalls the wisdom of Churchill's legendary and memorable statement:

"This is the sort of English up with which I will not put"?

Mr. Bellingham: I agree with my hon. Friend. Anyone who doubts that should get a copy of the Bill and read and re-read clause 2(4) until they understand it. It is extremely convoluted and long-winded.

In conclusion, we support the mini-Bill. We hope that Bebb was a one-off error, but if any Government have to introduce a Bill to correct a drafting error, that means, by definition, that there has been a failure. Such a Bill is not inexpensive. It costs public money, and any unnecessary expenditure of public money is painful, so let us hope that lessons have been learned. I hope that the Minister will respond to the few questions that I put to him.

2.12 pm

Mr. John Lyons (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): The Minister and the research paper have both described the purpose of the Bill: to close the loophole that exists. That is to be welcomed. If we do not do so, it will encourage abuse by bad employers. Most fair-minded people, both in and out of Parliament, would agree that the loophole must be closed.

I believe that the Employment Appeal Tribunal made the wrong decision. The National Minimum Wage Act 1998 never intended to give the tribunal the opportunity to make such a decision. In the case of Inland Revenue v. Bebb Travel plc, I believe that the decision of the EAT breaks the spirit and intention of the 1998 Act. It sticks in my throat to say so, having completed a tax return for the end of January, but on this occasion the Inland Revenue got it exactly right.

The Act authorises enforcement orders for employees who have left employment. There is no room for debate or discussion of that; it was the purpose and intention of the legislation. The Employment Appeal Tribunal confuses individuals with employers, and that confusion creates tremendous uncertainty in the labour market. The national minimum wage legislation was derided by many in the House, who predicted that it would wreck jobs all over the country and create economic havoc, but it has worked well, as the Minister said in his opening remarks. However, it demands compliance and protection 365 days a year and 24 hours a day. It cannot be used part-time, as the Employment Appeal Tribunal would lead one to conclude.

Employers who are using the loophole are breaching the minimum wage in a way that no one could have foreseen and no one would support. The Act was framed to assist employees, particularly through the use of enforcement officers. That was an important part of the legislation.

Employment law is littered with cases of retrospective payment in terms of wages, holidays and bonuses. People leave their employment and have a case for the payment of wages, bonus, holiday pay or even additional holidays. That is bread-and-butter fare for personnel managers throughout the country. It happens daily and such cases are resolved retrospectively. Delays often occur because of failure to agree terms and conditions on a specific date—the anniversary date for employers and employees. That is not unusual, nationally or locally. The anniversary date drifts on for days, weeks and months. In that period, people might decide to leave their employment, but that does not deny them the right to make a claim for the pay increase that might be agreed after they have left, the holidays that might change after they have left, or holiday pay after they have left.

John Robertson: My hon. Friend is very knowledgeable on the subject, which we have looked into in the Scottish Affairs Committee. Does he agree that the case under discussion may be only the tip of the iceberg? It is not unusual for people to leave employment when they are not being paid what they should be paid, but they are too frightened to come forward and allow themselves to be used to test legislation or to help to change the law. The Bill is important for low-paid people and the protection that they need. It is up to us to make sure that it goes forward.

Mr. Lyons: I thank my hon. Friend for raising that important point. He and other colleagues on the Scottish Affairs Committee have looked extensively at compliance, particularly for low-paid workers. I welcome that work and hope it continues.

As I said, delays beyond anniversary dates is normal fare for trade unions and employers, but it is resolved without difficulty in hundreds of agreements across the UK. Enforcement officers are important for the reason that my hon. Friend suggests. There is fear and intimidation, and enforcement officers are an alternative way of trying to resolve a grievance independently of the employee concerned. I would welcome an increase in enforcement officers.

As the Minister mentioned, the employee can take a minimum wage case to an employment tribunal or to the county court, and of course enforcement officers can do the same thing. The figures prove conclusively how important enforcement officers, the tribunals and the county courts are: since 1999, £9 million has been raised from failure to pay the minimum wage. That is a substantial sum, particularly for low-paid workers. It means an awful lot to them.

Tony Cunningham (Workington): Would you agree, however, that many low-paid workers are not in trade unions, and find it extremely difficult to put a case together and go to the tribunal? Would you not—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The hon. Gentleman is not the first this afternoon to transgress with regard to the form of address. He should remember by now that he should refer to his hon. Friend in the third person.

Tony Cunningham: My apologies, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Would not my hon. Friend tell people in that situation that the best way to protect themselves is to join a trade union?

Mr. Lyons: I thank my hon. Friend for raising that point. I always argue that that is the best way for people to ensure the best terms and conditions for themselves and ensure compliance by their employers with the minimum wage.

I said earlier that the Employment Appeal Tribunal had made a poor decision. I still feel that, having read the decision a number of times. I think that the Government felt that the tribunal had not properly interpreted the legislation. In their evidence to the Low Pay Commission, the Government said:

"The Government believes that Ministers clearly intended, when introducing the Act, that compliance officers should be able to pursue cases involving workers who are no longer employed by the employer in question. We are determined to help low paid workers and intend to restore the position as soon as possible, so that the Revenue and Agricultural minimum wage compliance officers can once more pursue these cases fully."

That is an absolutely correct approach to compliance with the national minimum wage.

In another place my noble Friend Lord Sainsbury said:

"First, former workers are entitled to the minimum wage in just the same way as current ones. If someone was not paid the minimum wage for, say, some work they did in the summer, then we believe that the employer should be required to make good the shortfall, whether the person is still in their employment or not."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 10 December 2002; Vol. 642, c. 152.]

Other hon. Members have referred to the fact that in another place Lord Razzall, the Liberal Democrat, and Baroness Miller of Hendon fully supported the changes to the legislation that would guarantee much more protection to employees. That is very important.

Another point that has been raised is that some workers fear raising the issue of failure to pay the minimum wage, or seem to be in difficulty about how best to raise it. If they are not in a trade union or do not feel comfortable about going to an employment tribunal, they often finish up at a citizens advice bureau trying to explain their circumstances. I am sure that they always receive assistance on how to pursue the matter.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries): My hon. Friend is on an extremely important point. He may have had the same experience with some of his constituents as I have had with some of mine, who may not wish to say anything about the national minimum wage and simply tend to look for another job where it is being paid. Not having been paid the appropriate going rate, they fall into the very category that the Bill is looking at, in that they become ex-employees.

Mr. Lyons: My hon. Friend raises a very important point. The evidence proves quite clearly that people in that situation often feel that they are forced to leave a job rather than pursue the issue, as my hon. Friend described.

I should like to give the House four examples. The Scottish Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux has produced documentation on the question of the national minimum wage. It says:

"A North of Scotland CAB reports of female client who works as a cleaner. The manager is withholding the annual pay increases until October when the NMW increases. Her contract states that increases come in April of each year. The delay will mean that all employees will lose 6 months of increased pay."

[Mr. Lyons]

This is where there are problems related to the minimum wage: other actions are taken because of it as some very awkward employers try to find ways around the legislation. That is why all of us need to make sure that the legislation is tightened up in a way that makes it impossible for people—

Mr. Bercow: I am very grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I have been listening to his speech with interest and approval. What the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Brown) said was perfectly valid, but it is worth while also looking at the other side of the equation. If former employees cannot secure redress, even though of course they no longer have any reason to be anxious about the reaction of their former employer, there is obviously scant hope for existing employees seeking to secure redress for past underpayment. In that sense, there is a commonality of interest in supporting the Bill between current and past employees.

Mr. Lyons: That is a very valid point. The position clearly is that when people leave a job, the fact that they have highlighted a problem, either to the compliance people or the citizens advice bureau, may well bring in enforcement for people who are still employed by that employer. There is clear evidence that that has happened in the past. We return to a situation in which there may be a collective of workpeople unprepared or frightened to raise the issue, despite the fact that colleagues are leaving regularly, but the enforcement officers give that alternative, saying "We are here to find out what is happening on the minimum wage." No one knows who has reported the matter, and there is no pressure, hopefully, on employees for that reason. But this leads to an interesting area of work, which is—

Mr. Michael Weir (Angus): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that there can be a problem with enforcement in that the minimum wage is not always enforced in the same way throughout the country? In some cases enforcement officers have gone to a firm for an employee and have looked only at the wages of that employee rather than of everybody in the firm. Unless it is done throughout the firm, it can have the effect of identifying the employee.

Mr. Lyons: That is an important issue that needs to be considered. Enforcement should be done across the whole range of people in the organisation concerned, rather than in specific cases. I commend the work of the citizens advice bureaux, because they are trying to assist people on a daily basis with problems related to the minimum wage and other associated difficulties.

I have another example from the Scottish Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux:

> "An East of Scotland CAB reports of a female client who received a 'new' contract of employment confirming entitlement to paid holiday leave. However, the contract also stated that her salary included 8 per cent. to cover the cost of paid leave."

So the minimum wage had a deduction of 8 per cent. to pay for paid holidays, which is nonsense and unlawful. We need to try to make sure that we cover this matter in any future legislation so that the loophole for employers to do that is closed and people are employed in a very fair way.

Here is another example:

> "A North of Scotland CAB reports of a female client employed as a cleaner paid 28p an hour above the NMW."

Hon. Members will probably think that it is good that that extra 28p is being paid, but > "When she inquired with her employer about entitlement to holiday pay, she was told that the 28p over the NMW is paid to cover her holiday entitlement."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have allowed the hon. Gentleman a certain amount of scope in making his speech, but the time has come to remind him of the content of the Bill. This is not a general debate about the minimum wage and other perceived defects or advantages. It is about this particular Bill, which seeks to correct a particular loophole.

Mr. Lyons: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for your guidance.

I return to the point that I started on. The loophole is there. We need to close it. Everyone will agree with that. I give my hon. Friend the Minister my full support.

Mr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham): I wish to add to the general air of consensus and support for the Bill, which, as has already been noted, has the support of the Confederation of British Industry as well as the Trades Union Congress and all three parties in the House. Indeed, it was supported in the other place by my colleague, Lord Razzall.

Although you have just reminded us, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that this is not a general debate on the minimum wage, it is probably fair to respond to the Minister's introductory comments, in which he rightly and fairly observed that the minimum wage legislation has been a success story. One of the reasons for that is that employers as well as employees have bought into it and accepted it. That is, at least in part, because of the way in which the system has operated. Effectively, we have had a relatively successful, growing economy and a tightening labour market. The minimum wage has increased the supply of workers because a lot of people at the bottom end of the pay scale now feel that it is more attractive to work than to remain on benefits. Employers have benefited from the system because there is more labour, workers have benefited because they are better paid and the Government have benefited because there are fewer benefit payments. Thus a triple gain has been made as a result of the way in which the minimum wage system has operated.

What has yet to be demonstrated is that that system works equally well when there is a downturn in the economy. There may be questions about the effect of such a downturn on the demand for labour. Whether the system works well in those circumstances will partly depend on whether the generally successful system of setting the minimum wage at an economically sensible level continues. The Low Pay Commission's determination of that level in accordance with economic conditions seems to be a key element in the formula.

The other element in the formula that has contributed to the system's success is the enforcement mechanism, which is what we are discussing today. It has not been emphasised enough that an important aspect of the current enforcement mechanism is that it functions to a very large extent on a voluntary basis. It is because employers have accepted the minimum wage and, by and large, enforced it without pressure and extensive form filling and bureaucracy that the system is working well. An admirable balance has been struck between an effective enforcement mechanism and one that is not as enormously intrusive and bureaucratic as those associated with other instruments, such as the working time directive. Employers are required, by and large, to enforce the system themselves, but that system gives individual workers the opportunity to take action, backed by enforcement officers. That strikes me as exactly the right balance.

The Conservative spokesman mentioned the question that I now want to ask: why are we back here with this legislation? I was not involved in discussion of the original legislation, but it seems obvious with hindsight that somebody should have asked about retrospective payment and questioned why it was not covered. I am not pointing fingers at anybody. Clearly, nobody in the House of Commons or the other place picked up on the problem, nor did Government draftsmen and administrators, but I am still baffled about why the provision slipped through. It may have done so because of a lack of scrutiny, as the Conservative spokesman suggested. There may also have been a particularly quirky ruling by a judge. If that is the case, it might have been more appropriate to have an appeal process than to introduce fresh legislation.

Mr. Bellingham: As I understand it, the old law covered future and present underpayment; it also covered past underpayment if it was combined with those two things. According to the tribunal, it was underpayment in the past only that was not included.

Dr. Cable: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that clarification, but it seems odd that we are returning to the Chamber to debate the matter, whatever the reason.

Annabelle Ewing: As I understand it, an appeal is pending, as the Inland Revenue is appealing against the Employment Appeal Tribunal's decision.

Dr. Cable: I thank the hon. Lady for that intervention, which raises the question whether, if the Government win the appeal, the amendment introduced by the Bill will be superfluous or whether it introduces a new element into the process.

I want to speak only for a few minutes, so I shall return to the issue of substance and consider why the process of retrospective payment is important. Many of the arguments have already been covered. It is clearly unjust that people should not be able to claim back payment of the minimum wage if they have left the employer in question, and especially if they were dismissed. The threat of dismissal on pursuing rights to the minimum wage is especially important and it is right that people should have the entitlement in that regard. I want also to reinforce the other point that has been made: many people will be much bolder in pursuing a claim once they have left the employer and the threat of dismissal is no longer hanging over them. There are good reasons why the retrospective issue must be addressed.

It has not been mentioned that large sums may be involved. There is a lot of difference between a current minimum wage problem, which will involve a few pounds a week, and three years of underpayment, which may involve several thousand pounds. In those circumstances, it is much more likely that a bad employer will resist and force the process to a tribunal, and that an enforcement officer will have to be engaged. There are very good reasons why there should be proper protection with regard to retrospective payment.

My final point relates to limitations, which were raised in another place by Baroness Miller. The Government have said—I think that I understood the argument correctly—that the problem is to some extent academic, as after three years there is no longer a requirement to collect data. Why should there be a limit? Presumably, the legislation will still be here in 10 years. There may be some hard cases in which people were working in very malign circumstances with oppressive employers who systematically underpaid them for very long periods. There may be good records to demonstrate what has happened in such cases. Why should people who have suffered such enormous losses find that they have run out of time for arbitrary reasons? If they can demonstrate their case, it will not matter whether three, six, nine or 10 years are involved.

Mr. Bercow: The hon. Gentleman raises an important issue. Does he accept, however, that there is a powerful case for amending the Bill to provide for mandatory interest charges on underpayments, given that that would be widely regarded as right in itself and that many people who have been maltreated through illegal underpayment for long periods will thereby have fallen into indebtedness?

Dr. Cable: That is a very good point. I would have made it slightly differently, but I agree that, after long periods of underpayment, the real value of people's payment is lost because of inflation—assuming that inflation is present. In any event, there should be some compensation for such loss, and interest payments seem a sensible and fair way of dealing with the issue.

I want to question why there is a need for a formal limit on the period involved and why enforcement officers cannot come forward in the small number of cases that will arise and support a claimant in exceptional circumstances involving a significant backlog of arrears, perhaps in a decade's time. That is a small technical point that the Minister may not have considered.

In broad terms, I am glad to see that there is support for the Bill in all parts of the House. The fact that we all now support the principle of the minimum wage is remarkable in itself, given the controversy about it five or 10 years ago. Given that we all support the change that the Bill makes, perhaps the House can proceed to other business fairly speedily.

Mr. Chris Pond (Gravesham): Only a few hours ago, I received a phone call from the Low Pay Unit—an organisation for which I worked for 18 years—asking whether I would like to collect some of my personal possessions from it, as it is sadly having to wind up its operation this week. It is a sad irony that we are discussing a measure such as the Bill on the very day when the organisation that had kept such issues in the forefront of our attention for so many years is sadly no longer with us.

I also welcome the fact that we are discussing the Bill today. Like the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow), I was privileged to be involved in seeing the original minimum wage legislation through Parliament. We tried to anticipate and close every possible loophole, but we clearly failed to do so in respect of this Bill. I am pleased that Opposition Members are with us on the Bill, because I remember sitting long hours through the night while the minimum wage itself was being opposed.

The particular loophole in question is important because it can render enforcement of the national minimum wage almost completely ineffective. This small Bill will help to bring the minimum wage back to life. It is important because it gives back to enforcement officers the power to enforce payment of arrears of underpaid wages. As the Minister and other hon. Members have pointed out, trade unions may still be able to pursue payment of arrears on behalf of their members, but many of the lowest paid are not members of trade unions. They are often in a vulnerable position and work in small establishments in isolated circumstances.

David Hamilton (Midlothian): One of the loopholes that bad employers—small employers—exploit is that they are not required to recognise trade unions if they have only 12 employees. Does my hon. Friend agree that a change in that legislation could be helpful?

Mr. Pond: That is a major problem. I would not agree with bracketing bad employers and small employers together, however, because many small employers are very good employers. We must encourage as far as possible the employers—the firms—to be fully involved in the negotiation process at a collective level, and ensure that people working in small firms feel that it is worth their while to become members of trade unions. That is why people in those circumstances will rely on enforcement officers to make sure that they get their entitlements under the law. That is not necessarily something that they can pursue through trade unions, although I pay tribute to organisations such as the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux for advising people in those circumstances.

The Bill is also important because, as the Minister pointed out, claims for underpayment are often made only after employment has come to an end. Without the Bill, there would be a real incentive for employers to dismiss staff as soon as they became aware of an investigation.

It has been pleasing to hear Conservative Members supporting the Bill. I detected a certain anxiety on their part to ensure that people understood that they now really are in favour of a national minimum wage. Indeed, the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) said that they would campaign for it at the next election. I pay tribute to them for such a dramatic conversion on the Damascene bypass.

Mr. Bercow: I understand the hon. Gentleman's surprise at the change of heart that has taken place among Members on the Conservative Benches. I put it to him that I do not deny that I have changed my mind on the issue, as I have manifestly done so. I would simply argue, however, that there is no shame in having previously made a mistake, only in failing to acknowledge the possibility that one may have done so.

Mr. Pond: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's admission of a previous mistake. He has been very honest in his position—he has not pretended that there was not a period when he completely opposed the national minimum wage, nor that he did not support a previous Government who abolished a minimum wage system that had existed from 1909 until the mid-1990s. In responding to the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk, he referred to the words of Winston Churchill, so perhaps I may remind the House that Winston Churchill said that without the minimum wage

"the good employer is undercut by the bad, and the bad employer is undercut by the worst".—[Official Report, 28 April 1909; Vol. IV, c. 388.]

That is why it is important that the Bill is supported not only by Members on both sides of the House, but by the TUC and the CBI. Otherwise, we would have a situation whereby the good employer was also undercut by the Employment Appeal Tribunal. The Bill will ensure that we provide protection not only for the most vulnerable workers, but against undercutting and unfair competition for the great majority of firms, large and small, who pay the minimum wage and recognise that decent conditions of employment make good business sense and improve competitiveness and efficiency. I welcome and applaud this small Bill.

Annabelle Ewing (Perth): I rise to add the support of the Scottish National party to this important Bill. Hon. Members will be aware of the SNP's long-standing commitment to the principle of a minimum wage as the mark of a civilised society. It is regrettable, however, that the Government have not taken this opportunity to end the age discrimination that is inherent in the minimum wage legislation. We in the SNP believe that there should be a rate for the job, regardless of age. I believe that that view is also expressed forcefully by the TUC and the Scottish Trades Union Congress.

We support the aim of the Bill, which is to deal with an anomaly that has arisen in respect of enforcement notices. That anomaly became clear following last summer's ruling by the Employment Appeal Tribunal, and I understand that the Inland Revenue is appealing the decision. Further to the decision, law enforcement notices may be issued in relation to past periods where the worker is no longer employed. I do not believe that that was the intention of the National Minimum Wage

Act 1998—indeed, it would have made a mockery of it had that been the case. It would have excluded affected workers from the support system of the enforcement officers, which is an innovative approach that has been much welcomed by many individuals who have found themselves in the invidious position of not having been paid a proper wage for their work.

On retrospection, I have already asked the Minister to clarify the position in Scotland. From my reading this morning, it seems to me that the Limitation Act 1980 does not apply in Scotland. If the retrospective approach, which we support, is based on a six-year period to reflect the position in English law, has account been taken of the position in Scots law whereby the general prescriptive period is five years for civil recovery? We do not want the Bill to create a further loophole by not reflecting the reality of the situation under Scots law.

On the exclusion of the agricultural minimum wage regime from the scope of the Bill, I am aware that the Scottish Executive decided against seeking a Sewel motion, which is unprecedented since the inception of the Scottish Parliament. That is a welcome move, if a bit late in the day. Instead, legislation is to be introduced in parallel in the Scottish Parliament. I welcome that development.

I shall keep my comments brief because hon. Members have said much today that we can all sign up to and support. The Scottish National party and Plaid Cymru support the Bill, which will enhance the protection available to workers and close a loophole that was never intended. We congratulate the Government on quickly introducing a Bill to deal with the matter and to close the loophole, but we regret that they have not taken this opportunity to end the age discrimination that is inherent in the minimum wage legislation.

2.47 pm

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): This amendment to the National Minimum Wage Act 1998 is welcome. It is sad that any company could force the Government to introduce legislation by underpaying 25 workers to the tune of £37,000. That shows how mean people can be. We can talk about big employers as opposed to small employers, but in my view many employers like low-wage employees because they want to cut their wage bill, and if they can cut it below the national minimum wage, they will.

The Bill amends section 19 of the 1998 Act, which empowers the officer to serve a notice on any employer who has not paid a worker at a rate that is at least equal to the national minimum wage. The Bill will allow the officer to serve a notice in retrospect regarding people who have left employment. I have read that £9,412,513 has been gained in actions by persons under the tribunals established by the 1998 Act. Can the Minister tell me how many of them were in the category to which I have been referring for some time in questions and in debates in my parliamentary group? I refer to the 4 million people who work in the service industry and have to prove under the 1998 Act that they receive their tips personally and that those tips are not given to their employer. I conducted research and the Minister said that there were references to the Low Pay Commission. However, when people give a tip through a credit card, an enforcement officer would find it difficult to know whether they intended it to go to the individual who had served them or to the employer to distribute among all the employees, and thereby be included as part of the minimum wage.

Even if someone gives a tip in cash in a place that has a kitty—it has a special name in the 1998 Act—the money can be distributed among all the employees and taken into account as part of their minimum wage. If the people who gave the tip wanted it to go to the individual who served them, but it was taken into account as part of the minimum wage, how would the enforcement officer make a judgment? How does he judge, under section 20 onwards in the 1998 Act, whether the employer is compliant?

I believe that the Bill covers those who leave employment because they cannot get their employer to give them a proper wage. Perhaps the employer is giving them less than the cash sum of £4.20. I spoke in the Statutory Instrument Committee that upgraded the sum to £4.20, and I wanted it increased to £5. I have continually raised cases in which a substantial tip by the customer makes up the £4.20. Surely those employees are not being paid the national minimum wage. Tips intended for an individual should be in addition to the £4.20. An opportunity to deal with that vital point has been missed. How can we enforce the rights of the 4 million people in the service industry who get tips from customers?

I welcome the Bill because it can be applied retrospectively to take on bad employers such as Bebb Travel, which did not pay money that was clearly owed and not related to tips. However, I challenge the Minister to justify the fact that enforcement officers will continue to wade through a mire of accusation and counter-accusation if it appears that a large portion of the wages that people in the service industry receive is made up of tips that customers pay them directly.

Alan Johnson: With the leave of the House, I shall reply to the debate. Many technical issues are probably best left to the Committee, but I shall try to pick up some of the main points that have been made in our short debate.

First, the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) applauded the minimum wage. My hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Pond) said that he sensed a move by the Conservative party towards a campaigning mode on the national minimum wage. However, the two issues that the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk raised suggest that some contradiction remains. We do not know whether we face an Opposition of Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm or the Boston strangler on the minimum wage. On the one hand, they claim that they are so keen on it and on helping low-paid workers that there is no need to delay Royal Assent for two months, but on the other, they ask why we allow people to receive arrears of more than three years. We suggest six years.

[Alan Johnson]

Six years is consistent with the Limitation Act 1980. A six-year limit already applies in county courts for arrears in overtime payments and bonuses. I shall deal with Scotland and the sheriff courts shortly. The six-year limit is therefore well established and there is no reason to change it. There is probably a better argument for asking employers to keep records on the minimum wage for longer than three years than for reducing the arrears payment to three years. Perhaps we will deal with that in Committee.

I am advised that the normal conventions, which are cleared through the Cabinet Office and the Attorney-General, provide for legislation to be introduced immediately only in the most exceptional cases. There is no problem with keeping to normal conventions on the Bill because we have deliberately ensured that, since August 2002, we keep track of every employer who has had a case reported to enforcement officers. We shall also ensure that the Bill applies retrospectively. I am pleased about the extent of consensus on it. It is a fair point that even waiting two months can be a problem for low-paid workers. However, given our efforts to ensure that we can pick up the so-called Bebb cases so that people get their money, there is no need to breach the normal conventions.

The hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) made a point about interest. The majority of cases are pursued through the county courts, and interest is paid on the debt. We are considering thousands of cases that go through county courts and only 100 to 150 a year that go through employment tribunals. The hon. Gentleman's wishes at 5 o'clock in the morning many years ago have therefore been fulfilled to some extent.

The hon. Member for North-West Norfolk made a point about wording. He said that the drafting was convoluted. I have much sympathy with that point. We used to have a campaign, which involved eminent former parliamentarians and others, on clear language in Bills. I shall shortly deal with the reasons for introducing a Bill rather than conducting an appeal. I was asked whether that was a result of poor draftsmanship, whether an error had occurred or whether we should have spotted a lacuna. Before dealing with that, I simply draw hon. Members' attention to the original wording, which was approved despite intense scrutiny in the House and in another place. It stated in clear, unambiguous language:

"An enforcement notice may also require the employer to pay to the worker within such time as may be specified in the notice the sum due to the worker under section 17—which simply points out the difference between what the minimum wage should be and actual wages—

"in respect of the employer's previous failure to remunerate the worker at a rate at least equal to the national minimum wage."

That is clear, unambiguous, plain English. However, we now have to include a wodge of words to ensure that lawyers do not overturn our precise meaning. That is a powerful argument for the need for the convoluted wording on Scottish agriculture. We want to ensure that we are not in such a position again.

Mr. Bercow: During proceedings on the Standing Committee that considered the National Minimum Wage Act 1998, on which I served with the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Pond), my hon. Friends the Members for Banbury (Tony Baldry), for Solihull (Mr. Taylor), for Ashford (Mr. Green), for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond), for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) and I subjected the measure to close and rigorous scrutiny. None of us noticed the lacuna, if it existed. The Minister does not need to beat himself over the head about that.

Alan Johnson: I shall not beat myself over the head. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Pensions was responsible for the 1998 Act. His head is much lower and is therefore easier to beat. However, I am sure that he will not beat himself over the head, either. We do not accept that there is a lacuna or a problem with the drafting. The point is that, given that there is a possibility that we could lose the appeal—for the reasons that I gave earlier, we cannot rule that out, no matter how confident we are about the wording—and that we are talking about low-paid workers, this is very important. Incidentally, we have concentrated on ex-employees being able to claim arrears, but the Bebb Travel judgment also means that current employees who have not been paid the minimum wage can get their money now and in the future but cannot claim arrears, so both groups of workers are disqualified.

We are not prepared to take the risk of losing the appeal, then having to see whether we can get a slot in the parliamentary timetable for a Bill, then—way down the track—having to exercise the Bill. People ask why we do not withdraw the appeal. I am advised that that is because we would have to pay the costs to Bebb Travel, and we have already put a fair amount of money into this case. When it arose in August last year, we could not guarantee that we would get a Bill, or that any Bill would get a slot, so we lodged the appeal. It would also be wrong for us to withdraw the appeal because we would be prejudging the decision of Parliament, and because we might have to give lots of public money to the company that we are challenging. Those are important reasons for not withdrawing it.

Mr. Tynan: Does my hon. Friend agree that another benefit of taking the amendment through Parliament is that it will send a clear signal to bad employers that, when situations such as this arise, we are willing to deal with them?

Alan Johnson: That is the most powerful point. It is the real reason. We took the decision, almost immediately after the Bebb Travel judgment, to give out the clear message that workers should never be put in this position again. My hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Lyons), who has long experience of these issues, said that he was puzzled by the Employment Appeal Tribunal's decision. All I can say to that is, so are we. The hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) talked about the Liberal Democrats' support for the Bill, but also asked why we should come back with legislation rather than an appeal. I hope that I have now covered that point. My hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham gave us the bad news about the Low Pay Unit. I think that my right hon.

Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) was one of its founding fathers, and he will be as dismayed as I am to hear the news of its demise.

The hon. Member for Perth (Annabelle Ewing) raised the issue about Scotland. I would like to go into more detail about that in Committee. I am advised that the sheriff courts are the equivalent to the county courts in England and Wales. The hon. Lady is right to say that the limitation in Scotland is five years. We consulted the Scottish Executive through the Scotland Office, and decided to leave the provisions as they are, which means that the legislation will provide for a limitation of six years but in Scotland it will be only five years because of the different legislation and because of the horrendous complications of trying to draft the measures differently. We have acted on the advice that we received from the Scottish Executive and the Scotland Office; we will perhaps explore the matter in greater detail in Committee.

My hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Connarty) has been extremely assiduous in pursuing the issue of tipping, in relation to how it affects the national minimum wage. An important point that I know he will appreciate is that carrying the Bill forward today will help us to enforce arrears payments for people in the service industry who have been underpaid. In relation to the issues that he has raised, I will undertake to talk to the enforcement officers—who do a splendid job for us all round the country—on the specific issue of tipping, and I shall write to my hon. Friend about how that is being dealt with. The basis of the original legislation, as hon. Members who served on the Bill will remember, is that if tips go through the payroll, they can be counted in terms of the national minimum wage. If they do not go through the payroll, they cannot. I understand that there are abuses of that system, many of which my hon. Friend mentioned.

Mr. Connarty: I am grateful to my hon. and personal Friend. I know that he is assiduous in trying to follow this up, but why do not the Government just accept that, when people give a tip to someone in the industry, they are giving it as an addition to that person's wages? That is why they give it; they give it as an extra. In France, a tip is called a pourboire, meaning "for a drink". It is an extra. Why do we insist that anyone should take that into account when they are paying a wage for the hours worked? That is wrong, and the Government should change it.

Alan Johnson: If we can separate that issue from the Bill, which I know he appreciates is narrowly focused on arrears, we can look at it. It is a bit like the issue of young workers, which has been raised by other hon. Members. We can deal with that through secondary legislation, and we have got the Low Pay Commission to look into it for us. I want to ask our enforcement officers about the specific points that my hon. Friend has raised. He has raised them before and they are very important. The original decision on tipping, as it appears in the National Minimum Wage Act 1998, was based on the fact that, in some areas of employment—restaurants, in particular—pooled tips are often paid through the payroll as part of the contract of employment. That is my understanding of the argument, although I was not on the Committee that considered that Bill. Let us address that matter separately, however, because I want to look at the specific issues that my hon. Friend raised.

Mr. Bellingham: The Minister mentioned that he would like to separate the issue of tipping from this mini-Bill, but the Bill is about enforcement. Might there be an opportunity in Committee to go back to this issue, and perhaps to table an amendment to make it illegal for employers to pool tips in a way that means they become part of the minimum wage calculation? Would it not be reasonable to consider that in Committee?

Alan Johnson: Let us look at the issue in Committee in respect of enforcement. It would be a mistake to widen the scope of the Bill, but let us deal with that in Committee.

Annabelle Ewing: I would like to go back a few sentences to the Minister's reference to a point that I raised earlier about the inherent age discrimination against young workers in the present legislation. He mentioned that the matter could be dealt with through secondary legislation. What plans do the UK Government now have to deal with this problem?

Alan Johnson: I cannot let this matter lie. I am not talking about age discrimination; I am talking about a decision taken by the House. In the experience of many other countries, introducing a national minimum wage for 16 and 17-year-olds, in particular, takes the focus away from education and harms the ability of those who leave school at that age to get work. Further experience shows that 18 to 21-year-olds who have a minimum wage, albeit set at a different level, are in a similar position. This is a crucial issue.

The reason that the implementation of the minimum wage has been so successful is that we confounded all the critics. We have a minimum wage, and 1.4 million more people in work. Had we failed to achieve that, we might perhaps have made an argument that would have gone down well as oratory at union conferences, but which could well have destroyed the principle of the minimum wage in this country, which was very reluctant to adopt it in the first place. Labour Members will remember that it was not only Conservative Members who opposed it 20 or 30 years ago; the British trade union movement did so as well. We need to remember that the idea grew roots. To answer the question put by the hon. Member for Perth, the Low Pay Commission has been asked specifically to look again at the rates for 18 to 21-year-olds, and for 16 and 17-year-olds. The Low Pay Commission is a piece of social partnership in action, and I believe that it has done a tremendous job.

I have strayed off the subject slightly, Madam Deputy Speaker, but I was provoked into doing so. I would now like to commend to the House this very positive approach to these matters. The Bill is crucial to a very vulnerable group of workers. It might not be the most important piece of business that we conduct this week, and it might not attract the most attention, but it is crucial to that group of workers and I look forward to debating the issues again in Committee.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

NATIONAL MINIMUM WAGE (ENFORCEMENT NOTICES) BILL [LORDS] [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order 52(1)(a) (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with Bills),

That for the purposes of any Act resulting from the National Minimum Wage (Enforcement Notices) Bill [Lords], it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any increase attributable to the Act in the sums payable out of money so provided under any other Act.—[Mr. Jim Murphy.]

Question agreed to.

Northern Ireland

3.9 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Jane Kennedy): I beg to move,

That the draft Northern Ireland Arms Decommissioning Act 1997 (Amnesty Period) Order 2003, which was laid before this House on 23rd January, be approved.

The order appoints 26 February 2004 as the date before which the amnesty period identified in a non-statutory decommissioning scheme must end. The amnesty period is the time during which firearms, ammunition and explosives can be decommissioned in accordance with the scheme. The amnesty provides immunity from prosecution for the offences set out in the schedule to the 1997 Act—offences that might be committed during the decommissioning process. Most such offences are possessory in nature, but others concern offences that may stem from a person's participation in decommissioning, not necessarily centred on the weapons involved but centred on the behaviour that may accompany participation, such as the withholding of information or making arrangements with terrorists.

Section 2 of the 1997 Act, as amended by the Northern Ireland Arms Decommissioning (Amendment) Act 2002, requires that a scheme must identify the amnesty period, and that it must end before 27 February 2003 unless the Secretary of State, by order, appoints a later day. The purpose of the order is to extend that period until midnight on 25 February next year.

In April last year, shortly after we renewed these provisions, the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning reported witnessing an event in which the IRA leadership had put a varied and substantial quantity of ammunition, arms and explosive material beyond use. The Government welcomed that news because it showed that the decommissioning act during October 2001 had not been an isolated event. However, over the last year most of the news has been less encouraging. The Colombian episode continued to unfold, and paramilitary violence on the streets, consisting of both assaults and shootings, has continued unabated. The break-in at Castlereagh and the intelligence-gathering operation at Stormont further contributed to the general loss of confidence among the parties.

Unionism needs to be confident that republicanism is fully committed to peaceful and democratic means, and nationalists need to know that Unionism is genuinely committed to making the institutions work. It was against that background, that, regrettably, my right hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, North and Bellshill (Dr. Reid) decided to suspend the Assembly.

The Government remain totally committed to the full implementation of the Belfast agreement, but my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made it clear in his speech in Belfast last October that we had come to the fork in the road. It is time for everyone in Northern Ireland to choose the peaceful and democratic path. It is time for acts of completion. There must be an end to all paramilitary activity. If that commitment is given we can implement the rest of the agreement, including normalisation, in its entirety, and not in stages but together.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has been working tirelessly with all involved to try to find a way to restore devolved government as soon as possible. Tomorrow my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and the Taoiseach will be engaged in bilateral discussions with the parties, with a view to moving the process forward. No one believes that that will be easy: the IRA, the Ulster Volunteer Force and the Red Hand Commando have suspended contact with the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning. We regret that. It is not the way in which to secure progress and I urge those organisations to re-engage with General de Chastelain at the earliest opportunity: it is essential that this vital aspect of the agreement be honoured in full.

We have said many times that it is time for violence and the threat of violence to be taken out of politics for ever and for all. It is time to demonstrate that they are totally committed to peaceful and democratic means. That process has begun and, although it is currently in a difficult phase, the Government must continue to provide the legal framework necessary to make full decommissioning a reality. We will do that through this order.

The House will know of the so-called 'loyalist' feud that has claimed eight lives over recent months, and of the misery and suffering that it has inflicted on the local community. That too only serves to underline the need to make real and substantial progress towards a peaceful society in Northern Ireland where weapons no longer circulate freely. We need to see the end of the mindset that says the retention of arms provides a useful lever in negotiations. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister pointed out, that simply makes it impossible for others to engage.

What stands in the way of the fulfilment of the Belfast agreement is the threat of violence. Remove that—end the activity of paramilitary organisations completely and for good—and we can begin to rebuild the trust and confidence necessary to restore stable and inclusive institutions, so that the democratic vision of Northern Ireland that we all share can become a reality. There are even signs from within the Democratic Unionist party that in such circumstances the party would feel able to do business with Sinn Fein. That is surely a measure of the potent appeal of devolved government.

As always at these times, I want to pay tribute to General John de Chastelain and his colleagues in the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning, whose persistence and dedication have been instrumental in bringing us this far. Their commitment to this process has been extraordinary and we all owe them a considerable debt of thanks.

The Prime Minister has called for acts of completion. We in Government stand ready and we are holding the door open, as the order shows. I commend it to the House.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford): Let me begin by endorsing what the Minister said about General de Chastelain. I have got to know him quite well over the past year and a half, along with his two deputies—one American, the other Finnish. I formed the highest regard for them. They are men of fine professional standing, who have been prepared to give up much of their lives to contributing to the attempts to solve the often apparently intractable problems of Northern Ireland. We are all very much in their debt.

Obviously, we will not oppose the order. I cannot imagine any sane or rational person wanting to do so. We support decommissioning. It is clear that in a decommissioning process there must be provision for people to take part in that process, and to hand over weapons without immediately suffering penal consequences. We want, above all, decommissioning: we want the achievement of the peace process. It would therefore be perverse to deter people from handing over weapons by allowing them to feel that they might immediately be subject to arrest and personal prosecution on some related matter.

Nevertheless, as the Minister says, it is very disappointing that we must renew the existing legislation. According to the Belfast agreement, the whole process of decommissioning should have been completed within two years—that is, by 2002. We are now in 2003: it is three years late. That is an extremely unsatisfactory state of affairs.

Of course the moral responsibility lies with the paramilitary organisations. On one side is the IRA. Sinn Fein-IRA is a party to the agreement. The Sinn Fein section of the Sinn Fein-IRA movement formally signed up to it, but the whole purpose of the agreement, and of treating Sinn Fein as a kind of proxy, was that it stood for the republican movement as a whole. So there is no doubt whatsoever that it has defaulted on this major, absolutely key undertaking in the agreement. Indeed, it continues to default on it, despite two acts of decommissioning that, as we all know, add up to only a small fraction—nobody knows quite how small—of the total armoury. On the other side, there has been only one, purely symbolic act of decommissioning by any of the loyalist paramilitary organisations. Those that signed up to the peace process have been in breach of it by not carrying out decommissioning. Frankly, those that did not sign up to it have betrayed the people of Northern Ireland by not contributing to what is clearly the best chance for a peaceful and normal future for Northern Ireland that any of us have seen, certainly in our lifetimes, since the troubles began.

The moral responsibility clearly rests on the shoulders of the paramilitary organisations, republican and loyalist. However, as I said yesterday—I hope that the Minister will recall it all too clearly—the Government bear a large burden of responsibility because of the many tactical errors that they have made. They simply have not used the leverage available to them. They gave away the prisoners without any decommissioning at all. Giving away such a major card without anything to show in return was extraordinary. It was an absolutely shameful act of negligence on their part.

As I said yesterday, what was equally extraordinary was giving concessions to people who had not fulfilled their obligations under the Belfast agreement. They were rewarded by being given more goodies and benefits. For example, special status was granted in this place for Sinn Fein MPs. There was the promise of an amnesty—even though we managed to prevent its being implemented—for on-the-run terrorists. As I said yesterday, thank God we succeeded in opposing that amnesty, because as a result that important card remains in the Government's hands. However, we should give no credit to the Government for that. Indeed, they have made a whole series of mistakes, and they should acknowledge that fact. I hope that they will not continue to make them and, above all, that we will now see a greater degree of clarity and decisiveness on their part. There should be no more talk of inch-by-inch progress, as if one can somehow make progress in implementing Belfast in a partial way. The mechanism whereby it was deemed sufficient to secure partial acts of decommissioning or other partial acts, to which the Government respond with a concession of their own, has not worked at all. As I said yesterday, it is clear that we now need a global, comprehensive and definitive settlement.

In Belfast before Christmas, the Prime Minister apparently talked bravely about a fork in the road, but so far that fine rhetoric, which I welcomed at the time, has not been reflected in action. I was particularly concerned at the Minister's response when I asked her yesterday, across the Dispatch Box, whether she would define the "acts of completion" that the Government talk about. I asked her to call a spade a spade and say that those acts of completion have to be nothing less than the completion of decommissioning, as provided for in the Belfast agreement, and the disbandment of the IRA by Sinn Fein-IRA. She simply said that she could not offer a better definition than the Prime Minister did, when he used the phrase "acts of completion". Well, she could define it better than the Prime Minister—by speaking of decommissioning and disbandment.

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, Cathcart) rose—

Mr. Davies: No, I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman now.

The fact that the Minister will not use the phrase "decommissioning and disbandment", and prefers the vague euphemism "acts of completion", is very worrying. What is more, I have noticed that the Government have slipped from using the definite article to using the indefinite form. Instead of speaking of the "act of completion" that is required, they speak of "acts of completion". If she thinks about it, that is not entirely logical. There must be one act that completes everything—there cannot be several different acts of completion. By using such a vague term, she implies a certain flexibility as to what might ultimately be considered as falling within that category. So when she should be sending a signal of clarity to paramilitary organisations, and to Sinn Fein-IRA in particular, she is sending one of ambiguity.

There may or may not have been a place for ambiguity in the Belfast agreement itself. Without some degree of ambiguity and fudging at that stage, the agreement may well not have been secured in the first place. Nevertheless, it is the seeds of ambiguity and the lack of clarity in the Belfast agreement that have led to many of the disappointments of the past five years. What is absolutely clear to the Opposition is that if there ever was a time for ambiguity, it has now passed. Now is the time for complete clarity. Now is the time to carry out decommissioning and disbandment.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: No, I will not give way for the moment.

Now is the time for the Government to use the phrase "decommissioning and disbandment", and they should not be afraid to use it. As I said yesterday, if they want to use another word for "disbandment" I am perfectly happy with that, as long as it has the same degree of finality. The Government must now say what they mean. We do not want camouflage words, as I call them, which try to cover up the exact definition of the terms of the agreement. We must be absolutely clear about that.

Mr. Tom Harris: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: No, I am sorry but I am not going to give way at the moment.

The second thing that we really need is a timetable. Indeed, we called for one some 18 months ago, when I first talked about a programmed process, leading to full decommissioning. It is clear that if we get the comprehensive and definitive settlement that we need in Northern Ireland in the next few weeks—in fact, we only have the next few weeks in which to achieve that—we will not be able to carry out everything in that package overnight. For example, it would not be possible to decommission entirely overnight. A reduction in the British military presence in Northern Ireland would be perfectly reasonable, provided there is a corresponding improvement in the security situation; however, that, too, cannot be carried out overnight.

It is in this regard that we will need a set timetable, and we will also need interlinkage. It must be made absolutely plain that if one party does not deliver what it is supposed to deliver under that timetable, other elements that that party might have been looking for will also not be delivered under that timetable. It must be made absolutely clear that such strict interlinkage will continue until the final and complete implementation of Belfast. We should not have any fudges about that, nor should we have any of the resistance that the Government have so far displayed towards the whole concept of a timetable. When the right hon. Member for Hamilton, North and Bellshill (Dr. Reid) was Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and I used to use the word "timetable", the Government would often object and say that I was completely wrong. They said that we should not have timetables because they are inimical to progress in Northern Ireland. What nonsense! Of course, we would not have secured the Belfast agreement without a timetable, as I often told the right hon. Gentleman. I hope again that the question of the timetable will be clarified in the Government's mind. We need a timetable.

Thirdly, if the peace process is to be successful, what we do must be transparent. Nothing less will create the necessary confidence among other parties. People will not deliver their side of the bargain if they do not believe that others are going to deliver theirs. People need to feel confident that there has been a qualitative change in the situation in Northern Ireland, and that the peace process has come to a successful conclusion.

In the context of decommissioning, transparency means that acts of decommissioning will be more transparent than hitherto. I have discussed that with General de Chastelain in private. I shall not say what shape that conversation took, but I am sure that many people in Northern Ireland agree with that principle. If the Government are to succeed in negotiating what I described as the necessary, comprehensive and definitive deal, that deal must provide sufficient transparency in implementation so that public confidence can be maintained. Indeed, there is a statement on the record from the IRA itself saying that that organisation wished to decommission in a way that maximised public confidence. We should hold it to that. The same thing applies to the necessary decommissioning that must take place on the loyalists' side.

The other word beginning with "d" that the Government do not like is disbandment. That should also be subject to some sort of monitoring. Given the suspicions and difficulties evident in Northern Ireland, and the lack of performance, perhaps especially by republicans, we need more than a statement. Of course, we want a statement that the armed struggle is over and that the IRA has been disbanded. That is essential, but we also need assurance and some independent verification. We need verification of more than the decommissioning provided for in the Belfast agreement. We also need verification of disbandment.

David Burnside (South Antrim): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the problem is verification? What does decommissioning or disbandment mean when there is no trust in the political atmosphere in Northern Ireland? Does he agree that a Privy Council committee made up of the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition, the leader of the Liberal Democrats, the General Officer Commanding and the Chief Constable of the Police Service of Northern Ireland should be constituted to verify that decommissioning and disbandment had taken place? Would not that mean that hon. Members could then believe that it had taken place, and that we would not be misled by what is, at present, a con job?

Mr. Davies: I agree with the hon. Gentleman in the fundamental sense that there is a need for verification. I am glad that he used the word that I used just a few minutes earlier. We are at one, therefore. We accept the same concept, and use the same word to describe it. He should be very satisfied that we are in agreement. We need transparency and verification—the word that he and I both used. The necessary confidence will come only if we have transparency and verification. He has proposed a mechanism to provide that verification, and the House will listen with interest on that. I hope that we can discuss similar interesting new ideas in this afternoon's debate.

I was about to make another suggestion in respect of decommissioning. I do not for a moment want to change the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning, the de Chastelain commission. As I have said, I have the greatest confidence in General de Chastelain, and I think that that is shared across the political spectrum. In addition, it is clear that we need professional military officers of considerable standing to undertake what is a professional military task. The IICD provides that, and politicians would not make good substitutes for soldiers in that role. Moreover, the de Chastelain commission gives us an objective mechanism for determining whether decommissioning has taken place. That is vital.

As the hon. Member for South Antrim (David Burnside) will be all too well aware, we could otherwise argue until the end of time about whether decommissioning had taken place. Without the IICD, people could always claim that weapons were being kept somewhere. They would not produce evidence, or say where the weapons were being kept. That could go on forever, and the position would be hopeless. However, thanks to the IICD, we now have an objective mechanism to determine such matters. If de Chastelain says that decommissioning has taken place, we can take it that there has been decommissioning. If he says that half an arsenal has been decommissioned, we can take it that only half has been decommissioned. If he says that decommissioning has been substantially and materially completed—that is what we want to hear, the end of the process—we can accept that.

I have that confidence in de Chastelain, and I believe that it is shared by people across the political divide in Northern Ireland. It is difficult to imagine that the views of anyone else would have the same weight in making such a determination. That is common ground, which is good. As I saw the Minister nodding a few moments ago, I hope that that common ground is shared with the Government.

My suggestion is made in a helpful spirit; no personal or political ego is invested in it, so if somebody came up with a better one I should be only too happy. Because, as the hon. Member for South Antrim said, we must all have the same confidence in the objective verification of disbandment as we require in decommissioning, we should use the same commission and extend its remit to verify disbandment. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that disbandment will certainly need verification.

Disbandment means winding up military structures. At present, those structures are not engaged in active military operations but, as we know, they are engaged in training and targeting. They have certainly been engaged in buying arms, in breach of the agreement and the ceasefire—that was what Florida was about, and there may have been other cases. They are engaged in logistics, personnel management and all the other functions associated with such organisations. Their disbandment will be a military procedure. Professional soldiers will be able to get to the bottom of things and verify that disbandment is actually occurring. They will be able to find out what is happening not only to weapon stocks but to logistics, procurement and training.

We should use the de Chastelain commission and expand its role. If someone has a better suggestion, that is fine, but we need some form of independent verification.

I hope that the effect of the debate will be to make the Government go the whole hog in frankness, clarity and decisiveness in the use of language. I shall be most disappointed if the Minister again shelters behind the acts of completion formula. We do not want a theological formula; we need pragmatic facts. We need full disbandment and full decommissioning. Nothing less will do. I explained last night that we have only a few weeks to achieve it, so that we can reach a settlement on all the interlinked aspects, put the power-sharing Executive back, restore the momentum of the Belfast process and, indeed, save the Belfast process. Lord knows that we have only to look at what has been going on in Northern Ireland during the past few weeks—the bomb in Enniskillen and the disorder in west Belfast—to realise what the stark consequences of that highly volatile situation could be if we miss this vital opportunity.

3.38 pm

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): If we were not so short of time, I might be tempted to reflect on the history of decommissioning as it is more than nine years since the Government introduced the concept. I shall restrain myself from going back over the whole period, but it is worth making some reference to the past couple of years.

The hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) referred to the fact that the agreement sets out a two-year period for the achievement of complete disarmament. Members will recall that, before the agreement was made, the Government gave us their authoritative interpretation of that part of the agreement. Their view was that the meaning of that part of the agreement was that decommissioning should begin immediately. That was the intention as far as the Government were concerned. Indeed, that was also the case for us and for those people who followed our lead in voting for the agreement in the referendum. We did so in the belief that decommissioning would begin that summer and be completed in 2000. But it was not.

I find it very strange that, over the past three years, the Government have sat and allowed themselves to be lectured about the need for full implementation by republicans when the people who have been most guilty of default are republicans. Instead of getting down to examine each jot and tittle of alleged default by the Government, the republicans should contemplate their comparative complete failure to fulfil their part of the bargain.

The Government should never have tolerated a situation where the people who were so grievously at fault themselves lectured them about full implementation. Equally, of course, the Government should never have tolerated that situation developing. There was linkage in the agreement, but, unfortunately, although the then Secretary of State talked about the linkage, she failed to ensure that linkage was, in fact, occurring, so, consequently, we saw the situation deteriorating.

The Government's approach was seriously flawed in the aftermath of the agreement, and I wonder whether they would ever have exerted themselves to try to bring about decommissioning if we had not insisted on it. It was wrong in a sense that it was left to me and my colleagues in the Ulster Unionist party to insist on that, but we did. Of course, as the House knows, that led to the suspension of devolution, and then to a promise by the republican movement itself in 2000.

Whatever play of words they might have had about the agreement being endorsed only by Sinn Fein, on 7 May 2000, those in the republican movement unequivocally promised to put their weapons completely beyond use in such a way as to maximise public confidence. It is important to hold on to the fact that a clear promise was made that has not been kept. That promise was made in the form of a statement by the IRA's alleged army council. It is important to bear it in mind that the very clear promise that it made has not been kept. Of course, as a result of that, I and my colleagues resigned office in 2001, which led to the beginning of decommissioning in the autumn of that year.

The Minister has already said how that beginning was not followed through, but there is also the very drawback to which my hon. Friend the Member for South Antrim (David Burnside) referred: the way in which the form of decommissioning was self-defeating. It should have been visible and it should have spoken for itself, but instead we simply had the rather opaque statement from the independent commission. I understand why those on the commission adopted that course. I advised them against doing so, but I know the reasons that they had on their minds. I am sure that they were well meaning, but they were wrong. The mistake that they made has had a significant impact on the credibility of the IICD. That is a simple fact. They made a mistake—a well-intentioned, honest mistake, but it was a mistake, and we live with the consequences of that mistake. That is significant for the future, too.

The question is what is needed in terms of the current situation. Clearly, we want to see all the paramilitaries decommission. I emphasise the word "all". We have had a small act of decommissioning from a loyalist paramilitary organisation—indeed, the first act of decommissioning came from a loyalist paramilitary organisation—but we want to see all the paramilitaries decommission. No doubt, many of the calls made this evening will focus on republicans, but I want the House to understand the fact that we are just as anxious to see decommissioning by loyalist paramilitaries as well.

We cannot make any reference to loyalist paramilitaries without recording again our horror at their behaviour in recent weeks. There is some hope that the situation in Belfast will quieten down, but I wonder whether that it not just because the slightly more intelligent elements in loyalism are realising that there is a need to clean up their act, rather than through any genuine change of heart. Although there might be a slight improvement on the ground, it does not cure the underlying problem that loyalist paramilitaries have behaved very badly over the past four years, and the calls that are made for paramilitaries to decommission and go away—for them not to be there any more—apply to them just as much.

I return to the question of verification in relation to decommissioning. My hon. Friend the Member for South Antrim mentioned an idea that he has mentioned a number of times before, although I would have quibbled slightly with the composition of the committee that he mentioned, but that is a minor detail. He was making the serious point that the present arrangements for verification will not be sufficient. There is a clear need for the Government to consider how the IICD can have its credibility reinforced.

We need more than just the verification of acts of decommissioning. Even if, for the sake of argument, we had a situation in which the paramilitaries announced that they were disbanding—perhaps they will decide to adopt the word on which the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford is so keen—and made a statement to that effect, would that statement have any credibility? I doubt it. How could we prove whether a secret army had disbanded?

The Government have focused on the need to see a complete cessation of all forms of paramilitary activity—no more shooting, beating, recruiting, targeting or gathering of intelligence. However, the absence of those activities can be judged only on a daily basis. Just because we have had a week, a month or two months of complete absence of paramilitary activity, can we be assured that the paramilitaries have genuinely disbanded and gone away?

Mr. Tom Harris: While both sides of the House want complete implementation of the Belfast agreement and, ultimately, the disbandment of all paramilitary organisations, does the right hon. Gentleman accept that—contrary to what the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) said earlier—such disbandment of the paramilitary organisations, especially the IRA, does not feature in the Belfast agreement?

Mr. Trimble: The focus of the agreement was placed on decommissioning, because if a private army had completely and genuinely disarmed—with no element of rearming taking place—the question is to what extent it still exists as a private army. We are in the territory of euphemism, and decommissioning was a euphemism for disbandment at one stage.

Even if someone from an organisation said that it had disbanded and we saw a complete cessation of all forms of paramilitary activity day by day, I still wonder how we could be sure. We need verification not only of acts of decommissioning, but of the absence of paramilitary activity and the status of those who had hitherto been part of a paramilitary organisation. Of course, that would involve more than just people who could give the public authoritative information about what was going on.

I refer the House to the comments by Lord Kilclooney last night. He said that we need "not only decommissioning but real sanctions if those who decommission break the peace."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 10 February 2003; Vol. 644, c. 544.]

To have any form of verification with no sanctions linked to it would not be worth while. We have lacked sanctions throughout the process, and we have made that criticism time and again in the past four years. The Government's approach, since the agreement, has been all carrot and no stick, and that has not worked.

My hon. Friends and I, and those whom we represent, see the contrast between the vigour with which the Government pursue the disarmament of Saddam Hussein and the sanctions that are being brought to bear to achieve that. The Government are making a focused attempt to achieve his disarmament, by means that are primarily sanction-led, with any inducements coming a long way behind, which is a considerable contrast with the situation in Northern Ireland. Added to that contrast is the fact that between 1,200 and 1,500 servicemen who are natives of Northern Ireland are deployed in, or are on their way to, the Gulf. They will be asked to risk, and possibly sacrifice, their lives to achieve the disarmament of Saddam Hussein. The Government expect them to do that willingly while, at the same time, looking over their shoulders at their homeland, where the Government are adopting a radically different approach. While the character of those paramilitary organisations is different in quantity and perhaps different to some small extent in degree, is it really such a different situation? Are the terrorist organisations in Northern Ireland radically different in nature from the state-sponsored terrorism on which the Government are focusing? They will not think so.

Until the Government have more coherence in their approach on these two matters, they will be exposed to the charge of hypocrisy. As we have said to the Government over the years, there is a clear need for them to rethink their approach, to move away from a policy that focuses purely on carrots and to consider the sanctions that they will bring to bear now and in the future on paramilitary organisations to ensure that the agreement that they say that they endorsed is implemented fully by them.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): It is with some regret that we all see this debate running from year to year. I listened with interest to the Conservative spokesman, the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies), although I differ on the importance of the Government's use of the definite or indefinite article. I do not accept that that is at the core of this discussion. It is perfectly obvious what is the important word in the statement; it is not important whether it is one act or a number of acts of completion. It is also pretty obvious that whether one reckons that there is more than one act or a single one is simply a semantic difference of definition.

I sought to intervene on the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford, although he would not accept my intervention, to ask him, as he is so full of criticism of the Government's current policy, what he would do differently if he were Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. In fact, it could not be substantively different because we must remember that the order before us today is the consequence of a Conservative Government policy that was passed on 27 February 1997, before the Labour party had taken over the Government Benches.

Mr. Quentin Davies rose—

Lembit Öpik: Unlike the hon. Gentleman, who refused to give way to me, I am happy to give way to him.

Mr. Davies: That is very gracious of the hon. Gentleman, but he did refer to me. Simply, were I Secretary of State, I would not have released the prisoners without decommissioning. I would not have given Sinn Fein additional bonuses, special status here or an offer of amnesty. I would have responded to breaches, starting from Florida, which the Government did not do, and I would have excluded it from Stormont rather than suspend the whole of Stormont after Stormontgate, as I explained to the House in advance last July. As Secretary of State, I would now be talking about decommissioning, and the need for complete decommissioning and disbandment. I would not be using mealy-mouthed, indirect terms.

Lembit Öpik: In terms of the hon. Gentleman's comment that I am gracious, I simply say that I am happy to give way. As we have heard before, the fact that someone has a past does not mean that they cannot have a future, and I would apply that to him this afternoon.

In terms of the hon. Gentleman's list of action steps—the things that the Conservatives would have done differently—I would surmise from that that they would have had a different policy: tough talking, quick to react to apparent breaches and probably wrong. One judges the future behaviour of a political party or a Secretary of State on the basis of past performance. I recall that, on a number of occasions, the Conservative party has predicted the collapse of the process, the reinstigation of violence in Northern Ireland and various failures and obstacles that would be insuperable to the process before us. On each successive occasion, its predictions have turned out to be unfounded. I make that point because it is important that we do not play party politics with Northern Ireland. I would love the Liberal Democrats to be on the Government Benches, but not so much that I am willing to try to score opportunistic points against the Minister. She has pursued a policy that few could deny has taken Northern Ireland closer to a sustained peace and a normalised situation than anything in the past three decades.

Let me remind the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford that what we are discussing today is not a radical departure from anything that his party did when in government. On 27 February 1997, the Conservatives instigated the Act that we are discussing. The hon. Gentleman said that, if he were Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, a core element of his programme would be to set a timetable. However, the Conservatives already gave us a timetable of 10 years. I do not think that things had to be renewed over the first five years, but every year thereafter, up to 2007, they had to be renewed. We are therefore following the spirit of what John Major instigated.

We should acknowledge that much of the progress has been as a result of pragmatic decisions by John Major. He was a tremendous instrument for peace and, in the histories of Northern Ireland politics, he deserves always to be given credit for what he did. The hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford criticised the Government for being mealy-mouthed and for lacking frankness and clarity, but John Major did not tell anybody that he was talking to the terrorists. It just slipped out. It was a leak. At the time, people across the parties said that they understood the importance of what was happening and therefore supported it. The Liberal Democrats have been consistent on that.

The Liberal Democrats support this order and, by and large, its implications. We have not finished work yet and the kind of negotiations that have gone on before—in public and behind the scenes—will be necessary to make progress. I respect the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford for holding different views, but I do not feel able to accept views that do not accord with my non-party political analysis of decommissioning.

The right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) was right to say that he and his party have exerted considerable influence in the achievement of some of the decommissioning that has taken place. That decommissioning may have been symbolic but we all know how important symbolism is in Northern Ireland politics. He was also right to highlight the dissatisfaction that we all feel about how little has been done. We are a long way from total decommissioning. The right hon. Gentleman's colleague, the hon. Member for South Antrim (David Burnside), spoke about the difficulty of verification. Just as the Inland Revenue has trouble in verifying the details of some self-employed people's tax returns, the Decommissioning Commission will have difficulty in verifying what arms have been handed in by individuals and organisations who were outside the rule of law in the first place.

I do not get hung up on the issue of verification because what we want is decommissioning that will materially weaken the ability of the paramilitary organisations to restart trouble. However, I agree with the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford that we have not seen a great deal of decommissioning. I may share some of the frustrations in his soothsaying, but I will not repeat them other than to say that I agree with what he said about the signal lack of progress of the IRA and some of the key loyalist organisations.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): The hon. Gentleman accepted that a person with a past must have a future; but, surely, performing symbolic acts of decommissioning at the same time as commissioning new weapons in Florida gives the lie to any intention of going down the road of peace.

Lembit Öpik: It depends on how far one wants to go with the analogy. For example, I have met people who want to give up smoking. They keep saying that they want to give up smoking, but they still go out and buy a packet of fags for weeks after they have made their new year resolution. There is probably a similar tendency towards the use of violence and towards holding on to the means of violence. Decommissioning is such a big step for people who have become used to using violent methods to achieve their objectives that I am not surprised that there are probably significant internal arguments and divisions within such organisations. The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point, but I hope that he will also accept that it is in the nature of the human condition to take time to move away from things that were closely cherished as weapons, tools or modus operandi in the past.

The other interesting point that the right hon. Member for Upper Bann made was to highlight the contradiction between the Government's approach to disarming Iraq and their approach to disarming the IRA and loyalist organisations. He drew the conclusion that this inconsistency meant that perhaps there needs to be a tougher policy in Northern Ireland. I suppose that I would take another view. I suggest that the great irony in this situation is not the approach taken in Northern Ireland, but the approach to Iraq that has apparently been foisted on us in the United Kingdom by the Prime Minister and others.

We have learned in Northern Ireland that negotiation and shouting is a more effective means of progress than threats and shooting. It is a terrible tragedy that, despite the laudable achievements of this Government and, to some extent, the previous Conservative Government in achieving peace through peaceful means and through the threat of violence but not its application, we may be thrust into a war that is based on the exact opposite principles. It is a terrible inconsistency and it might be worth the Prime Minister looking at the recent history of Northern Ireland and learning that one does not make progress in reducing terrorism or international threats by waging war oneself. If I say any more about that, you, Madam Deputy Speaker, may rule me out of order. However, I ask the Minister to consider whether she can act as a useful conduit between the wise sages from Northern Ireland in this Chamber, those who take an interest in the subject and the Prime Minister, who seems to forget the lessons of history.

I also want to highlight the importance of the International Independent Commission on Decommissioning. We have already heard praise of General de Chastelain, who has the unenviable job of trying to make sense of the subject in a practical way and—this may sound familiar—of issuing reports to Government about the degree of decommissioning that has taken place. I am interested in some of the suggestions that we have heard in the debate about how things might be done better. The Government need to remain flexible, because improvements could be suggested by any side. They could come from the Conservatives, Ulster Unionists, the Democratic Unionist party or others.

At present, however, we have the least worst way of approaching the matter. It has delivered some progress and, although there is a depressing underlying level of violence in Northern Ireland, there has been a measurable decrease in violence overall and in the numbers of bombings and shootings that have been carried out in the name of the causes that the paramilitaries claim to hold. I am optimistic that we have made progress, and I would be loth for a dramatic shift to take place that led to the hardening of policy or to the withdrawal of opportunities. We are making slow progress.

The Liberal Democrats will support the order. However, as I said last year, I hope that we will not be here again next year doing the same thing. However idealistic it may be to believe that decommissioning will happen in the next 12 months, we have to assume that even most of those involved in the paramilitary organisations have realised that their representatives have made far more progress in the interests of their respective causes and the people whom they purport to represent through peaceful means than they ever will by using the arms that they seem so loth to give in.

4.4 pm

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): Madam Deputy Speaker, you are most fortunate to be presiding over your second Northern Ireland debate in a short period. You must be the Speaker's favourite to be appointed again.

There are some common strands between this debate and last night's debate, because the issues have a common source—the Belfast agreement. I feel the same exasperation as the Liberal Democrat spokesman, who referred to the ritual of coming to the House to debate these issues. It could be described as a Westminster farce that runs and runs. It is a timely and periodic reminder of the failure of the Government's policy and the process in which they have invested so much. It is right that periodically we see the embarrassment not just of the Government but of the leader of the Ulster Unionist party. Although he may be trying revisionism today, having told us about all the mistakes and errors that everybody else has committed, he failed to tell us that it was he who accepted them all the time, did not point them out at the time, and tried to sell them to the people of Northern Ireland. That suggests that he was suckered at the time. Having dismissed the advice of other Unionists in Northern Ireland, including some members of his own party, he now finds out that they were right and he was wrong, and is seeking to retrieve from the ashes a semblance of dignity. However, the Northern Ireland electorate have caught on to him, both on that and on many other issues.

While I have some respect for the Decommissioning Commission—those of us who have met its members recognise that they are genuine and want to do their job—I question the Government for handing out money week after week for it to do absolutely nothing. It must be frustrating for people to hang around the not very salubrious building in which they are housed, hoping that someone just might give them a phone call one day and tell them that they can come along and spot something for themselves. I agree with the shadow Secretary of State that we are witnessing the result of sloppy negotiations. There was no direct tie between decommissioning and the important issue of prison releases. There was a clear comparison, as both were to take place over a two-year period, but there was no requirement that one should be linked to the other.

If that was the result of incompetent negotiations, it was also the result of ensuing incompetent action by the Executive. The Government had it within their power to ensure that the two were linked, and that action on prison releases was linked to a requirement that the republican movement hand over its illegal weapons, which it is still using in Northern Ireland. There has not been enough recognition in this debate that the Provisional IRA is still an active organisation and is still shooting. One has only to look at the statistics in the Chief Constable's report to see just how active those guns are, even in current circumstances. We had better remember that those are not symbolic items, as the Liberal Democrat spokesman told us; they are lethal weapons, used to kill and threaten and to extract concessions from the Government.

Mr. Tom Harris: Does the hon. Gentleman set any store by, or place any value on, IRA and other paramilitary ceasefires that have been in effect both before and since 1997? Does he accept that, internecine warfare in those paramilitary groups notwithstanding, the quality of life of the people whom he represents is materially better and more secure as a direct result of the Government's policies and the Belfast agreement?

Mr. Robinson: I wish the hon. Gentleman would come to Northern Ireland with my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds) or me. I would take him to Cluan Place in my constituency and my colleague would take him to a number of spots in north Belfast so that he could ask the people there whether life has improved for them.

We are speaking of an illegal organisation that should never be rewarded for stopping, slowing down or pausing from doing that which it should never have been doing in the first place. The number of acts of terrorism has been steadily increasing since the signing of the Belfast agreement. The statistics are there for the hon. Gentleman to see. Although the propaganda might suggest that he is right, the facts on the ground tell a very different story.

The propaganda exists because of how much is invested by political leaders in the process—by the Prime Minister, who made pledges. He came to Northern Ireland at the most critical period of the referendum and personally signed large billboards pledging that certain things would not happen until decommissioning occurred. Those pledges were broken. He came to the Dispatch Box in the House and made it clear to the then Leader of the Opposition that decommissioning was a requirement before various things would happen in terms of Sinn Fein being rewarded. Again, that undertaking was broken. Those undertakings were passed on to the people of Northern Ireland, and on that basis many of them may have supported the Government's policy.

The Leader of the Ulster Unionist party, although he did not exactly use the words, admitted that he had been suckered as well, and that he had taken the commitments made by Sinn Fein and retailed them to the community in Northern Ireland. Many of us will recognise now—I shall come to the Minister of State's remarks about the DUP's position in relation to Sinn Fein—that there is one certainty: no one should ever take the word of Sinn Fein-IRA about anything that they might do. They have promised much and delivered very little; some say nothing.

There is no requirement whatever on Unionists to say what they might do for Sinn Fein until Sinn Fein has done it. It is up to them to take the actions necessary to meet the Government's criteria, set down not just by the United Kingdom Government, but by the Government of the Irish Republic, even before the Belfast agreement, when they said that for anybody to be involved in the political process in Northern Ireland, there was a requirement for them to be committed to exclusively peaceful and democratic means. That is a requirement placed on Sinn Fein, not on others. The pledges of the Prime Minister and the promises of the leader of the Ulster Unionist party were broken.

As regards decommissioning, all we have had from the beginning of the process are two acts—of quite what, nobody knows, because nobody has been specific about it. The first event, on 23 October 2001, was described by the decommissioning body in the following terms:

"We have witnessed an event we regard as significant."

Following that statement, my colleagues and I went to meet General de Chastelain and his team and asked them whether they regarded their meeting with us as significant. He said that he did, so that might give the House an indication of the significance of the event that he had witnessed involving any weapons being put beyond use. But it was enough for the leader of the Ulster Unionist party who, with the broadest smile that any of us have seen from him in many years, came out to say:

"This is the day some people said would never happen."

He heralded it as a great day and a great beginning. Now—[Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, North is right. The leader of the Ulster Unionist party at least recognises now that that and the further act that occurred on 8 April 2002 were simply stunts and gestures by the Provisional IRA.

The hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) put his finger on the key issue. If decommissioning is a matter of confidence—if it is to give people confidence that the IRA and Sinn Fein have put violence behind them and want to walk a democratic path—the key issue is whether their stockpile of weapons has reduced since the beginning of the process. Although in October 2001 and April 2002 something occurred—quite what we do not know, because it has never been specified by the decommissioning body—the reality that we are all certain of is that the IRA and Sinn Fein have brought more weapons in. A body that on the one hand says "We have got rid of some of our weapons", but that on the other hand is bringing them in, not just from Florida but from elsewhere, and ends up with more guns than it had at the beginning, is hardly likely to bring confidence to the Unionist community.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Will the hon. Gentleman acknowledge that even the Florida escapade came to light as a result of an envelope breaking in a post office sorting room? From that we gained much information, and, thankfully, the authorities have managed to do a great deal to protect us.

Mr. Robinson: The hon. Gentleman is right. He and I are both on the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee. We have looked at this matter, and the disturbing factor for us and for others is that it was discovered accidentally. For how long before it was discovered had this been going on? How many guns got in before the accidental finding at the post office sorting room? We know that some 150 weapons were discovered at that time. How many previous occasions were there? Would the decommissioning body consider that to be a substantial amount of weapons? If so, is it more substantial than the number of weapons that it saw being put beyond use?

As the shadow Secretary of State said, it is not simply a matter of decommissioning; it is about the organisation disbanding and dismantling, putting a line behind all its violent past and making it very clear that it will not pick it up in the future. It has to be a total end to the paramilitary organisation.

Those of us who read in today's issue of The Times accounts by leading members of the Provisional movement will see that there is no intention on the part of that organisation to put violence behind it. Its members want to keep their organisation in place. They want to hold on to their weapons. Whatever verbiage the Prime Minister might use in any statement over the next number of days, the reality on the ground is that their organisation will remain intact and their guns will remain in their bunkers.

Against that reality, for the Minister of State to indicate in the House that the Democratic Unionists might in some way view differently how they deal with Sinn Fein is absolute folly. Why would any party want to change its attitude to Sinn Fein, when Sinn Fein has not changed its attitude to violence? It is clear that nothing in Sinn Fein's behaviour in the past or in the present, or indeed as far as we know in its future intentions, suggests that it is an organisation about to change. The Government are deluding themselves if they believe that the Provisional IRA will divvy up and become full-blown Democrats in the near future.

Lembit Öpik: Does the hon. Gentleman think that not a single member of Sinn Fein genuinely believes that a peaceful solution would be a better approach?

Mr. Robinson: All members of Sinn Fein might fall into that category, but a peaceful outcome for them is everybody else surrendering, and that will not happen. The people in Northern Ireland will not surrender to terrorists now, even though they may use the pinstripe suit more than their balaclavas at present. The reality is that the only kind of peace they want is peace on their terms.

What annoys the Unionist community most is the fact that the whole political process has to be held back because of Sinn Fein, the fact that the Government do not have the courage to say "Here are the rules of entry into the democratic club. If you do not abide by these rules, you are not part of that club, and the club will continue in existence." The Government instead tell them "If Sinn Fein do not meet the criteria, we shall not have any democracy in Northern Ireland." That is the Government's response—everybody in Northern Ireland must suffer if the IRA does not divvy up. That is not the way forward. If there are no acts of completion, even though they are poorly defined—if they are defined at all—by the Government, it is clearly their intention that the democrats should suffer along with the terrorists.

I should like to say one word about loyalist paramilitaries. We are inclined to spend a lot of time discussing the decommissioning of the Provisional IRA because there is a direct relationship between it and the Executive in Northern Ireland, of which its representatives are a part. Of course, that is not the case with regard to loyalist paramilitaries, but they fall into exactly the same category in every other respect. There is no case to be made for allowing loyalist paramilitaries to hold on to illegal weapons. That needs to be clearly stated and they must give up their weapons in precisely the same way as the Provisional IRA and other republicans. If there is any evidence of the need for that to happen, it has been seen in Northern Ireland in the past few weeks and months, when the paramilitaries have turned their weapons on themselves. We have seen areas of north and west Belfast, as well as areas further afield and even in my constituency, being turned into a battleground where bodies have been found on the street, people have been forced from their homes and the general community has been left in terror. Decommissioning must therefore begin with loyalist paramilitaries, just as it must take place in the republican movement and among those on its fringes.

I sit down giving one word of notice to the Government. They have committed themselves to following a course in which acts of completion are necessary. By their very nature, acts of completion must take place over a relatively short period. It would not be tenable for the Government to come to the House in a year's time to extend the legislation. They should be making it very clear that acts of completion are required now, that the opportunity to carry them out with an amnesty will end with the order and that if those involved do not complete within the specified period, the full rigour of the law will be brought against those who represent them and the organisation itself. Unless the Government get tough, there will be no action from Sinn Fein-IRA. Sinn Fein-IRA have managed to lead the Government by the nose year upon year. Every time they misbehave and bring institutions into suspension, the answer for the Government is to make more concessions to them. That is not the way forward. Unless there is a punishment for Sinn Fein-IRA, they will never meet the requirements that the Government would have for them.

David Burnside (South Antrim): In the next two or three weeks, I hope and expect that this House will meet to authorise the sanction against the international threat from Saddam Hussein. From all parts of the House, with very few exceptions, we will support and follow the Prime Minister in the strong stand that he has taken.

The Minister will understand why we do not understand how the Prime Minister's strong stand against international terrorism—the good from the evil of 11 September—is translated into Northern Ireland. When Gerry and Martin, the two members of the army council, come to Downing street, sit on the other side of the table and stare the Prime Minister in the eye, they say "We are committed to the peace process" and he believes them. They then go home, authorise spying in the heart of government, steal the documents and write on the margin, referring to the Prime Minister as a naïve idiot. I do not believe that the Prime Minister is a naïve idiot, but his eyes seem closed in his negotiations with the terrorist leadership in Northern Ireland. Why does he not invite Saddam Hussein to Downing street, look him straight in the eye and say "Saddam, are you coming into the peace process?" I know that Saddam would say, "I am committed to the peace process, and I've got arms inspectors all over Iraq inspecting this, that and the other while representatives are at the United Nations. We're trying to get a peaceful solution." Would the Prime Minister do that with Gerry Adams and Martin McGuinness?

The key to decommissioning is verification and sanction. At a much earlier stage of the peace process, I suggested—this went through the Ulster Unionist party to Downing street—helpful and constructive methods to try to restore confidence in a political process in which the Ulster Unionist people no longer have confidence. I suggested a Privy Council committee comprising the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition, the leader of the Liberal Democrats, the leader of the Ulster Unionist party, the General Officer Commanding Northern Ireland and the Chief Constable, which, adhering to the Mitchell principles of non-violence, could produce a report. We know how many weapons and explosives are there, so why do we fudge the issue? Decommissioning means the handing over and destruction—the non-use and non-availability—of thousands of guns and tonnes of explosives. If the Minister speaks to the Chief Constable and the GOC, they will verify that that is the volume of armaments within the provisional IRA. They will also give an evaluation of the armaments that are held by the Ulster Defence Association, the Ulster Volunteer Force, the Red Hand Commando, the Loyalist Volunteer Force, or whatever name one wants to give to the loyalist paramilitary organisations. The international commission knows the amounts.

If that committee was set up, it could restore the confidence of the Unionist and law-abiding community in Northern Ireland. The Prime Minister could come to this House to tell us that he has had a report from the Chief Constable and the GOC saying that the armaments have been handed over, that there is no evidence of the importing of arms, that there are no punishment beatings, and that there was no cover-up on Castlereagh or Stormontgate—that we were wrong about that, it was all mist in our eyes and it did not take place. If he could convince us that the terrorists have moved along the road from terrorism to democracy, that would restore confidence in the process.

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley): I propose an addition to my hon. Friend's committee—someone who would command respect right across the community in Northern Ireland. He is a Privy Councillor and my predecessor as Member of Parliament for Lagan Valley, and he now sits in the other place. I am referring to Lord Molyneaux.

David Burnside: The message has been passed to the Front Bench. I could not agree more with my hon. Friend.

Such an organisation for the purpose of verification would restore confidence, but we also need sanction. The sanction of war is about to be carried out against Saddam Hussein. What sanction will be carried out against Sinn Fein if it does not decommission? It wants to be at Stormont; it wants to use the institution that it once hated; it wants to be in the forum of local government. There are elements within Sinn Fein who want to take the democratic route, but they are being allowed to get away with playing as terrorists and democrats at the same time. We should take away the democratic benefits from Sinn Fein—that will really exercise sanction and pressure against it—and reward the democratic parties in Northern Ireland with a forum of local government at Stormont that is answerable and accountable to the people. If that means that Sinn Fein has to be marginalised and isolated from the process for a period of time, so be it. I do not believe that Sinn Fein-IRA, with their terrorist organisation, want to go back to a full-scale war, but they want to play it both ways, and have suckered the Government into allowing them to do so.

The Government are the sovereign power in the United Kingdom. The Prime Minister has the power, the authority and the majority in this House to make his international stand against terrorism a domestic stand against terrorism, and he would receive widespread support in the House for doing so. Decommissioning has become a farce because the Government have let the provisional IRA and the loyalist paramilitaries off the hook by not verifying the decommissioning and not exerting sanctions against the terrorist organisations. It is time that the Government acted, in the way that they act internationally, against the domestic threat of terrorism.

4.29 pm

Jane Kennedy: We have held a serious and constructive debate about a serious and sobering matter. I agree with all hon. Members who said that it is a disappointing day. It is disappointing to have to move such an order in such circumstances.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) for his constructive approach to the order and for saying that he would not divide the House. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) for similar indications.

The hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford and several other hon. Members questioned our definition of acts of completion. There has been no lack of clarity. We may debate the terms that we use but there is no lack of clarity about what is necessary to restore the confidence that has been lost. We are discussing giving up violence completely and in a way that satisfies everyone. I refer specifically to the IRA because of Sinn Fein's association with it, and Sinn Fein's responsibility in its partnership role in government in Northern Ireland.

We want a move of such significance that it satisfies not only me as Minister with responsibility for security, but hon. Members and the public in Northern Ireland, that the IRA has ceased its campaign. That will enable us to move the democratic process forward, with every party that wants to be in government abiding by the same democratic rules.

The IRA needs to disappear as a terrorist organisation. I leave the exact detail to that organisation to determine. However, it must be done in a way that gives confidence to the public in Northern Ireland and to hon. Members.

Mr. Quentin Davies: The Minister said that the IRA needs to disappear as a military organisation. That is the best formulation that the Government have made. Although we all agree with a phrase such as "everyone must abandon violence", it is such a general aspiration that it cannot be defined or verified as a specific act. We need verifiable, specific acts if we are to say that the Belfast agreement has been implemented. That is why I set such store by the word "decommissioning".

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. That was rather lengthy for an intervention.

Jane Kennedy: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's intervention because it leads to my next point. The right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) and the hon. Members for South Antrim (David Burnside) and for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) also alluded to the visibility of the process and the ability of all sides to say confidently that they believe that the move has been made. In that context, we are not simply considering the IRA, but all the organisations that need to put violence behind them.

I listened with interest to the suggestion that the hon. Member for South Antrim made for the Committee and to other contributions about its membership. We shall reflect on that. I shall not respond definitively today, but it will form part of the discussion that we shall all hold. I cannot emphasise too strongly that transparency is required to restore confidence among political parties that are engaged in the great project in Northern Ireland.

The right hon. Member for Upper Bann rightly drew our attention again to the aspirations that people had when they voted in favour of the Belfast agreement. I agreed with a large part of what he had to say. He talked about what is needed, and, although we are talking today within the narrow confines of renewing the provisions that will allow decommissioning to take place, I hope that I have given the House a clear indication that decommissioning on its own is not now enough to restore the confidence that we are seeking to rebuild.

Lembit Öpik: The Minister could say exactly the same thing about the debates that we are having about Saddam Hussein, so before she finishes, I hope that she will address this serious question: why are the Government taking such a totally different approach in Northern Ireland from the one that they are taking on Iraq? I suspect that a number of hon. Members might think that we should take an approach to this question more like the one that is being taken on Iraq. There is definitely a contradiction.

Jane Kennedy: I shall resist any encouragement to go down that route, not out of any lack of willingness to debate the point but because the issue that we are discussing today is a narrow one, and the Government's position on Iraq is a matter for debate on another day. I do not accept the proposition that the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire and other hon. Members have made that the situations are comparable. We are dealing here with a process in which, for a significant period of time, we have been engaged in a partnership with political organisations that have been undergoing a political process—however limited it may be, and however critical people might be of it. We must consider that if we are serious about returning to a situation in which we can restore devolved government.

The hon. Member for Belfast, East talked about the failure of the Belfast agreement, but devolution is the real prize that we are striving to achieve. It was about local people making those decisions, and it worked. It resulted in energetic, cross-community government bringing solid benefits for the people of Northern Ireland. We saw a degree of co-operation being delivered that was unthinkable until a few years ago, and in Northern Ireland there is a strong wish, which we share, to return to that.

A number of hon. Members talked about sanctions, but I do not believe that this is the time to be talking about sanctions in Northern Ireland, given the engagement that we are seeking with all the parties. For there to be a return to devolution—with the sustained effort on economic and social problems that we saw developing under the Executive, and the everyday issues being dealt with by local politicians in a way that matters to ordinary people—there must be an end to violence. What we need now is the definitive step that we have been talking about here today. It is clear that we have reached a crunch point at which Sinn Fein and the IRA—I am not talking about them exclusively—must commit themselves exclusively to a peaceful and democratic path.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim): Does the hon. Lady agree that Sinn Fein-IRA must be well aware of the malcontents within their organisation who have gone to the Real IRA and the Continuity IRA? It would demonstrate a commitment to a peaceful future on the part of Sinn Fein-IRA if they did more to ensure that those criminals were behind bars.

Jane Kennedy: I have no disagreement with the point that the hon. Gentleman makes. It is a very valid point indeed.

We cannot now carry on with the IRA being half in and half out of the process towards peaceful and normal society in Northern Ireland. If there is real movement, however, we can move quickly to implement the outstanding parts of the Belfast agreement, including the provisions on normalisation. We can implement the provisions in their entirety—not in stages, but together. If we can do that, it is my fervent hope that I shall not be standing here at the Dispatch Box this time next year speaking to the same motion.

It being one and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Standing Order No. 16.

4.55 pm

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton): I am grateful for this opportunity to raise in Parliament an issue of urgent concern to the people whom I represent in Wilmslow and the surrounding area. Owing to the way our business has panned out today, I could speak for—

Bob Russell (Colchester): Two and a half hours.

Mr. Osborne: Indeed. In fact, that is about the time it takes to travel from Wilmslow to London by train. However, despite a request from the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson), that we make this debate lengthy and that as many people should take part as possible, I intend to keep my remarks relatively brief.

As I am sure that many Members know, Wilmslow used to be a major station on the west coast main line. Trains between London and Manchester used to stop there regularly during the day. Sadly, over time, the service has shrunk and shrunk, until currently only three trains a day from Manchester call at Wilmslow on their way to London, and only four call there on their way back in the afternoon. The services remain hugely popular with passengers, however, and are very important to the town that I represent.

I asked for the debate because it has emerged that the Strategic Rail Authority is on the brink of scrapping these important services. As far as I can tell, it will do so with no consultation with local people or local businesses and without—apparently—paying any attention to the views of Virgin Trains, the operator which actually runs the service. Indeed, one has to be something of a Sherlock Holmes even to work out that the SRA is about to end the Wilmslow to London service. No press release has ever been issued. No statement has been made. There is nothing on the SRA website.

On Friday, I visited Wilmslow station to see if there were any clues there, but even Sherlock would have found nothing. There is nothing on the notice board to warn passengers that the service to London could be axed. There is nothing in the train timetables. When I asked staff behind the ticket counter, they knew nothing about the plans either.

As the local MP, I first knew of the proposal only last month when I read the "Mid Cheshire Rail Report", which I am sure is a popular journal. It is produced by a dedicated voluntary group of rail users who had spotted a clue in the SRA's west coast strategy consultation document, published last year on 9 October. I have a copy before me.

The document sets out the Government's plans for completing the modernisation of the west coast main line and explains how services will run when that modernisation is complete. The document begins with admirable honesty by admitting:

"The West Coast project is a mess, and it is time for bold action."

[Mr. Osborne]

The chairman of the SRA, Richard Bowker, states that the draft strategy

"reflects a need to get a grip on the project, to secure a way forward which is deliverable, addresses the needs of all the route's users and represents value for money".

I understand that the SRA will produce a final strategy once it has received and analysed the responses to the consultation document.

The west coast strategy document is obviously familiar to the Government, as a debate was held about it in Westminster Hall on 23 October. At that time I asked the Minister of State, Department for Transport, the right hon. Member for Warley (Mr. Spellar), for an assurance that the west coast upgrade would not lead to a worse service for my constituents and that the same number of direct trains would continue to stop at Wilmslow. It was a reasonable question. After all, during the modernisation of the west coast service my constituents have borne a heavy burden. They have already suffered many delays due to the updating of the line. Indeed, for the first part of next year, the entire line through Wilmslow will be closed, as part of that modernisation. So I did not think it unreasonable to ask the Minister of State for an assurance that, having paid a heavy price for modernisation, the people whom I represent would receive the same service at the end of the process, but he did not respond to my specific request. I do not particularly blame him for that, and I did not think much about it at the time because I assumed that, if there had been threat to the Wilmslow service, it would have been flagged up in the strategic document.

What I had not appreciated was that the SRA is planning that no trains should stop at Wilmslow. I had not appreciated that fact because those plans are not mentioned in the strategy document. In fact, Wilmslow is not mentioned in the entire document. Only when we look very carefully and do a bit of detective work, as the mid-Cheshire rail users group has done, do we see what is really planned.

The table on page 12 is entitled, "Typical journey times in minutes, number of stops and daytime service levels (Monday to Friday) for long distance passenger services from London", and it tells us that from September next—from winter 2004, as it puts it—there will be 29 trains a day between Manchester and London and that those trains will go via Stoke-on-Trent, which is on a different line from Wilmslow. That is fine, because that service is very similar to the one that currently operates. It stops at Stoke and Macclesfield, and it will be familiar to hon. Members who use it—indeed, I do so every week.

A further service is mentioned, called the Manchester peak fast service, which is the new crown jewel in the west coast main line modernisation strategy, and the document says that there will be three fast trains a day on that service. I understand that those trains will use the Crewe line, which goes through Wilmslow. That would be fine as well, because, as I say, a couple of services use that line and stop at Wilmslow every day. However, the detail of the table shows that only one stop is planned for that service. That stop could be Wilmslow, Stockport or elsewhere, but everyone now assumes that it will not be Wilmslow and that it will probably be Stockport. So if we look hard at that rather innocuous table—for example, at the asterisk at the bottom, which indicates that three trains currently routed via Crewe will instead go via Stoke—and we add it all together, we reach the conclusion that the current service from Wilmslow to London will be scrapped, but that is not spelled out in the document at all.

What the document does not say, of course, is that this is being done because the journey time from Manchester to London would be two hours and four minutes if those trains stopped at Wilmslow when the new fast service starts. If the trains do not stop at Wilmslow, the journey time will be one hour and 59 minutes—miraculously, one minute less than two hours. Of course that is a huge selling point. At the end of the west coast main line modernisation, the SRA will be able to say that journey times from Manchester to London are under two hours, even if only by a couple of minutes.

Those who will have to pay the price and who will suffer because those minutes will be shaved off the journey time are the people whom I represent in Wilmslow who use that service. Of course, that is not stated anywhere in the consultation document. Indeed, it could be argued that the document deliberately sets out to obscure that truth from people, and it has not been noticed by any business, local community leader or any stakeholder in Wilmslow, until recently.

All my attempts to get the truth out of the SRA or just to get a straight answer about what it is planning to do with that service, which is important to my constituents, had failed until about two hours ago. On 24 January, I wrote to Richard Bowker, the chairman of the SRA, asking him what was planned for the Wilmslow to London service. I thought that, as the Member of Parliament who represents Wilmslow, it would be only reasonable for me to know. For three weeks, I have not had an answer. For the past week, I have been calling his office every day to try to get one, but by some miracle, a reply was faxed to me two hours ago. It is amazing what an Adjournment debate will do to concentrate the minds of those in Departments, non-governmental agencies and bodies such as the SRA. Unfortunately, the response was not worth waiting for, because Mr. Bowker still does not come clean about what exactly he plans to do with the Wilmslow service. His letter contains the Orwellian line:

"We are currently considering in depth what services need to be provided for Wilmslow to ensure a joined-up network for all rail users."

What on earth does that mean? He says that most trains between London and Manchester will not use the line that goes through Wilmslow so it will not be possible to insert additional stops at Wilmslow. But most trains currently do not use the line that goes through Wilmslow. A few trains every day do, and will continue to do so after the new strategy.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Jamieson): Exactly.

Mr. Osborne: I am glad that the Minister's comment will appear on the record. I know that he is keen on rail services in the north-west of England and I look forward to hearing from him. I hope that those trains will continue to stop at Wilmslow—that is the whole point of this Adjournment debate. I am not asking for additional stops at Wilmslow, much as I would like them. I am simply asking for the service to remain the same in the future as it is today.

Richard Bowker then says that he has consulted

"passenger representatives, local authorities and other interested stakeholders."

Well, I have consulted passengers, local authorities and stakeholders in the Wilmslow area and not one of them had any idea, until I told them, that the SRA was planning to scrap the Wilmslow service. It is not surprising that they did not have a clue because, I repeat, the word "Wilmslow" does not even appear in any of the consultation documents. The letter makes no attempt to explain the SRA's plans or the rationale behind them. Mr. Bowker helpfully ends the letter by saying:

"I understand that you have previously discussed this issue with Stuart Baker, our West Coast Main Line Director."

However, I have never met Stuart Baker or discussed anything with him, although I am happy to do so in the future.

If the SRA is supposed to be the body that restores public confidence in the Government's rail programme, it needs to learn some lessons about being straight with the public and straight with the people who represent them in this House. Thankfully, I have discovered someone who does seem willing to tell me the truth about the future of the Wilmslow-London service, and that is Chris Green, the chief executive of Virgin Trains. Three weeks ago, he came to Chester to speak at an excellent rail conference that was organised by John Richards, the current high sheriff of Cheshire. He used his office to organise that conference to talk about rail services in Cheshire, and he persuaded several key players in the industry to come to Chester to take part.

I was a member of the audience and I asked Mr. Green what he knew of the SRA's plans to cut the Wilmslow service, and for the first time I got a straight answer. I took notes of what he said, and they are as accurate as I could make them without the use of shorthand. He said:

"Wilmslow is obviously a very important rail head, but the SRA feels that the London to Manchester service can only stop once, probably at Stockport, because of the publicity merits of having a 1 hour 59 minute service journey time to Manchester. We don't care whether the journey time is 1 hour 59 minutes or 2 hours 4 minutes, we want to stop at both Stockport and Wilmslow".

I am not surprised that Virgin wants to go on stopping at Wilmslow, because it is good business for them. Many people use the service, and pay top fares for doing so. According to figures provided to me today—miraculously—by Virgin Trains, 78,000 passenger journeys are made every year between Wilmslow and London, which is more than a couple of hundred passengers a day. We should also remember that only three trains stop at Wilmslow on the way from Manchester to London. Together, those journeys generate an annual revenue of around £3.1 million for the company. It is not surprising that the chief executive wants to keep the service and the lucrative business. I am not talking about trying to save a train line that no one uses or that the train company wants to stop operating. It is a popular service that the train company wants to continue to operate.

Mr. Green thinks that the disadvantage in publicity terms of just missing the two-hour London-Manchester journey time target is more than outweighed by the advantage of stopping at Wilmslow to pick up lots of passengers. If that is the commercial judgment of the chief executive of Virgin Trains, which actually runs the service, I want to know on what grounds the SRA feels that it can second-guess him. What are its grounds for overruling the judgment of the train operator? Where is the evidence? What does it think the impact will be on those passengers who rely on the service? What assessment has it made of the effect on businesses in the Wilmslow area? What consultation has taken place with local people? We have seen nothing from the SRA, because it has told us nothing about its plans, or even that it had plans in the first place. If the SRA will not ask local people what they think, I will have to tell it, as, obviously, I have received loads of letters from constituents who use the service.

My constituent John Hillmer says that he is "dismayed" about the decision. Another constituent, Mrs. Yotty, who is a regular user of the service, thinks that the plan is "utterly ludicrous". She says:

"I am seriously thinking of going back to my car".

So much for the targets in the 10-year transport plan to get people to use trains. Mrs. Knight, a pensioner in my constituency, says that she is "disgusted" and "angry" about what is being planned. Jim Crockatt, an excellent local councillor, says that he objects

"in the strongest possible terms".

Mr. Colin Jones says that he is "very angry", and that he "cannot believe" what is being planned.

If the SRA wants to dismiss the views of individual passengers, let me tell it what other groups are saying. The chief executive of Macclesfield borough council, David Parr, wrote to Mr. Bowker on 28 January and copied the letter to me. He wrote that "the Wilmslow-Euston connection is a critical service to the local community and is well supported locally. At a time when public rail transport is critical to an integrated transport strategy, it is surprising that the SRA is proposing such a short-sighted approach".

He went on to ask Mr. Bowker whether he could share with the council the full rationale for the proposals.

Another huge employer in my constituency, AstraZeneca, the world's fourth largest pharmaceutical company, which employs more than 5,000 people in my constituency, last year, according to its figures, spent £750,000 on 6,500 train tickets to London. It is therefore a big user of the train service. Its site manager at Alderley Park, the big research centre in my constituency, has said:

"As a major global employer based in the North West and Cheshire, we would urge you"—

the Strategic Rail Authority—

"to at least consult on the future of the Wilmslow West Coast Main Line stop. It would be in the interests of the communities served by the station, including major business users, to see a measured and considered approach to the provision of rail services. As a significant business stakeholder and a user of the service, we would be happy to provide further information and participate in taking the matter forward".

[Mr. Osborne]

Surely the SRA is not so arrogant as to ignore a request such as that from one of Britain's leading companies? I repeat that it all it wants to do is "provide further information and participate in taking the matter forward."

Before I give the Minister a chance to respond—perhaps he will respond at length, given the time available—let me say that I realise that the plans to end the Wilmslow service are not the Government's plans. They are not dreamt up by the Minister or the Department for Transport, but they are the plans of the Strategic Rail Authority. That authority acts under the directions and guidance of the Secretary of State, and the Government are ultimately responsible for its decisions.

I would therefore ask the Minister the following questions. First, is he prepared to ask the Strategic Rail Authority to look again at the plans to end the Wilmslow-London direct service? Secondly, will he ask the Strategic Rail Authority to be open with the public about what its plans are, and about why it feels able to second-guess the commercial judgment of Virgin Trains? Thirdly, will he require the SRA to conduct a proper consultation with the passengers, businesses and other organisations affected, of the kind proposed by AstraZeneca, before proceeding with plans to end the Wilmslow service?

What we are talking about today is a popular, lucrative train service used by 78,000 passengers a year. It is a service that passengers want, businesses want and the train operating company, Virgin, wants. The Strategic Rail Authority plans to ignore that and scrap the route to shave a couple of minutes off the Manchester-London journey time, and bring it to within a whisker below two hours. The chairman of the Strategic Rail Authority claims that he has consulted on the plans, but he issued a consultation document that did not mention them at all. He says that he is reviewing the responses, but no one who will be affected had a chance to respond. By the time we all woke up to what was happening, the date for responses to the consultation had passed. It was the worst kind of high-handed, arrogant and secretive decision making. It will hit the people whom I represent very hard. It is a textbook example of how Government agencies should not behave. I ask the Minister to use his power and influence to intervene and save this vital train service.

5.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Jamieson): I congratulate the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) on securing this debate and providing us with a welcome opportunity to discuss important matters. He has spoken with clarity and enormous charm, as he always does. I hope that he will not need Holmesian powers of deduction to understand my explanation of the current status of Wilmslow station. I hope that I can be clear.

I do not have Holmesian powers of deduction. However, paragraph A13.20 on page 38 of the Strategic Rail Authority's consultative document refers to the Crewe-Sandbach-Cheadle Hulme line. That is the line on which Wilmslow lies, as the hon. Gentleman knows. It is true that not every station is mentioned in the document, but I assure him that the station in his constituency has not been left out. If he looks at the document again he will see that.

Mr. Osborne: From memory, the Minister is referring to the appendix to the consultation document, where he will see that the word "Wilmslow" is mentioned only twice, on two maps. The appendix does not make it clear that the Wilmslow service is under any threat at all.

Mr. Jamieson: I thought that the hon. Gentleman had said that the document contained no reference to Wilmslow, but now he tells us that there are two references. I assure him that Wilmslow is there, contained on the line. I am sure that many other stations are not mentioned explicitly but are on lines that are discussed in the document.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, Wilmslow is on the west coast main line, on the branch between Crewe and Stockport. The west coast main line has been the subject of much debate over the years in this House, and rightly so. It is the most important trunk route on Britain's rail network, linking London to the midlands, the north-west and Scotland, and carrying local and long-distance high-speed passenger traffic. The line is also the core national freight route and has significant commuting flows around London, Manchester, Glasgow and Birmingham. The route is undergoing a much-publicised programme of modernisation and upgrading.

It may help if I briefly explain the history of the works to give some context to the debate over future service levels. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will realise that that history underpins much of the SRA's thinking on the important matters that he has raised.

The works represent the first major investment on the line since it was electrified in the 1960s and 1970s. The route was extensively renewed and upgraded at that time, but work carried out since has been very limited. In the late 1980s and early 1990s, it became apparent that significant expenditure was required if the line was to be kept up to modern standards and allow capacity for growth. British Rail contemplated upgrades but no investment plans emerged until the passenger upgrade 1 and passenger upgrade 2 agreements between the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising and Railtrack, and Virgin Trains and Railtrack, signed in 1996 and 1998 respectively. Those planned upgrades have been fraught with difficulties. We all know now that Railtrack massively underestimated and undervalued the scale of the work required. As costs rocketed, the time scales for completion were put back again and again. For months, Railtrack struggled to keep a grip on the project. Eventually, it became apparent that the original outputs could not be delivered.

The users of the route were left in limbo, unsure of what would be provided, how many train paths would be allocated, and when. As Railtrack spiralled into administration, it became apparent that someone else would have to pick up the pieces.

That task was taken on by the Strategic Rail Authority, the body that we established in 2001 to bring the effective leadership and direction to the industry that had been lacking under the previous privatisation. The authority decided that it was time to develop realistic strategies for completing the project and allocating capacity on a fair basis to meet, as far as possible, the needs of the different users of the line: freight, local passenger services and high-speed, long-distance services.

On 29 August last year, the authority announced a new master plan to accelerate the west coast works. This was agreed in conjunction with Railtrack and the passenger train and freight operating companies. It changed the programme from a prolonged series of weekend works to dedicated line possessions. The new programme is based around a series of strategic projects, including two 17-week total line possessions. The first will take place later this year between Colwich in Staffordshire and Cheadle Hulme, the section of line that carries the trains from Manchester to London via Stoke. The second is scheduled for the beginning of 2004 on the route from Crewe to Cheadle Hulme on which Wilmslow is situated.

In both closure periods, direct north-to-south services will be maintained. They will go through Crewe when the Stoke branch is closed and vice versa. When rail services cannot operate, an alternative road service will be provided linking those stations that are closed with those that are not. By adopting such an approach, more than 60 miles of new railway will be delivered in a little over four months. Under the previous delivery programme, that could have taken up to two years.

Coupled with a series of additional work programmes on the route south of Crewe, the new railway will provide the much-needed extra capacity and increased line speeds of up to 125 mph by 2004. I am sure that that is enormously good news to the people of Tatton, not least those in Wilmslow. I know that closing sections of the line will cause disruption, but the work has to be done sooner or later and this method will ensure disruption is kept to a minimum. The authority and the train operators have worked extremely hard on planning alternative rail services and, where necessary, road services to mitigate the disruption. As the west coast main line has faced decades of neglect, it is hardly surprising that such tough decisions have had to be taken.

Having agreed a strategy for delivering the upgrade, in October last year, the authority turned its attention to the allocation of capacity on the line. Recognising that demand would outstrip availability, and keen to ensure a solution that addressed the needs of all the different users of the route so far as it is possible, the authority launched a draft strategy and consultation process. In producing the draft strategy, the authority sought input from the entire railway industry, including Network Rail and the affected operators, both passenger and freight. On publication of the draft strategy, a vast array of interested parties were invited to comment. They included industry bodies, the rail passengers committees, local authorities and the regional development agencies.

The process is a positive example of consultative, co-operative working by the industry and stakeholders. A large number of responses were received from all levels of interest, including from many members of the public and possibly the hon. Gentleman's constituents. The SRA has therefore established a detailed picture of the aspirations of the industry and passengers alike. The consultation closed on 16 October and the authority is currently working up final proposals. At this stage, no final decisions have been taken.

What does the draft strategy say? The authority explicitly states that the overriding aim is to ensure that the project delivers value for taxpayers' money and that the passenger and freight operators receive early improvements. Nobody will argue with that. Furthermore, the strategy has to be affordable. The days of Railtrack's back-of-an-envelope calculations are well and truly over. Of course, to do that, hard choices have to be made. The authority has reconsidered capacity requirements for each type of traffic—passenger and freight—to maximise the opportunities to fit in with other types. Choices have to be made between fast and stopping services, and between passenger and freight services. Those choices seek to ensure the best consensus, given that there is not infinite capacity to meet all demands.

In discussions between the authority and Virgin Trains, the company has made it apparent that its favoured route between Manchester and London would be via Stoke, to which the hon. Gentleman referred. That is the shorter of the two possible routes, the alternative being via Wilmslow and Crewe. The SRA and Network Rail support that view, so the Stoke line will be the key route for Virgin Trains services. I do not think that he will be surprised to hear that. However, there may still be scope for running some direct services through Wilmslow, and it is even possible that the current service of three trains a day will be maintained if it is demonstrated that it offers value for money and is workable within the overall service pattern. The Strategic Rail Authority is considering those matters in the light of the responses to its consultation.

Whatever the outcome of those deliberations, passengers travelling from Wilmslow to the north or south will be able to take advantage of enhanced west coast services by connecting at Crewe, Stockport or Manchester, about 25 minutes away by local train services, as many passengers do at present. The draft strategy envisages that the service from Crewe can be increased from 32 trains daily at present to 42 trains in 2004. The journey time from Crewe to London could be reduced from about two hours and eight minutes to about one hour and 43 minutes. Similarly, there will be capacity to increase the service from Manchester from 20 trains a day at present to 29 from 2004, with a journey time reduction to London of half an hour through the provision of 125 mph trains. New Pendolino trains will be provided, the first of which is already in service between Manchester and London. A substantial proportion of the fleet is due to be in service for the winter 2004 timetable.

Mr. Osborne: The Minister correctly said that the west coast main line modernisation will increase capacity and add a number of additional train services. Does he therefore accept that the people whom I represent will find it particularly difficult to understand why their three services a day may be lost? There is more room for those services, not less.

Mr. Jamieson: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman now accepts the value of the Government's enormous investment in the west coast main line and the way in which it will improve capacity in his area. Those of us who represent other parts of the country would very much like some of that investment in our areas.

Dan Norris (Wansdyke): Hear, hear.

Mr. Jamieson: The Whip agrees. I have made it clear to the hon. Member for Tatton that, because that work has been carried out, there is an opportunity for the services that currently stop at Wilmslow to be considered. Had we not carried out that work and pursued the route taken in the 1990s, I assure him that, in the unhappy event of his party forming a Government, there would be no service at all on that line. He is nodding sagely as if to agree.

Mr. Osborne: I certainly am not.

Mr. Jamieson: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will reflect on that development, and that his constituents will give it careful consideration.

The modernisation of the line will provide better punctuality and reliability. The SRA is targeting 90 per cent. of trains to arrive on time by 2008. All this, as I have said, represents substantial expenditure. While the total project cost is about £9.8 billion, the bulk of that is to be spent on renewals, returning the west coast main line to acceptable modern standards. The upgrade work itself has a cost of about £2.3 billion. That is a huge commitment from the Government, but one that we are clear that we must make. The west coast main line is a flagship project. After a series of knocks and setbacks, a deliverable and affordable plan has now emerged. The project is fully under control. The SRA and its industry partners are striving to achieve the best overall balance for the users of the line. I understand that its final strategy is due to be published within weeks and will contain full details of the services to be provided.

If the hon. Gentleman has further queries, I am sure that he will enter into a dialogue with the SRA, which I assure him will be happy to speak to him about his concerns. I hope that my remarks this evening in the short time available will prevent him from fretting needlessly. I am grateful to him for raising the matter and giving us an opportunity to air it, and I hope that my comments will bring him and his constituents some comfort.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at half-past Five o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

WALES

The Secretary of State was asked—

Economic Development (South-west Wales)

1. Mr. Martin Caton (Gower): What recent discussions he has had with the First Minister in the National Assembly about economic development potential in south-west Wales. [96343]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Peter Hain): I have regular discussions with the First Minister about economic development, which is particularly helped by objective 1 funding, under which 187 projects in south-west Wales have been approved so far, attracting £66 million of grants.

Mr. Caton: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. Will he join me in welcoming the formation of the Gorseinon community development trust, a local vehicle for creating jobs in a community that has recently been hard hit by works closures? Will he use his best endeavours to effect the trust's proposals for an enterprise village on the old Corus Bryngwyn works in Gorseinon?

Peter Hain: I welcome both proposals. There is a genuine prospect of creating world-class facilities throughout south-west Wales. They include the excellent and exciting tourist facility of Bluestone in Pembrokeshire. I hope that Pembrokeshire coast national park and Pembrokeshire county council will speed through the application as quickly as possible.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): The Secretary of State knows that the KTH plant in Llanidloes is threatened with closure. If it closed and 250 jobs went, the economic impact on a town of only a couple of thousand residents would be as serious as the difficulties in south-west Wales. Will the right hon. Gentleman therefore be willing to accept a representation from the town taskforce, which is trying to ensure that we do not lose the jobs or that they are replaced if we encounter problems with KTH?

Peter Hain: I will certainly be happy to meet a delegation, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be in attendance. I am worried about the development because I appreciate that KTH is a vital local employer in Llanidloes. The First Minister has asked Team Wales to investigate the possibility of saving jobs and maintaining that vital facility.

Denzil Davies (Llanelli): My right hon. Friend will be well aware of the proposals to develop further the motor racing circuit at Pembrey and the adjoining airport. When he meets the First Minister, will he press him to ensure that the necessary infrastructure funds are available for two projects that will give the economy of south-west Wales an enormous boost?

Peter Hain: My right hon. Friend is right. I have had the privilege of racing—not very quickly—on Pembrey motor racing circuit in a car sponsored by the Welsh Development Agency. The projects for the circuit and the airfield constitute an exciting prospect and they need support. I shall do everything possible to help. I have already discussed the matter with the Minister for Economic Development, who is also keen on the projects.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): The manufacturing sector is hardest hit in south-west Wales. To name only one company, Dewhirst closed three factories with the loss of 900 jobs and moved production to Morocco. Why does the Secretary of State believe that manufacturing confidence is so low and declining in Wales? Is it because of the climate change levy, the landfill tax increases, the fuel tax rises, the working time directive, the business rate rises, the huge increase in red tape, massive extra costs to business to operate the benefits system through the payroll or the extra jobs tax that will hit industry in April and siphon millions of pounds into Government coffers that should be invested in business?

Peter Hain: I find the hon. Gentleman's concern for manufacturing in Wales very touching given that the Tories massacred the sector in the 1980s and early 1990s. As I understand it, most Dewhirst workers have been able to get new jobs or are in the process of finding them. Yes, manufacturers have had a tough time, principally because of the high pound, but we are doing all that we can to support them. There is much good news about new investment by manufacturers in Wales and employment in Wales. Unemployment fell to 5.2 per cent. in December. That is great news because it brings Wales to the same level as the rest of the United Kingdom. Instead of lagging behind, we have lower unemployment than the United States of America, Canada, Belgium, Finland, France, Germany, Italy, Portugal and Spain.

Mr. Evans: The Secretary of State took his eye off the ball at the Convention on the Future of Europe and was clearly outflanked. I do not want him to do that for manufacturing jobs in south-west Wales. He knows that the Confederation of British Industry in Wales has already said that there are problems with the dualling of roads, congestion on the M4 and the trains between Cardiff and west Wales. Time and again, I have mentioned the potential to boost investment in Swansea and west Wales that Swansea airport offers. Will the Secretary of State hold talks with his colleagues and business leaders in Wales to ascertain what can be done to remove the barriers to economic growth in south-west Wales to attract more jobs there?

Peter Hain: Not only will I meet business leaders in Wales; I met the director of CBI Wales on Monday, and the director general of the Institute of Directors yesterday. They fully support our strategy to develop a world-class economy in Wales. Rather than continually kicking Welsh businesses in the teeth, as the hon. Gentleman does, and continually running Wales down, they remember that the Tories massacred about 1 million manufacturing jobs when they were in power. We are supporting manufacturing. The Welsh economy is on the up. The hon. Gentleman should be praising it, not kicking it.

Mrs. Jackie Lawrence (Preseli Pembrokeshire): My right hon. Friend will know of two major developments of national importance in west Wales that affect my constituency. He just mentioned one, the Bluestone project; the other is the Petroplus plan for a liquefied natural gas importation terminal, for which Pembrokeshire county council granted consent yesterday. Will my right hon. Friend also support that project, and do everything possible to ensure that the high-pressure gas pipeline is extended down to Pembrokeshire so that the project is not put at risk?

Peter Hain: I have met Petroplus representatives, and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State did so yesterday. The project in Milford Haven is very exciting: it will put Pembrokeshire at the forefront of energy supply. We will do all that we can to support it, and given my hon. Friend's additional support the future looks very bright.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim): Does the Secretary of State agree that Government policy—and indeed, the efforts of the Welsh Development Agency—contribute to the success of economic development in Wales? Might it not be of benefit for regional development agencies to come together to share experience and expertise, and avoid unnecessary competition?

Peter Hain: I certainly agree with the hon. Gentleman.

Air Transport

2. Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan): What assessment he has made of the future of air transport in Wales. [96344]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Peter Hain): Air transport is important to the economy of Wales and has a good future. The Department for Transport and the National Assembly are currently consulting on an air transport strategy for Wales.

Mr. Smith: My right hon. Friend will know of the excellent document produced by the Welsh Affairs Committee under the guidance and leadership of my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, South (Mr. Jones). It demonstrates that air transport depends on the continued success of Cardiff international airport. It also points out that if the success created by the involvement of bmibaby is to be built on, road access must be improved, and the existing road to the airport must be upgraded immediately. Will my right hon. Friend assure me that he will meet his counterpart in the National Assembly, and get the road upgraded as a matter of urgency?

Peter Hain: I agree that the report is excellent. The Welsh Affairs Committee does produce excellent reports—provided that it does not criticise the Secretary of State, of course!

Cardiff airport is now the fastest-growing regional airport in Britain. It was used by 1.5 million passengers last year, and the number is forecast to rise to 3.5 million over the coming years. Yes, the road link is crucial. When I was the Minister responsible for transport in Wales between 1997 and 1999, I tried to do something about it. I will now do all that I can to support my hon. Friend's enthusiasm, and I will receive any representations he wishes to make and any delegations he wishes to bring.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): The right hon. Gentleman will know of the threat to 160 jobs at the airfield in Llanbedwr, in my constituency. An American aeronautical company is interested in taking the airfield over lock, stock and barrel. Will the right hon. Gentleman please liaise with the First Minister and other Cabinet colleagues to ensure that the company is given all possible assistance, so that jobs can be saved and the area rejuvenated?

Peter Hain: I should be delighted to do that. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I will do all that I can. If he wishes to make any further representations to me, we can work together in achieving that objective.

Albert Owen (Ynys Môn): My hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith) referred to the Welsh Affairs Committee's report, "Transport in Wales", which recommends that a north-south link be established as soon as possible. Does my right hon. Friend agree that RAF Valley, which is in my constituency, is well placed to be the principal link, considering its existing infrastructure and technology, thereby linking the mother of Wales with the capital of Wales? Will he press his Cabinet colleagues and his colleagues in Cardiff to ensure that subsidies are discussed, and that the issue is included in the White Paper that my right hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for transport will produce?

Peter Hain: Yes, I will certainly do all of those things. I had the advantage of visiting my hon. Friend's constituency with him a few months ago. I became very aware of the excellent facility provided by RAF Valley, which could be a springboard for vital north-south air links. I hope that the Welsh Assembly Government will take this forward, and I shall certainly support it in every way that I can. We need speedy and efficient air links between north and south Wales, and, indeed, between other regions of Wales. Swansea airport, which the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) mentioned—I know that he has been a big supporter of it—should be included in that.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): I am grateful to the Secretary of State for his comments, and I should like to add my support to RAF Valley and its commercial use. However, British Airways has treated the people of Cardiff and Wales rather shabbily through its recent announcement that it is about to withdraw. Frankly, its announcement that the people of Wales can still fly BA as long as they travel from Bristol or Birmingham is a disgrace, and an insult to them. Will the Secretary of State congratulate Air Wales and bmibaby, which has announced that it will increase the number routes that it flies, and apparently is considering several other routes as well? Will he meet Tony Davies of bmibaby and Roy Thomas of Air Wales to establish the potential for those companies' providing the routes that BA has withdrawn from, and to establish whether other possibilities exist to ensure that Cardiff airport—for goodness sake, it is the regional airport of Wales—gets the support that it desperately needs?

Peter Hain: I agree with all of the points that the hon. Gentleman makes, and I should be happy to receive any such delegations. I had the advantage of visiting Cardiff heliport, which is an excellent facility and is probably the best heliport in Europe. I learned of its plan, in discussion with British Airways, to provide a shuttle service to Heathrow and to Gatwick. If we can get that off the ground, so that passengers can check in at Cardiff heliport and go straight through to Heathrow or Gatwick, that will be a marvellous facility. BA's withdrawal from Cardiff was very sad; however, bmibaby is doing a great job in filling the gap.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): Given the plan to open a passenger service from Bridgend to Barry and Cardiff through the Vale of Glamorgan, which will pass within spitting distance of Cardiff international airport, will my right hon. Friend meet the Strategic Rail Authority to persuade it to invest in extra track to enable an excellent rail link to the airport?

Peter Hain: I should be happy to do that. As my hon. Friend knows, a start will be made later this year through a new link between Cardiff central station and Rhoose airport, which will serve Cardiff airport. If we can link it with Bridgend, that would be even better.

CAP Reform

3. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): What recent discussions he has had with the First Secretary on the impact of reforms of the common agricultural policy on Wales. [96345]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Don Touhig): My right hon. Friend and I have regular meetings with the First Secretary, the Assembly's Agriculture Secretary and Ministers from the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs to discuss a variety of issues, including reform of the common agricultural policy.

Miss McIntosh: With Welsh farmers still reeling from the effects of the foot and mouth crisis, what assurance can the hon. Gentleman give that their interests will be looked after in the mid-term review of the CAP, as opposed to those of part-time French and German farmers in particular, with whom they are competing?

Mr. Touhig: It is recognised that we need reform of the CAP in order to obtain a better balance between agricultural support and rural development. That will mean more money for environmental and rural development, and less direct subsidies. Currently, the CAP costs €40 billion. The Government are working in partnership with our colleagues in the Assembly actively to ensure that the interests of Welsh farmers are protected. It is also important to get the message out to Welsh farmers—the Farmers Union of Wales was here recently, and I attended one of its events—that a range of measures exists to give them support in coping with changes to environmental, food safety and animal welfare matters. I am certainly happy to work with them in any way to make sure that they get all the help and support that they need.

Gareth Thomas (Clwyd, West): Is my hon. Friend aware of the serious problems caused in the farming community due to late payments under the integrated administration and control scheme? What progress is being made to sort out those problems, which cause real hardship?

Mr. Touhig: I am aware of the point that my hon. Friend makes; there have been some problems with the payment scheme. They resulted from the introduction of a new computer system, which had difficulty in coping with the volume of payments. It would of course be inappropriate to make payments unless the necessary controls were in place. Despite those short-term difficulties, however, I am given to understand, through discussions with Assembly colleagues who are responsible for the matter, that that major change will benefit farmers in the long term.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire): The proposed modulation system in the mid-term review will have an unfair impact on British farmers, because of the reluctance of Governments in the past to claim funds for pillar 2. Welsh farmers in the less favoured areas will be particularly badly affected. Will the Minister hold discussions with the Liberal Democrat Minister for Agriculture and Rural Development in the Assembly to ensure that Welsh farmers are not treated so badly?

Mr. Touhig: I am happy to discuss anything with Ministers in the Labour-led Assembly—[Interruption.]—that will be in place after 1 May.

Modulation and digression will not affect all farmers evenly, as the hon. Gentleman may be aware. Farmers receiving a single payment of less than €5,000 will be exempt. Initial estimates suggest that about 40 per cent. of farmers in Wales would be exempt from modulation.

Miners' Compensation

4. Mr. Martyn Jones (Clwyd, South): What progress has been made on miners' compensation payments in Wales. [96346]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Don Touhig): On the most recent figures I have available, in Wales we have paid £185 million under the respiratory disease scheme and £82 million under the vibration white finger scheme. Full and final payments have been made to 12,786 and 8,343 claimants respectively. That is significant and welcome progress, but the Government recognise that much more remains to be done. We intend to keep up the pressure to ensure that justice is delivered to our miners, their widows and their families. As chair of the monitoring group in Wales, I shall certainly play my part in that process.

Mr. Jones: I thank the Minister for that reply, which shows a sharp contrast to the lack of progress under 18 years of Tory government. However, a couple of cases are still outstanding, mainly due to the fact that the handling agreement between various employers of miners—British Coal, Wimpey and so on—does not work. Will my hon. Friend speak to the Department of Trade and Industry to move things along for the few people who are still experiencing problems with the agreement? [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the House come to order? It is unfair to hon. Members.

Mr. Touhig: Since January 2002, the number of full and final offers has increased from 2,800 to 18,700, and the number of full and final payments made has increased from 2,400 to 12,800. That is significant progress. I shall take on board, however, the point that my hon. Friend made. If he brings the details of those cases to my attention, I shall, as chair of the monitoring group, undertake to investigate the matter and get back to him.

Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): As my hon. Friend knows, miners in all our constituencies are still dying before they receive their compensation. I have to keep explaining to my constituents that the reason for that is the fact that the Conservatives fought the NUM in the courts and refused miners the compensation to which they were entitled. It was only when Labour Government came to power that the compensation was paid. We cannot make that point too often.

Mr. Touhig: I take my hon. Friend's point. There is no doubt that many miners who are no longer alive would have received their compensation had not the Conservative Government collaborated with British Coal to resist their justified claims. What is important is that last year we more than surpassed our target of 15,000 full and final offers. The monitoring group has decided to press IRISC—the Government's claims handlers—to make sure that the oldest miners, those most ill and widows are given top priority in receiving the next batch of payments. We will concentrate on that over the next six months, which I am sure right hon. and hon. Members welcome.

Research Establishments

5. Adam Price (East Carmarthen and Dinefwr): What proportion of Government research establishments are located in Wales. [96347]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Don Touhig): There are no figures available on the number of establishments. I recognise that, historically, Wales's share of research spend has been low—3 per cent. or about £65 million. The Government are taking steps to seek to redress that situation.

Adam Price: I am a little surprised at the Minister's answer. A figure is available for the number of Government research establishments in Wales—one. South-east England has a hugely disproportionate share. Why is not taxpayers' money used to counteract the existing concentration of the science base in the south-east?

Mr. Touhig: The Government, working in partnership with the National Assembly, are taking steps to improve the situation. The spending review announced the largest sustained increase in the science budget for more than a decade. The Government have announced a new tax credit aimed at boosting research and development. The National Assembly is about to launch its innovation action plan and has already established the economic research advisory panel to identify Wales's future research needs. We should contrast those developments with the policies of the hon. Gentleman's party, which, were it to come to power, would separate Wales from the United Kingdom, so there would be no investment from the UK. He will get that message on 1 May.

Firefighters' Dispute

6. Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North): What discussions he has had with the First Minister about the impact of the firefighters' dispute in Wales. [96348]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Peter Hain): I have regular discussions with the First Minister. I know that he shares my desire to see a just and affordable pay settlement for the firefighters to bring to an end to the current dispute.

Julie Morgan: Is my right hon. Friend aware that, in the last five months of 2002, firefighters from Whitchurch fire station in my constituency made 648 home visits to vulnerable and elderly people to fit smoke alarms or replace batteries? Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating them and looking forward to a fair and just settlement?

Peter Hain: I will certainly do that. Firefighters do a marvellous job on behalf of us all, risking their lives to save ours. We want a settlement that is fair to them, other public service employees and the public whom firefighters serve.

Local Government Finance

7. Mr. Huw Edwards (Monmouth): If he will meet the First Secretary to discuss the effects of proposed council tax rises in Monmouthshire and Torfaen. [96349]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Don Touhig): My right hon. Friend and I regularly meet the First Secretary to discuss matters affecting Wales.

Mr. Edwards: The Government have made a generous settlement for the Welsh Assembly, but there is concern in Monmouthshire and Torfaen about the distribution of funds from the Assembly to local authorities. Given that the vast bulk of local authority money goes to education and social services, what consideration has my hon. Friend given to the prospect of a 20 per cent. cut in public spending, which is the policy of the Conservative party?

Mr. Touhig: All sides recognise that the generous local authority settlement made by my colleague in the Assembly is most welcome. It underpins our commitment to investment in and reform of pubic services. As someone who spent 20 years as a councillor trying to defend my community from the cuts imposed by the then Tory Government, I know that the prospect of a 20 per cent. cut in public expenditure would devastate public services in Wales.

Public Ownership (Industry)

8. Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent): If he will make it his policy to take a public ownership stake in each of the leading 25 sectors of industries in Wales measured by annual turnover. [96350]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Peter Hain): No.

Llew Smith: Prior to the election of the Labour Government in 1997, my right hon. Friend, while recognising the need to elect that Government, still believed that it would be impossible to regenerate the economy without taking a public stake in 25 of the top sectors of industry. I thought that was an eminently sensible suggestion. Does he still think so?

Peter Hain: My hon. Friend refers to something that I wrote 20 years ago. One of his predecessors, the great Nye Bevan, said that socialists must move with the times. I am sure that my hon. Friend agrees that, just like company shares, the value of some policies can go down as well as up.

Trunk Roads

9. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): What discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Transport concerning improvements to trunk road links between mid-Wales and the west midlands. [96351]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Don Touhig): My right hon. Friend and I have regular discussions with Cabinet colleagues and Assembly Ministers about issues affecting Wales. More than 2 million visitors come to mid-Wales each year, and 20 per cent. of them travel from the west midlands. Good-quality roads are vital to increasing the number of tourists coming to Wales.

Michael Fabricant: I am glad that the Minister recognises that, but 2 million is not enough—we should have 4 million. Does the Minister realise that we might get 4 million if only the link road—the A460, which links the new M6 toll road with the existing M54—were improved? What discussions has the Minister had with the Secretary of State for Transport to ensure that that happens?

Mr. Touhig: I have great affection for the hon. Gentleman, who is a passionate supporter of all things Welsh, which we welcome. However, it is amazing that he should demand extra spending when his party is committed to a 20 per cent. cut in public expenditure. He had better have a word with his Front Bench colleagues, because, as usual, the Tory party is at odds over those issues.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [97052] Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 12 February.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

Mr. Boswell: It is a time of great anxiety at home and abroad, and we have an absolute need for frankness and accountability. In the light of today's revelations of ministerial pressure on the independent Audit Commission, which comes on top of last week's revelations about a questionable security dossier on Iraq, will the Prime Minister issue a simple and binding instruction that the spinning has to stop?

The Prime Minister: On the document, I point out to the hon. Gentleman that the part of the document that dealt with intelligence was indeed from intelligence sources, as the document stated. It is important that that is underlined. Of course, especially at the moment, it is important that we give accurate information to people, and the information given was accurate.

Q2. [97053] Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley): I wonder whether my right hon. Friend is aware that the good constituents of Chorley wonder whether, if the report from Dr. Blix on Friday states that more time is needed or more inspectors are needed, the Prime Minister will support that view and try to ensure that a peaceful solution is reached.

The Prime Minister: Of course we will take full account of anything that Dr. Blix says. I point out that he has said that the issue is not the need for more inspectors but the failure of Iraq to co-operate. I wish to make the point to my hon. Friend and, through him, to his constituents, that the issue of time for the inspectors is an issue of the time to make a judgment about whether Iraq is co-operating. If Iraq is co-operating, the inspectors can have as much time as they need and want to do their work. If Iraq is not co-operating, we have to be careful that we do not get sucked back into the situation we had in the 1990s, when the inspectors were in Iraq for years but, for example, the Iraqis denied the existence of their biological weapons programme, refused to co-operate with the inspectors, and said that it was all an invention of the CIA and the British security services. It was only when Saddam's son-in-law defected—he was later murdered by Saddam—that we discovered the existence of the programme. I agree that we have to take full account of what the inspectors say, but the issue that we come back to time and again, in order to avoid a conflict, is whether Iraq will co-operate fully or not.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green): NATO has been the cornerstone of British security and ensured peace in Europe for decades. Now that France, Germany and Belgium have plunged NATO into one of its greatest crises, will the Prime Minister join me in condemning the action of those Governments, and will he tell the House what he intends to do to ensure that the Turks receive the protection to which they are entitled?

The Prime Minister: Of course we were one of the 16 members of NATO who wanted Turkey to be given that protection fully. Negotiations and discussions are going on in NATO at the moment and I hope that they are successful. I hope that we are able to fulfil our obligations to Turkey, because that is important for Turkey and for the NATO alliance.

Mr. Duncan Smith: The French and German actions have clearly undermined NATO but, when it comes to the UN and Iraq, it is absolutely right to work for a second resolution. Given that the Labour Party chairman has today described the threat to Heathrow as being on the same scale as 11 September, will the Prime Minister agree with me that our security and the disarmament of Saddam Hussein cannot be held to ransom by a French veto in the Security Council?

The Prime Minister: It is precisely for that reason that I think that it is important that we make sure that the will of the UN is upheld. On each occasion, we should go back to resolution 1441, which says that Iraq should have a final opportunity to disarm itself through the weapons inspectors, and that it has to co-operate fully. If Iraq is in breach of that resolution, I believe that action should follow. However, I still believe that it is possible that we shall attain a second resolution in the UN. I believe that the matter should be resolved through the UN. After all, the original instruction given to Saddam was an instruction from the UN.

Mr. Duncan Smith: Given the events of the past couple of weeks, and the different world views of France and Germany, what more would it take for the Prime Minister to reconsider his deep commitment to a single European foreign policy and army?

The Prime Minister: I thought that we would get to that sooner or later. I think that it would be immensely damaging to allow the debate about European defence to go on without British input. The most disastrous policy that this country could adopt is the empty-chair, opt-out policy in Europe that is the policy of the Opposition. As a result of the measures that we secured in negotiating European defence, there can be no European defence initiative in any field without the unanimous consent of all countries. That, therefore, gives us a veto over any initiative. It is important that we play our full part in European defence. Otherwise, the consequence would be, not that there was no European defence policy, but that it would exist without British input. That would be bad for Britain, NATO and Europe.

Q3. [97054] Mr. Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central): Does my right hon. Friend accept that the British public remains largely sceptical about the case for military action against Iraq, but that they believe that the Americans will take military action almost come what may? Will he tell the House and the country why we should believe that a war now will make peace in the middle east more likely and in the end make Britain less of a target for terrorists?

The Prime Minister: I think that the best answer is to go back to first principles again. We decided to go through the UN to deal with this matter—and this is the absolute answer to those who say that we were hell bent on war, come what may—so that we could get a UN resolution in order to avoid war. If Saddam had complied fully with the resolution passed last November, conflict would not even be an issue today. The choice, in the end, is for Saddam. However, if we fail to implement resolution 1441, and if we lack the determination and resolution to make sure that that mandate is carried, the consequence will be that Saddam is free to develop weapons of mass destruction. Also, there will be an increasing risk that the threat of those weapons of mass destruction and the existing terrorist threat will join together. This country will then be less secure and safe. It is best to deal with this through the UN but, as I have said from the outset, the UN has to be the way to deal the matter, not the way to avoid dealing with it.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West): As the questions from the hon. Members for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) and for Manchester, Central (Mr. Lloyd) made clear, every measure of public opinion shows that people are not persuaded of the case for the course of action being followed, despite all the persuasive efforts of the Prime Minister and the Government. Why does the Prime Minister think that that remains the case?

The Prime Minister: First, I think that those surveys of public opinion will be different if there is a second UN resolution, and I point out also that we are not yet in conflict. Secondly, however, I think that people do believe that Saddam is an evil man and a dictator, and that there is a threat to this country from his accumulated weapons of mass destruction, but that they ask, reasonably and rightly, whether there is not an alternative to war. The answer to that question is that there is an alternative to war and it is set out in the UN resolution. That alternative is full and complete co-operation with the UN inspectors. However, I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will accept that, if that full and complete co-operation is not there, we have to find other means of enforcing the will of the UN. Otherwise, the threat to this country that people do accept is present will carry on in existence.

Mr. Kennedy: On the latter point, could the Prime Minister therefore be more explicit than he was to the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) a few minutes ago? If Dr. Blix requests more time on Friday, will the Prime Minister actively and publicly speak out in favour of that?

The Prime Minister: As I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) a moment or two ago, of course what Dr. Blix says is important and we will take full account of it, but the judgment that has to be made in the end is one by the Security Council as to whether there is full and complete co-operation by Iraq with the United Nations inspectors. I believe that those inspectors, if they were given that co-operation, could do their work very easily; but if they are not given that co-operation, surely, the right hon. Gentleman must see the danger that we get sucked back into delays of months and then years, with the inspectors playing a game of hide and seek with Saddam, and we are unable then to shut down the weapons of mass destruction programme that he accepts, that I accept and that everyone accepts is a threat and a danger to the world.

Q4. [97055] Peter Bradley (The Wrekin): Does my right hon. Friend not agree that differential student fees will help to create differential universities, awarding differential degrees to differential graduates with differential job prospects? If he does, can he tell me how that will fulfil our pledge to ensure equality of opportunity through our education system?

The Prime Minister: There are two separate issues. First, I would simply say to my hon. Friend that, of course, there is differential funding now for different universities. So, for example, Oxford or Cambridge will receive four times the amount of public funding as, let us say, Wolverhampton university. What is important is that, if those universities want even more money, it should not come simply from the taxpayer. The second thing I would say to him is that, since we know that 90 per cent. of young people in sixth forms go on to university, the absolute keys to access are the measures to improve standards in our secondary schools that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills is taking.

Q5. [97056] Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire): There is no doubt about the danger posed by Saddam Hussein or about the deceit that he is prepared to practise, but is the Prime Minister certain that we are not allowing frustration and impatience to cloud our judgment, for what new threat, proven threat or imminent threat is there to justify war?

The Prime Minister: There is the threat that we have identified in the resolution last year and, indeed, for the past 12 years, and there are two ways of dealing with it. [Interruption.] Someone shouts out the word "containment". When we look at the issue and the moral background to the decisions that have to be taken, I agree that, before we take the decision to go to war, the morality of that should weigh heavily on our conscience because innocent people die as well as the guilty in a war, but let us look at the morality of the present policy that we have towards Iraq and the policy that we have had for the past 12 years—a policy of sanctions that, because of the way that Saddam has implemented those sanctions, leaves Iraq in this state: with 130 deaths per 1,000 children under the age of five, with 60 per cent. of the population on food aid, with half the Iraqis in rural areas having no access to safe water and with thousands of people imprisoned or killed every year as a result of Saddam's regime. The fact is that the only— [Interruption.] I am sorry; the only alternative to disarmament by the United Nations is that we keep sanctions in place year on year, and I am simply saying that that is also a moral choice with bad and devastating consequences for the Iraqi people.

Q6. [97057] Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): I apologise to the Prime Minister for distracting him from international matters, but he is aware of the campaign that has been run by the all-party group for haemophilia and the Haemophilia Society to get recombinant treatment for all haemophiliacs in the United Kingdom. Can he inform the House whether the Government have reached a decision and, if so, what it is?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend raises a very important issue, and he will be aware that the Government have now allocated just under £90 million for synthetic clotting factors to help those with the condition of haemophilia. That will be rolled out across the country in the months to come, and it will make a considerable difference to the treatment of that condition throughout the country.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green): When the Prime Minister said that he would cut by half the number of people seeking asylum in this country by September, was that an aspiration or a firm pledge?

The Prime Minister: It was a firm commitment, of course.

Mr. Duncan Smith: On Friday, the Prime Minister said that his new asylum target was a pledge, although I see that he has now changed that; on Saturday, the Home Office said that it was undeliverable; and on Monday, his own spokesman from Downing street called it an aspiration—and all because this was another policy given to the Prime Minister by Alastair Campbell as he walked into the television studio. Why does the Government's asylum policy change every time the Prime Minister goes into a television studio to do an interview?

The Prime Minister: As I have no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman will be aware, having said that we will cut it by half by September, whatever it is called, we will be held to account for it—and so we should be. However, let me point out to him that what he is saying now is exactly the ridicule that he heaped on the street crime initiative. We remember at the time that that was described by the shadow Home Secretary as not having a prospect of being achieved. I might remind him today that street crime is 20 per cent. down on last year, and 33 per cent. down in London. The right hon. Gentleman will be eating his words on asylum too.

Mr. Duncan Smith: Violent crime up, burglaries up and gun crime doubled since this Government took over—that is not much of a record. The Prime Minister's asylum policy is in a complete shambles. We all know that. He scrapped the white list, then reintroduced it. He introduced vouchers, then scrapped them. He scrapped benefit changes, then reintroduced them. The last time the Prime Minister went on television, he said that he would renegotiate the convention on human rights, but his Home Secretary turned round and said that he could not. All the while, the number of asylum seekers is rising. It has reached 100,000 a year. We are now taking more than any other country in Europe. Instead of getting on television, why does the Prime Minister not just get on with his job?

The Prime Minister: We shall have to see. We can have this conversation again in June when the figures for the first quarter come out, and we can have it again in November when the September figures come out. The measures that we introduced last year, which toughen up the asylum procedures and which were opposed by the Conservative party every step of the way, are already making a difference. However, I agree with the right hon. Gentleman entirely: the question will be whether the commitment is met or not. We shall wait and see.

Q7. [97058] Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West): What does the Prime Minister think of a system that encouraged, and in many cases compelled, hundreds of former workers from Allied Steel and Wire Ltd. in Cardiff and Sheerness to contribute to their occupational pension scheme, and that now leaves them facing the prospect of receiving little or nothing in return? Will he promise the House that he will consider early-day motion 710, which is in my name and which contains proposals to help those workers? Instead of security and fairness in retirement, they face insecurity and injustice.

The Prime Minister: I will certainly study carefully the early-day motion to which my hon. Friend refers. He will know that this is a serious situation for his constituents. I understand that he has had a meeting with my right hon. Friend the Minister about it. There is a proposal in the Green Paper to increase to 100 per cent. the compensation given in circumstances where there has been dishonesty in relation to a pension fund. We are also looking at discontinuance payments as well, as part of a series of measures to protect people in the situation in which my hon. Friend's constituents find themselves. We will do our best to help him resolve the particular case that he raises.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent): In a parliamentary written answer this week, the Ministry of Defence stated that 10,400 of our service men and women who are deploying to the Gulf receive local overseas allowance in addition to their salary. In a separate answer, it was said that single and married unaccompanied personnel lose 20 per cent. of their living overseas allowance rate after the first 17 days, and married personnel lose 35 per cent. if their families go home for more than 17 days. Does the Prime Minister agree that it is wholly wrong that members of our armed forces should be penalised financially for service in the Gulf? Will he make a firm commitment to the House to stop that penalisation?

The Prime Minister: I am afraid that I cannot give the hon. Gentleman that commitment, because we have to apply the rules that have applied for many years in relation to this issue. I simply say to him that we will, of course, look at whatever we can do to give our armed forces the protection that they need, but that has to be done within the overall financial settlement of the Ministry of Defence.

Q8. [97059] Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North): At a time when gun crime continues to rise across London, what lessons does my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister believe—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let the hon. Gentleman be heard.

Mr. Gardiner: What lessons does my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister believe should be learned from the successful Operation Trident and the "not another drop" campaign in Brent, which have seen deaths from gun crime not happen for a year and a half in that borough? Will he ensure that the use of automatic number plate registration piloted in Brent to target known gangsters is adopted throughout the capital and, in particular, will he ensure that the Mayor's cameras—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to say that there has been a very successful operation in Brent, but it is obviously an operational matter for the Metropolitan Police Commissioner as to whether it is extended throughout the capital. My hon. Friend will also know that we have a proposal, which I hope will be supported by the whole House, for anyone found in illegal possession of a firearm to be given a mandatory five-year sentence.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): On 3 February 2003 at column 22, the Prime Minister took personal responsibility for placing the dodgy document on Iraq in the Library of the House. Yesterday, the Minister of State at the Ministry of Defence told the House that it was only the middle part of the document that was the subject of a postgraduate thesis. The middle part of the document—part 2—is the part on Iraq's network of intelligence and security, so will the Prime Minister now tell the House who actually wrote part 2 of the document? Did he know who wrote it before he placed it in the House of Commons? Will he now apologise to the House for putting something of such questionable genesis before the House?

The Prime Minister: As I said in answer to the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), the part of the document dealing with intelligence was, indeed, taken from intelligence services information. Secondly, the whole document, as has been accepted by everyone, is accurate.

Q9. [97060] Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North): My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will be aware that my constituency of Ealing, North is extremely close to Heathrow airport and that the airport is the major employer of my constituents. May I tell him that the current security operation at Heathrow airport has had a sobering effect on many of us in west London and has brought home to us the imminence of the threat? Will he publicly record his appreciation of the police, military and emergency services who have done an excellent job at Heathrow airport and continue to do so?

The Prime Minister: Obviously, we send our thanks and congratulations to the police, to our armed forces, to the security services and to everyone who works on our behalf to protect us against the security threat that does not affect just this country but, obviously, affects countries right across the world at the moment. It is worth pointing out that terrorist arrests are not just happening in this country, but in virtually every European country and in many other countries right across the globe. The result of that is that we occasionally have to take measures that we prefer not to take, but that are necessary to give people the security and protection that they need.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): May I return to the dossier—the one that Colin Powell said was a fine document and the one that the Prime Minister tells us is accurate? Does the Prime Minister accept that it is not just a question of plagiarism but of changing key phrases? The phrase "Iraqi aid for opposition groups" in the original becomes "Iraqi support for terrorist organisations" in the Government's Downing street document. What possible motivation is there for making these changes apart from propagandising to war? If the Prime Minister cannot be trusted on that, how can he be trusted on anything?

The Prime Minister: First of all, let me just tell the hon. Gentleman, as I said a moment or two ago, that the part of the document that Colin Powell referred to about intelligence is, indeed, taken from intelligence sources and is entirely accurate, as is the document as a whole. Secondly, in relation to Iraq's support for terrorist groups, he may not believe that Iraq supports terrorist groups, but its support for such groups is well known and well documented quite apart from any intelligence information that we put out. I am only sorry that he does not recognise that.

Q10. [97061] Linda Perham (Ilford, North): Following the crash at Chancery Lane on the underground, what assurances can my right hon. Friend give my constituents and the travelling public in London? When will the Central line service resume?

The Prime Minister: When it fully resumes is obviously a matter for the underground and the Health and Safety Executive. I hope that it will resume as quickly as possible. My hon. Friend will recognise that the work of the underground and the Health and Safety Executive is extremely important in providing protection for people. Accidents will occur from time to time, but after what happened the Underground and the Health and Safety Executive have been able to make sure that they have identified the cause and are now putting the matter right.

Q11. [97062] Tony Baldry (Banbury): Last week the Prime Minister said that there needed to be a humanitarian plan for Iraq every bit as viable and as worked out as a military plan. How will aid for the Iraqi people be provided if the oil for food programme is suspended? What preparations are in place for refugees in Iraq, bearing in mind that after the Gulf war 1.8 million Iraqis went on the move, which was 18 times the number of people who fled Afghanistan?

The Prime Minister: These are precisely the issues that we are working on now with the United Nations and with our allies. As I am sure the hon. Gentleman knows, there is already a humanitarian situation in Iraq. Indeed, there has been for many years, which is why 60 per cent. of the population are dependent on the oil for food programme. We would have to make sure—and this is what we are working to do now—that in the event of any conflict we continue that programme and that aid reaches the people whom it needs to reach.

There are literally thousands of Iraqi refugees streaming across Europe even now. There are programmes in place, which we have to make sure we keep in place. The whole purpose of the planning that we are doing, with our allies and the United Nations, is to make sure that whatever the humanitarian consequences of any potential conflict they are dealt with properly.

Q12. [97063] Mr. John MacDougall (Central Fife): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 has proved to be a success? There is an increasing threat of terrorism, and I know that arrests have been made in Glasgow and Edinburgh. Without the Act, I think the public would have felt less secure.

The Prime Minister: That is right. As a result of the measures that the security services have taken and as a result of the new powers under the anti-terrorism and crime legislation, we have been able to arrest people and to detain without trial those suspected of being engaged in conspiring to commit terrorist acts here. I would repeat the point I made a few moments ago, that this is not simply happening in this country, but is happening right across Europe. There are trials and arrests of suspected terrorists and arrests. We are working very closely with other European countries to make sure that we achieve the maximum co-operation, since many of the cells in different European countries work together.

Q13. [97064] Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge): Will the Prime Minister– [Interruption.] The Tory Benches are so predictable.

Will the Prime Minister ensure that, when considering the increase in pensions this year, the Chancellor will take full account of the rise that is occurring in council tax? Will he ensure that pensioners are not worse off?

The Prime Minister: Of course, pensioners will pay council tax as other people do, subject to the help that is given, but the Government are giving an enormous amount of additional help to pensioners, not just in the winter allowance and the free TV licences, not just in the minimum income guarantee, but in the pension credit that is coming in April, which will mean that large numbers of pensioners are substantially better off if they have small amounts of savings. That will help them considerably.

As for whatever the hon. Gentleman has done to offend the Conservative party, I should very much like to know, and I suspect that I might support him on that.

Q14. [97065] Phil Sawford (Kettering): On Saturday I shall be taking part in a rally here in London with thousands of other people who are deeply concerned about the prospect of war with Iraq. Does my right hon. Friend have a message for the people on that rally, bearing in mind that many of them are his friends, not his enemies?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I do have a message for people on that rally who I am sure are motivated by the best intentions and motives and believe sincerely in their views. My message is twofold: first, that we should be glad that we live in this country and not in Iraq because people can come together and demonstrate their position on political issues of the day; and secondly, as I said a moment or two ago, that the moral choice, which is the way that it is put by many of those who intend to go on the march, has to weigh up the moral consequences of war. The alternative is to carry on with the sanctions regime, which has resulted, because of how Saddam implements it, in thousands of people dying needlessly in Iraq every year. In addition, of course, many thousands of people are political detainees or are executed as a result of their political views. I hope that when people go on that march they at least recognise that those of us who take a different view hold that view with as much conviction and sincerity as they hold their view.

Points of Order

Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday, during the urgent question, the Minister of State for the armed forces imputed to me opinions that I do not hold and actions that I have not executed. He used the word "Friends" to imply that I had opposed military action in Afghanistan whereas, in fact, I had supported it. He then impertinently reminded me that I supported the Government and had stood on that manifesto. Neither I nor any Labour candidate stood on a manifesto that committed this country to a pre-emptive strike against Iraq with or without a mandate from the United Nations.

I raise those issues out of respect for you, Mr. Speaker, and the House and, indeed, as a duty to my constituents to set the record straight. Equally, the Official Report implies that from a sedentary position I said that I was not proud of my party. I am very proud of my party; it is my Government of whom I am ashamed—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a matter for the Chair, but the hon. Lady has been able to put the record straight.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In the light—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman is making a point of order. Hon. Members should be quiet when they leave the Chamber.

Mr. Letwin: In the light of the remarks made in the past hour by the chairman of the Labour party that the current terrorist threat is the most serious to have affected this country, will you, Mr. Speaker, consider granting some form of parliamentary occasion to enable us to receive a statement from the Government on the assessment that they make, on a considered basis, of that very serious threat? We wholly agree that it is a serious threat. The House of Commons must surely be the place in which such statements should be made, rather than on the airwaves.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would it not be appropriate for an hon. Member to move a Standing Order No. 24? The matter is urgent and specific, and it requires parliamentary debate. If you would be kind enough, I would be glad to move that exceptionally briefly so that you could grant it.

Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I fully support the request made by the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin). May we have an opportunity to debate that national issue separate from the international issues in an extensive half-day or whole-day debate, ideally in Government time, within the next week in the context of security in the United Kingdom at the moment?

Mr. Speaker: What I would say to the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) is that a Standing Order No. 24 cannot be moved. It must go before the Speaker prior to the House sitting and therefore cannot be done today. I say to the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) and the hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) that I understand that a briefing on security was recently given on a very private basis. Both are privy to information—

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle): What about the rest of us?

Mr. Speaker: I merely state the fact that briefings have been given just in case someone does not know about them. I am concerned to ensure that the rest of the House is informed of that.

I do not have the necessary powers for today, but the usual channels are available to hon. Members. It should be possible to pursue the matter to see whether a statement can be made to the House. It is for Ministers to make that statement and to approach me on the matter.

Animals (Electric Shock Collars)

12.35 pm

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to ban the manufacture, sale or use of collars which administer electric shocks to animals

In 1996, I presented a Bill to the House with the aim of banning the manufacture, sale and use of electric shock dog collars. It was identical to the present Bill save for the fact that it referred only to dogs, whereas the new Bill refers to collars used on any animal. The reason for the change is simply that there was a loophole in my original Bill. Banning the manufacture or sale of equipment for use on dogs alone is pointless, because it would be virtually impossible to prove that the equipment had not been intended for use on, say, cats or animals of a similar size. That may be why, sadly, my original Bill was never passed. Having removed the loophole, however, I hope that the House will now see fit to give me leave to introduce the new Bill.

Electric shock collars were first drawn to my attention by one of my constituents, who was horrified to see them advertised in a local magazine. There are two basic types, both of which depend on the animal wearing a collar to which a battery is attached. When the battery is switched on, the animal is given an electric shock. In one type, the battery is switched on by remote control, and is intended to be used when the animal is being trained. When it does something that the user of the equipment wishes to discourage, the user activates the remote control and the pain experienced by the animal is expected to persuade it not to repeat the unwanted behaviour—in other words, it is a basic form of aversion therapy.In the other type, a wire is laid in the ground around an area within which the animal is to be restrained, such as the owner's garden. A current in the wire activates the shock collar whenever the animal goes too close to the edge of the area. The idea is that the animal learns, again by a basic form of aversion therapy, to stay well within the constraining area without the need for erecting tall fences around the property.

The equipment should be banned because there is obviously inherent cruelty in using pain to discourage unwanted behaviour when one could and should be using rewards to encourage good behaviour. All the animal agencies agree that all dogs can be trained by using positive encouragement if training is correctly carried out from the beginning. Moreover, even if a dog has been poorly trained, and has learnt bad habits that prove difficult to eradicate, alternative equipment is on the market, for example citronella spray collars, which can be used to break bad habits without causing the animal physical pain. Such collars work by emitting a lemon-flavoured spray instead of an electric shock when the unwanted behaviour is exhibited.

The fact of the matter is that electric shock equipment is used mainly by those who simply cannot be bothered, or do not have the patience, to train a dog properly with the use of rewards, and are prepared to inflict pain in the hope that it will prove a short cut to good behaviour. Let me make it clear that I have no doubt that the equipment can be at least superficially effective. There is, however, considerable evidence that the electric shock collars, even when used as intended, can have unfortunate side effects. In the magazine PetDogs, the Association of Pet Behaviour Counsellors said:

"A dog experiencing an unpleasant shock to the neck 'out of the blue' will associate the sensation with whatever the dog happens to be focusing on at the time . . . It could, for example, become afraid of, and as a result potentially aggressive towards, owners, children, other dogs or strangers."

There is a recorded example of one dog, which, when its collar was first activated, panicked and ran for home across a number of dangerous roads. After a further visit to the same spot on Wimbledon common, the dog again bolted and was missing for a week. A Dutch study by Dr. Joanna Van Der Borg compared dogs trained using electric shock collars with dogs trained using more conventional methods. The shocked dogs showed persistent and long-term behaviour differences that indicated that they were under stress and in fear.

It is not just a case of those collars being unnecessarily cruel and potentially damaging when used as intended. The case for a ban is far stronger, because the greatest danger for the animals arises when the equipment is either misused or malfunctions in some way. Misuse can be unintentional or the result of a fit of anger at a dog's refusal to comply with the owner's attempt to train it, or it can even happen, perish the thought, at the hands of sadists. In one case, for example, a dog developed an irrational fear of returning home after dark. It was eventually found that the dog had been shut up overnight in a room, half of which was sufficiently close to the electric wire surrounding the property to activate its electric collar. Perhaps, come to think of it, that is not such an irrational fear.

Other cases include those of dogs that have been brought to vets with severe neck burns. Of course, it is always claimed that such injuries are the result of a malfunction of the collar rather than deliberate mistreatment. One inevitable cause of malfunction is that the electrical properties of an animal's neck are affected by how wet it is. An animal that suddenly runs off through long grass that is wet, or is simply out on a rainy day, may experience from its collar a level of pain different from that which would be felt by a dry animal.

Those who support the use of shock collars often challenge opponents to feel a collar when it is activated so that they can experience how slight the shock is, but a study by Ewan Ferguson, a specialist in veterinary dermatology on behalf of the National Canine Defence League, has shown that an animal's coat of fur provides a significant degree of physical protection. As a result, the epidermis of normal canine skin is significantly thinner than that of human skin—a fact that I certainly would not have known until I did some research on the matter. Indeed, I do not suppose that most hon. Members were aware of it. Moreover, an animal's sweat glands work in an entirely different way, so that the level of humidity of its skin, even when it has not been near an external source of water, is very unpredictable. For all those reasons, there is considerable danger that an animal may suffer a great deal more pain from its collar than the owner intends or even realises because of circumstances over which the owner may have little or no control.

So what can we do about the problem? When the matter was first brought to my attention, it was immediately clear that no Government would be prepared to ban such equipment if they were using it themselves. I therefore asked some parliamentary questions about the use of shock collars in the public services. To my horror, I discovered that, although most public services were not using such equipment and had no intention of ever doing so, the Prison Service owned such a collar and had used it, as had several of our police forces.

Happily, my investigations rapidly led the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe), the then Home Office Minister with responsibility for such matters—I am happy to see her in her place today; if I may say so, she is well known for her support for animal welfare—to ensure that the equipment was never used again by the Prison Service. Moreover, after the Labour Government took office, to their credit, they ensured that prison regulations were changed to ban the use of electric collars. Meanwhile, further pressure from me and a number of animal charities and welfare organisations soon led the Association of Chief Police Officers to decide to end the use of the collars by the police.

I therefore believe that no public bodies still make any use of that horrible equipment. Perhaps as a result, a Bill to ban the manufacture, sale and use of electric collars now has very widespread support. For example, as hon. Members will see if the House gives me leave to bring in the Bill, it already has supporters from five political parties represented in the House, including the three major national parties. It is also supported by the all-party group on animal welfare and the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, which both alerted the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs to their views in their submissions to the recent consultation on a potential new animal welfare Bill. The dog legislation advisory group, which includes representatives not only from the RSPCA, but from the Kennel Club, the National Canine Defence League and the Blue Cross, is also very supportive, as are a number of animal welfare charities, such as the People's Dispensary for Sick Animals and a large number of specialist pet care magazines.

I do not pretend that the Bill is of earth-shattering proportions or that it will change the fate of nations, but it is simple and straightforward and has the potential to improve animal welfare and prevent much suffering. Given the level of support that it has received from all those who know and care about animals, I trust and hope that I can count on the support of all hon. Members this afternoon.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. David Rendel, Mr. Roger Williams, Bob Russell, Mr. Ian Cawsey, Dr. Nick Palmer, Mr. Andrew Rosindell, Mr. Elfyn Llwyd, Lady Hermon, Mr. Nigel Jones, Mr. Roger Gale, Mr. Keith Bradley and Miss Ann Widdecombe.

ANIMALS (ELECTRIC SHOCK COLLARS)

Mr. David Rendel accordingly presented a Bill to ban the manufacture, sale or use of collars which administer electric shocks to animals: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 7 March, and to be printed [Bill 57].

Opposition Day

[FOURTH ALLOTTED DAY] [SECOND PART]

Economy and Public Services

Mr. Speaker: I inform the House that I have selected the amendment tabled in the name of the Prime Minister.

12.46 pm

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe): I beg to move,

That this House acknowledges the serious concern about the current state of the UK economy, including economic imbalances, the failure of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to meet his economic forecasts, the ever higher taxes, the disproportionate fall in the UK stock market, the decline in productivity growth, and the crisis in funded pensions; recognises the harm done to business and the enterprise culture as a result of increases in red tape and business tax since 1997, now estimated to cost up to £15 billion a year; is shocked by the Chancellor of the Exchequer's complacency on these matters; is concerned that the forthcoming rise in National Insurance contributions will have further adverse effects on jobs, incomes and economic confidence; notes that tax revenues have already risen by £36 a week for every man, woman and child since 1997; deplores the fact that, despite substantial increases in taxes and Government expenditure, the lack of real reform means that the promised improvements in public services have not materialized, with a recent rise of 22 per cent. in NHS funding leading to a rise of just 1.6 per cent. in the number of patients treated, with one in four children leaving primary school unable to read, write and count properly, with a crumbling transport system, and with only one crime in every 40 resulting in a conviction; and calls on the Government to end its cycle of tax and spend and fail.

For the avoidance of doubt, I draw the attention of the House to my declaration in the Register of Members' Interests.

This debate is taking place just before Valentine's day, and it is appropriately timed. It is being held at a time when the British people's love affair with new Labour is coming to an end, when the unblinking loyalty of Labour Back Benchers is reaching breaking point, and when the sham marriage of the Chancellor and the Prime Minister—a marriage in which one partner thought that the pre-nuptial agreement would lead to No. 10 Downing street rather than the Back Benches—is falling apart. It did not have to be this way. If we had a Government who delivered, we would not be having this debate today. But they have not delivered; they have repeatedly broken their promises to those who have seen their personal pensions halve since Labour took office, to mortgage payers whose endowments will not match their liabilities, and to investors who have seen the stock market fall to a level far below what it was in 1997. Labour told all those people that things could only get better. What of the promises to those who rely on our hospitals and schools? They, too, have been failed by this Government.

Anyone listening to the Chancellor of the Exchequer could be forgiven for thinking that none of this mattered. He found time last week to deliver an Olympian address to the Social Market Foundation. In it, there was barely a word about the chronic failure of all too many of our public services, and barely a word about the serious imbalances in the British economy. Instead, he told the foundation that his policies were taking the country

"along the road towards a Britain of opportunity and security for all".

As the economics editor of The Guardian pointed out this week, either

"he has started to believe his own rhetoric, or he is living in a parallel universe".

The very week of the Chancellor's speech was another black week for the British economy. On Monday, BDO Stoy Hayward said that its optimism index of British business had fallen for four quarters in a row. On Tuesday, a Confederation of British Industry survey showed the highest proportion of firms operating below capacity for 20 years, and found that manufacturers' confidence had fallen in every region of the United Kingdom. On Wednesday, there were figures showing the weakest new business activity for a year. On Thursday, an interest rate cut was seen as such a sign of concern about the economy that share prices actually fell, and Friday saw the sharpest fall in manufacturing output and the highest number of insolvencies for a decade. If the Chancellor had not been living in his parallel universe, none of this would have come as a surprise.

Phil Hope (Corby): Speaking of parallel universes, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman confirm that, if his party were in government, it would introduce a 20 per cent. cut across the board in public spending? Yes or no?

Mr. Howard: Of course we are not going to do anything like that—we never said we would. We said that we would look to save money from the money that is wasted by the present Government, and they do waste far too much.

I want to return to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's parallel universe. After all, if one imposes burdens on business through taxes and red tape that the CBI estimates as costing up to £15 billion a year, why should anyone be surprised that corporate profitability is at its lowest level for nine years, that business investment has fallen more sharply than it has since records were first kept more than three decades ago, or that the rate of productivity growth has halved?

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Howard: I shall not give way for the moment.

If those burdens on business include a £5 billion a year tax imposed on pension funds, why should anyone be surprised when funds offload UK equities in favour of overseas equities and the UK stock market falls further and faster than those in the United States and France?

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North): The shadow Chancellor said that he had said nothing of the sort, referring to the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight). Does he agree that the Leader of the Opposition, in referring to the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs, said, "He is looking to see if he can get to that figure. He believes it is a rational target to look at."? Either the shadow Chancellor agrees with the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs or he believes that he, too, is living in a parallel universe. Which is it, and if the hon. Gentleman is in a parallel universe why does not the Shadow Chancellor get rid of him from the Front Bench?

Mr. Howard: Let me try to explain the matter to the hon. Gentleman in words of one syllable. We believe that a great deal of money is being wasted by this Government, and every day more evidence becomes available that that is so. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner) intervened on the shadow Chancellor. He should have the courtesy to allow him to reply. That goes for all hon. Members—it is far too noisy.

Mr. Howard: We believe, to complete my answer to the hon. Gentleman in words of one syllable, that we have a duty to the British taxpayer to examine and to remove the waste that has come from the policies of the present Government. The more that the hon. Gentleman and other Labour Members bleat about that, the less credit they will be given by the electorate.

Now I want to talk about what the Government are doing. I remind the House that as the Chancellor was delivering his Olympian address to the Social Market Foundation last week, 15 new regulations were being introduced, as they have been on every working day, on average, since the Government took office. That is the real world. That is the world in which British business has to live. That is the world in which 95 per cent. of company leaders say that regulation has increased over the past five years. That is the world in which Britain has fallen out of the top 10, down to 16th, in the world competitiveness league. It is a world in which the Government have steadily, relentlessly and remorselessly undermined the ability of British business to win orders and to create jobs.

What is the result of all that? In the real world, Britain has recorded a trade deficit in every month since January 1998, and this week the deficit in goods in 2002 was shown to be the largest since records were first kept—in 1697. In the real world, as the director general of the British Chambers of Commerce said this week,

"The UK economy is obviously losing its competitive edge in the international marketplace."

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley): I do not want to remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman of the cuts that were made and the many jobs that were lost when his party were in government, but, on the balance of trade, would it not be reasonable to compare the balance of trade of this nation with that of all other nations? If he looks at the records, they will show that the balance of trade here is exactly equal to that of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development and the European Union as a whole.

Mr. Howard: It is reasonable to look at our record today compared with our record in the past. The fact that we have the biggest deficit since 1697 indicates that not everything in the world is as wonderful as the Chancellor of the Exchequer suggests that it is in his parallel universe.

In the real world, pensions are in crisis. The value of personal pensions has halved in the past five years. Fewer than four in 10 final salary schemes are open to new members, and half of those are contemplating closure. Of course, for those living in a parallel universe the Chancellor's decision in 1997 to tax the dividend income from pensions savings at £5 billion a year—equivalent to £400 per contributor per year—had absolutely nothing to do with that lamentable performance.

According to the Chancellor, none of this matters. He says that what he refers to as "the fundamentals" are all doing fine. Of course, we are all pleased that unemployment overall continues to fall, but does the Chancellor recognise that manufacturing employment also continues to fall, that it has fallen by 600,000 since Labour took office, that manufacturing output fell by 4 per cent. last year, and that both manufacturing output and manufacturing investment are at lower levels than they were in 1997, when this Government took office? Is it the sign of a fundamentally sound economy when manufacturing has been teetering on the brink of recession, while consumers are saving less and have built up higher debts than ever before? Indeed, the Labour-dominated Select Committee on the Treasury highlights the imbalances in our economy, which it describes as "potentially serious and increasing".

Not only is the economy unbalanced, but the Chancellor's forecasts for growth, which he said were cautious and prudent, had to be downgraded. He boasted at the weekend that growth in 2002 was 1.7 per cent., but he had forecast 1.6 per cent. He somehow forgot to mention that in his Budget he had forecast growth of between 2 and 2.5 per cent. The 1.6 per cent. was his downgraded forecast made on 27 November. If the Chancellor is reduced to boasting that he got right a forecast that he made on 27 November for the calendar year 2002, that shows just how far his reputation has fallen.

The Institute for Fiscal Studies says that even if the Chancellor's growth forecasts are correct, he will still have to borrow more than he currently plans. By 2005–06, it expects a £4 billion deficit on the current Budget, compared with the Chancellor's forecast of a £5 billion surplus. Yet, over five years, his own figures on borrowing have already leaped from £30 billion in the 2001 Budget to £66 billion later that year, to £72 billion in last year's Budget, and to more than £100 billion in the latest pre-Budget report.

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, Cathcart) rose—

Mr. Howard: I am afraid that Labour Members will have to listen to this for a while longer.

The IFS does not think that the Chancellor is on course to meet his so-called golden rule in the next economic cycle. It says that he will have to raise taxes from April 2005 by another £11 billion if he wants to meet his rule with his—allegedly—planned level of caution. That was the golden rule that was meant to be rock solid—the lynchpin of his entire approach. What would he say to the Labour-dominated Select Committee, which now does not even trust him to determine the economic cycle on which his rules depend? It says:

"There is a danger that decisions by the Treasury and the determination of the economic cycle could be seen to be taken simply in order to comply with the golden rule."

It wants an external body, such as the National Audit Office, to "validate the decisions." Does not that speak volumes about the Chancellor's downgraded reputation and fiscal rules?

Gareth Thomas (Clwyd, West): The right hon. and learned Gentleman is a fair man. Will he give credit where it is due? Is not it true that, in a difficult global climate, the British economy continues to grow faster than that of any other G7 country?

Mr. Howard: No, it is not. The Chancellor has had stewardship of the economy for nearly six years. In that time, it has grown more slowly than that of the United States. It has also grown more slowly than in the last five years of the Conservative Government. The hon. Gentleman should bear that in mind before asking such a question.

Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Howard: No, I want to deal with the Chancellor's rules. I have spoken about his golden rule and I want to move on to his sustainable investment rule.

The Treasury Committee also called for all the Government's contingent liabilities to be recorded in the Red Book. If the Chancellor had not put more than £100 billion of his potential liabilities off balance sheet, Enron-style, public sector debt would already have reached his rule's 40 per cent. limit.

The further tax rises that the Institute for Fiscal Studies predicted would be on top of those that are already on course for April. The Chancellor's response to the anxieties of business and investors about the burdens that he has imposed on them is to add to them. There have been 53 tax rises since 1997. In 53 days, on 6 April, national insurance rates will increase for employees and employers. That is a tax on pay and on jobs.

The Chancellor imposes a tax on pay at a time when people are feeling nervous about the future, exposed and under pressure. For example, the nurse consultant on £34,000 a year will be £26 a month worse off. The police inspector on £37,000 a year will be £30 a month worse off. The Chancellor imposes a tax on jobs at a time of growing economic uncertainty. Does he recall that after the 2000 Budget he issued a press release that said that lower national insurance contributions would "promote employment opportunities"? What does he believe that higher contributions will do?

The increase in national insurance contributions is a damaging tax that is imposed in the wrong way for the wrong reasons at the wrong time. For many people, it will be the ultimate injustice. People already have to pay out of their own pockets, on top of taxes, because of failing public services. Two hundred and fifty thousand people a year, who are not covered by an insurance scheme, pay for their operations because the Government are not providing the improvements that they promised in the national health service.

Every year, the Government promise better public services in return for higher taxes, but we get only the higher taxes. In the Chancellor's parallel world, public services are improving wonderfully. He told the Social Market Foundation that the Government had set out a "modern model" for the NHS. However, in the real world, a 22 per cent. increase in health spending in two years led to an increase of less than 2 per cent. in the number of people receiving hospital treatment. What sort of modern model is that?

What sort of modern model has more than 1 million people on waiting lists, and accident and emergency departments where patients have to wait hours, first to be seen and then to be admitted? We were told yesterday that patients are kept in ambulances for hours to fiddle the Government's figures. Does a modern model for schools lead to one in every four children leaving primary school unable to read, write or count properly, and mean that an increasing number of children in inner cities leave school without a single GCSE? In a modern model, do violent assaults on teachers quadruple, teacher vacancies double and fewer than 50 per cent. of teacher trainees still teach three years later?

Does a modern model for transport mean increasing congestion and the longest commuter travelling times in Europe? Rail delays have doubled under Labour, with one in five trains running late.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Howard: In the Chancellor's parallel universe, none of that matters—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The shadow Chancellor has indicated that he is not giving way.

Mr. Howard: The Chancellor says that there is nothing to worry about because his public service agreements will sort everything out. In his parallel universe, they are a great success. He believes that they are a shining beacon of reform for the rest of the world to admire. At the Social Market Foundation, he spoke about clear objectives, well-defined targets, consistency, accountability, equity and flexibility.

In the world that the rest of the country inhabits, the Chancellor's ludicrous targets are objects of scorn. People now know about the Chancellor's vague and ill-defined targets, and his targets to set targets. They know about stifling local initiative, diverting time and energy from front-line services and redefining trolleys as "beds on wheels" so that the Chancellor's targets can be achieved.

Have not the Chancellor and his colleagues used targets as a substitute for genuine, decentralising reform? More than a year has passed since the Chancellor said:

"I'm going to insist that any additional resources must be matched by reforms so that we get the best value for money. There is not to be one penny more until we get the changes."

Throughout their time in office, the Government refused to introduce genuine reform. Its absence explains their cycle of ever-higher taxes and declining public services. Their only answer is higher taxation. When that fails, they impose even higher taxes.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Howard: No, I want the hon. Gentleman to pay special attention to my point.

From April, Government spending will race ahead for the first time at more than 50 mph—million pounds per hour. The Chancellor boasts about April's tax on pay and his tax on jobs. He treats ever-higher taxes as a badge of honour. However, they are a sign of his failure and that of his Administration.

Reforming public services is the only way to break the vicious circle. It is the key to everything that we want to achieve. The need for it is urgent and pressing. Only through genuine reform will we obtain the first-class public services for which our people cry out. It is vital to achieve that goal for parents, patients and passengers. It is vital for business and for millions of hard-pressed taxpayers.

The Chancellor promised no more boom and bust. He has managed to provide both at the same time. He promised prudence with a purpose, but he has been neither prudent in handling the nation's finances nor purposeful in reforming public services. He has presided over missed growth forecasts, halved productivity growth, a pensions crisis and increasing Government debt.

The Chancellor excelled in soundbites, but they are now turning to ashes in his mouth. Colleagues, past and present, are queueing up to criticise him. Only yesterday, the Secretary of State for Health and the Secretary of State for Education and Skills held a press conference at which they rubbished the basis of his Social Market Foundation speech. Mo Mowlam calls for him to be moved. Andrew Rawnsley asks in The Observer whether his next Budget might be his last. Peter Preston writes in The Guardian—[Interruption.] Labour Members may find that they dismiss The Guardian at their peril.

Peter Preston said:

"the chances of Gordon Brown ever becoming Prime Minister have diminished, are diminishing—and will continue to diminish inexorably. A sad, sad song".

The saddest song of all, however, is that of the British people. They do not live in the Chancellor's parallel universe; they know all too well the reality of the Government's broken promises. Daily they must pay the price of his failure, and more and more and louder and louder they find themselves saying of the Chancellor and of this Government "Enough is enough."

1.10 pm

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"notes that as a result of this Government's economic management, even in times of global economic uncertainty when the world economy is experiencing the first simultaneous downturn for nearly thirty years and twenty of the world's biggest economies including the United States, Japan, Asia, much of Latin America and Europe have been or are in recession, the UK economy continues to grow with low levels of inflation and low interest rates; welcomes the 1.5 million extra jobs created since 1997 and resists any attempts to abolish the New Deal and the tax credits that make work pay; further welcomes the cuts in the rates of corporation tax, capital gains tax and small business corporation tax since 1997 and the introduction of the R&D tax credit; and believes that after years of neglect between 1979 and 1997 it is even more important to invest in public services and to support the Government's record extra investment in Britain's health, education and other public services combined with reform to build high quality public services for all and its resistance to any attempt at this time of global uncertainty to cut public spending."

The right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard)—the shadow Chancellor—omitted to tell the House today the central economic facts. We have the lowest inflation that we have had for 40 years this year, as we did last year and the year before that. We have the lowest interest rates that we have had for 48 years, and we have lower unemployment than America, Japan and the rest of Europe for the first time since 1945. Today's employment figures, which the shadow Chancellor glossed over—

Mr. Howard: I did not.

Mr. Brown: He mentioned them, but glossed over them. They show that the number of people claiming unemployment benefit have fallen by 3,500 in a month, that unemployment fell by 36,000 over three months, and that despite all the economic uncertainties and the restructuring, which I acknowledge is taking place in the British economy, employment is up by 150,000.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove): Does the Chancellor think it is a good thing that one person in four now works for the Government?

Mr. Brown: It is right that we have more doctors in the health service. It is right that we have more nurses, more teachers, and more policemen and policewomen.

Running through the shadow Chancellor's speech was one assumption and one assumption only: that the answer to every problem was public expenditure cuts. There are more people in work today than there have been at any time in our history. There are 1.5 million more people in employment now than there were in 1997. There is more employment in every region of the country. Let us remember that in the 1980s 350,000 young people had been unemployed for more than a year—hundreds in each of our constituencies. Today the figure in Britain is 5,000, an average of eight per constituency. Moreover, far from there being an inflation problem, the figures show that earnings growth has fallen to 3.7 per cent.

In the face of the global slowdown that every country has had to confront—we have seen recession in America, recession in Japan and recession in Germany—our monetary and fiscal policy, and the changes that we made in 1997, have not just enabled us to cope with that global slowdown without recession but have enabled growth to rise in every quarter of nearly six years of this Labour Government. The worst policy that could be pursued is that of the shadow Chancellor—to cut spending, abolish the new deal, get rid of tax credits that make work pay, and end up repeating the mistakes that the Conservatives made in the early 1990s.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): Is the Chancellor proud of the fact that 600,000 people have lost their jobs in manufacturing? Is he proud of the two manufacturing recessions over which he has already presided? Is he proud of what is happening in manufacturing today? What does he say to those people?

Mr. Brown: What I am proud of is this: we have cut corporation tax, introduced a research and development tax credit for manufacturing, and introduced capital allowances. When the right hon. Gentleman was a Minister in the Conservative Government, 3 million manufacturing jobs were lost.

When it comes to solutions to the problem, we must recognise that the shadow Chancellor and the right hon. Gentleman are not saying exactly the same things. What did the right hon. Gentleman say in his election address in 2001?

"We need a Government that recognises that teachers, nurses, doctors and policemen in the Thames Valley need pay that meets the cost of living."

The shadow Chancellor is not prepared to say that.

Worse than the danger of abolition of the new deal and tax credits is a proposal advanced by the Leader of the Opposition in an interview on 30 December 2002, when he announced that a study was being conducted by the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight), the shadow Chief Secretary to the Treasury. The study, he said, was "looking at the target of 20 per cent. savings across the board in Government spending".

[Interruption.] I will quote the whole interview. The interviewer said to the Leader of the Opposition:

"I'm after a precise figure."

The answer was:

"And we're looking at savings. Well I'm telling you. That's exactly what Howard Flight said."

The interviewer said:

"And you would concur with up to 20 per cent.?"

The answer was:

"He said quite categorically yes. Well that's what we're looking at. What we're trying to say is that here is a Government that is wasting money dramatically".

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs): If the Chancellor had done us the courtesy of reading the report to which the Leader of the Opposition referred, he would know that it referred to areas of potential for savings. That was absolutely clear. Moreover, the report stated twice that it did not refer to cuts in health or education spending. I ask the Chancellor to end the spin propaganda in which he has been indulging.

Mr. Brown: Now we are getting to the heart of the matter. "Potential" cuts of 20 per cent!

[Mr. Brown]

The hon. Gentleman says that that did not apply to the health service. In that "World at One" interview on 30 December, however, the Leader of the Opposition said that he was looking at cuts

"in extra staff that don't deliver in the NHS and also costs and wasted consultants; he's looking at all of that area".

Mr. Flight: I am surprised that the Chancellor of the Exchequer displays such economic naivety. The scope that exists, to an extent, to make economies in some areas accommodates extra spending in others. The virtuous action of looking for areas of waste, which the Chancellor should be doing, would enable him to deliver much better services by redeploying funds.

Mr. Brown: This is very helpful. The shadow Chancellor will be very pleased that the shadow Chief Secretary has joined us. He has confirmed the "potential" for savings. He has confirmed that the study has taken place. He has not denied the Leader of the Opposition's statement that he was looking for "extra staff that don't deliver in the NHS".

Is the hon. Gentleman saying that the Leader of the Opposition was misleading people in that interview?

Mr. Flight: The Leader of the Opposition was clearly referring to my comments and to the potential, not to an across-the-board figure. I repeat: I am astonished that the Chancellor has to resort to such cheap, false propaganda to establish his credentials.

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman has not denied my point that he is looking at cuts in the national health service. That is what the Leader of the Opposition said. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. We must have some order in the Chamber.

Mr. Brown: I suggest that we take up the offer made by the shadow Chief Secretary to give us a copy of his report when it is completed. He has identified the potential for savings, and he has not denied that the national health service is part of the investigation. Either that, or the Leader of the Opposition is misleading people.

When asked:

"And you would concur with up to 20 per cent.?",

the Leader of the Opposition replied:

"He said quite categorically yes. Well that's what we're looking at."

Mr. Howard: May I remind the Chancellor of a sentence that appeared in his party's 1997 general election manifesto? Funnily enough, it is directly relevant. The manifesto contained the following sentence:

"The level of public spending is no longer the best measure of the effectiveness of government action in the public interest."

Does the Chancellor still adhere to that?

Mr. Brown: Yes, and because we are increasing value for money and the amount of public money spent, there are more doctors, more nurses, more teachers and more police. The shadow Chancellor cannot get away from the fact that he is embarrassed by what the shadow Chief Secretary has been up to. The interesting thing—I ask the shadow Chancellor to confirm this—is that, in 1997, he made a speech to the British Chambers of Commerce in which he recommended that public spending be reduced to 35 per cent. of national income, and said that that was the right target to aim at. What is 35 per cent. of national income but a 20 per cent. cut in public spending? Until the Conservatives come clean on what their real proposals are and how they would affect the national health service, in every constituency in this country they will be offering explanations as to the number of doctors, nurses and teachers, and they will have to offer such explanations every weekend.

The shadow Chancellor may have something of a problem in that regard. I have in front of me an article that he wrote in the Folkestone Herald. Of course, he is adamant that he does not want to make any spending commitments. However, he said in that article:

"I was told . . . about the difficulties . . . as a result of the shortage of GPs . . . Overall Shepway has 44 full-time GPs. It should have 53 . . . The present state of affairs is unacceptable."

Is that not a demand for nine more GPs? Does that not cost at least £500,000? If that were repeated throughout the country, would we not need to spend more on the national health service? How can the shadow Chancellor say that he refuses to spend more on the national health service? Just to show that he is consistent in what he is advocating locally but not telling us nationally, I refer the House to an article that he wrote only a few days ago, in the Folkestone Herald of 9 January, entitled "Housing must be our priority". What does he say now about public spending? He states:

"I believe we need more social housing . . . This is something that needs to be addressed as a matter of urgency."

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) rose—

Mr. Brown: How can the shadow Chancellor square his demand for extra public spending in Folkestone with the shadow Chief Secretary's demand that it be cut by 20 per cent.?

Mr. Cameron rose—

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) rose—

Mr. Brown: I shall give way to the former shadow Chief Secretary, and then I hope to make some progress.

Mr. Bercow: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for giving way. Given that activity rates in the national health service are now rising at only one fourteenth of the level of the increase in NHS expenditure, given that last year alone 6,000 nurses left the United Kingdom to go overseas, and given that the right hon. Gentleman failed to meet and then scrapped his own target, set in 1998, for a reduction in truancy, is it any wonder that the British people and his own Cabinet colleagues are selling shares in this Chancellor?

Mr. Brown: This debate must be the first time Conservative Members have regretted the hon.

Gentleman's resignation from the post of shadow Chief Secretary, because they have now been landed with the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs. As far as the health service is concerned—

Mr. Cameron rose—

Mr. Brown: If I remember rightly, the shadow Chancellor gave way only four times. I have already given way to shadow Front Benchers at least six times, and I now have the alternative Front Bench lining up to make their case for office under the Leader of the Opposition—or should I say the current Leader of the Opposition?

There were 4.5 million elective admissions in hospitals when we came to power; there are 5.3 million now. There were 11.3 million outpatient attendances when we came to power; there are 12.7 million now. There were 1.8 million emergency admissions; there are 2.25 million now. Do not let people say that the health service is not having, and dealing with, more admissions, more outpatients and more emergency admissions. It is about time Conservative Members started to praise the national health service, instead of calling it a Stalinist creation.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Brown: I have to make progress, and I want to make two announcements that I believe will be of interest to the House. In the pre-Budget report, I set aside £1 billion to be drawn on by the Ministry of Defence for security and military matters, if and when it becomes necessary. Nothing should prevent us from equipping and supporting our armed forces, who perform a great service for Britain, as do our security services. Money is being drawn down by the MOD to meet the costs that it is entailing. I shall report to the House again in full in the Budget, but I can tell it today that in this financial year I have increased this sum from £1 billion to £1.75 billion, to be set aside for possible commitments, and to be drawn on only if and when necessary. This is, of course, a time of great risk economically and geopolitically, and I believe that most Members of the House will support what I am doing.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): Will the Chancellor give way?

Mr. Brown: If it is on that point.

Mr. McLoughlin: I am grateful to the Chancellor, who has just been very helpful to the House. Listening to last night's news, we were told that a number of new police officers had also been deployed to Heathrow airport as a result of yesterday's increased security measures. Does he intend to increase the budget to the Metropolitan police to cover that?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. What he says is true, but he would not expect me to comment on operational matters relating to the police. However, the amounts of money made available in the spending round for policing in general and for the Metropolitan police in particular have increased substantially. I believe that, overall, there will be 5,000 more policemen as a result. So far as security is concerned, in these difficult days we will do whatever is necessary to protect and to make secure the British public.

Just as we are making provision for any necessary preparations for action, we are also providing to meet our responsibilities in terms of peace and tackling world poverty. I want the House to be the first to know of the new document on the technical details of the international finance facility, which I hope we can publish tomorrow with the support of all parties. It will show how aid can rise to $100 billion a year for the poorest countries, and I am grateful to Conservative Members in this House and in the House of Lords, and to members of all parties—Liberals and nationalists—for their support for this initiative.

I have a second announcement for the House. In addition to the work on the euro that is already under way, we will publish an additional four studies, which report on issues that the House will agree are important. The first study concerns the exchange rate and macro-economic adjustment; the second concerns the transition to the euro; the third explains the overall framework for the assessment of the five tests; and the fourth brings together specially commissioned papers by international academics on aspects of British membership of the euro. I look forward to giving evidence to the Treasury Select Committee on 27 February. Next Monday, before I meet the Committee, we will publish our progress report on European economic reform.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil): Will the Chancellor give way?

Mr. Brown: Yes, if it is on that specific point.

Mr. Laws: I am grateful to the Chancellor for giving way. If the assessment of the five economic tests, which must take place before June of this year, shows that Britain has not met them, will that rule out a referendum on the euro for the rest of this Parliament?

Mr. Brown: We have been over this ground before and I am not going to pre-judge the assessment. It will set out the facts clearly, and the hon. Gentleman can make his own judgment afterwards.

I shall give full details of the updated figures on economic growth when we come to the Budget, but I can tell the House that last year, by contrast with growth in Germany of 0.2 per cent., in Italy of 0.4 per cent., in France of 1 per cent., and in Japan of minus 0.3 per cent., the economies of north America and Britain were the fastest growing of the G7 countries, as was stated earlier. So despite the events that have brought the first synchronised world slowdown, the Opposition are quite wrong to claim that we are not well placed to cope with it. Only a few days ago, the shadow Chief Secretary said in an intervention that we were facing likely recession and events analogous to the late 20s and early 30s, but I should tell him—[Interruption.] I ask him this: is he really saying that we face events analogous to the 20s and 30s? [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chancellor must continue.

Mr. Brown: I wonder whether the shadow Chancellor might allow the shadow Chief Secretary to have a higher role in the next debate. It is always illuminating to listen to his words. When Conservative central office had to explain his earlier intervention, it defended him not as a politician, but as a City expert giving his views.

In 2001, the UK was the fastest growing member of the G7. In 2002, with the north American countries, we were also the fastest growing. The Bank of England inflation report issued today states that, even before the effect of the recent interest rate cut, it expects growth to be 2.5 per cent. this year. Two underlying fundamentals matter if economic growth is to be sustained—that is why the shadow Chancellor's analysis is wrong—inflation and stability. Past Governments have been unable to act during a world downturn because inflation was too high and interest rates could not be reduced. Inflation was 6 per cent. on average, although it rose to 10 per cent. when the shadow Chancellor was Secretary of State for Employment. Under the Labour Government, even in the 1990s, inflation has averaged 2.3 per cent. Every year, we meet our inflation target. We shall continue to do so and we shall continue to exercise discipline in the settlement of wage claims.

As a result, we have achieved lower mortgage rates than those under the previous Government. They averaged 11 per cent. under the Conservatives, but only 6.5 per cent. under Labour. After all the shadow Chancellor's allegations, it is interesting to note that, over the last five years, 693,000 more people in England alone have become owner-occupiers.

Living standards have risen substantially. Despite the fall in equity markets across the world, total net household wealth is still up. Despite oil and other problems, we have achieved not only low inflation and low interest rates, but low unemployment. The figures that I read out today are not the only important ones in that regard; there are 600,000 vacancies and they are in every region—unlike the situation in the late 80s. Because of the new deal, which the shadow Chancellor would scrap and abolish, we have achieved the lowest long-term youth unemployment since records began. I urge the Conservatives, in their review of Government spending, not to abolish a new deal that has given hope to hundreds of thousands of young people throughout the country.

It is because we understand the slowdown in world trade and its impact on the stock exchange that, far from being complacent, we have seen interest rates come down, and small business corporation tax has been cut to 19 per cent; this spring, we are abolishing stamp duty for property purchases in disadvantaged areas; and tomorrow, because I believe that a consensus can be reached on measures that will help Britain to make the most of opportunities when the upturn in world trade takes place, we shall meet the CBI to follow up my meeting with Digby Jones and the joint note that we prepared.

Building on the cuts in corporation tax that we have already achieved, on the cuts in capital gains tax, from 40p to 10p for two years, and on the permanent capital allowances that we introduced, we shall examine investment incentives, especially in the venture capital sector. Building on the small business tax, which is down to 19 per cent., we shall examine how much more we can do to encourage enterprise in every area of the country. Building on the successful research and development tax credit, we shall examine measures for innovation. Building on the employer pilots for greater training and skills for the modern work force of tomorrow, we shall publish a skills strategy later this year. Building on the flat-rate VAT system that we are introducing in April, we shall attempt to do more to encourage flexibility in the economy, including labour market flexibility where there is indeed a case for more conditionality and compulsion in the new deal for the unemployed. I believe that we shall have support throughout the country for the measures that we are taking.

How different from the days of the early 1990s under the Conservatives! Then, when the shadow Chancellor was one of the architects of Conservative economic policy, unemployment went up by 1.4 million. Inflation was 10 per cent. Interest rates went up to 15 per cent. The record is undeniable. When there were difficult world conditions in the early 1990s, Britain did badly under the Conservatives, yet in the present difficult world conditions, Britain is doing well under Labour.

When I hear the shadow Chancellor's pronouncements—with no hint of embarrassment at his past record—on pensions, tax, jobs and public services, are we not entitled to remind people that, on pensions, the right hon. and learned Gentleman was the City Minister at the time of pensions mis-selling; that, on tax, he was the poll tax Minister and described the poll tax as "clear, simple and fair"; and that, on jobs, he was the Employment Secretary when we lost so many jobs in two years? On public services, of course, he was Home Secretary when crime doubled. As Home Secretary, the right hon. and learned Gentleman famously coined the phrase "prison works"—I suppose it did, for a number of his former colleagues.

We have taken the necessary action not only on monetary policy but on fiscal policy. In that area, too, the shadow Chancellor has misunderstood what it is right to do for a modern economy. In 1997 and 1998, in a period of growth, we actually froze spending. When others, including some of his colleagues, urged us to spend the proceeds—£22 billion—of the spectrum auction, we paid off debt. We deliberately ran up large surpluses in periods of higher growth and, in one year, we cut more debt—£37 billion—than in all the years from 1945 to 2000.

Let us make some comparisons. Debt is 31 per cent. of gross domestic product, but it is 45 per cent. in the United States of America; it is 47 per cent. in Germany, 55 per cent. in the euro area and 70 per cent. in Japan. As a result of cutting debt we have lower debt interest payments as a share of national income than at any time since 1915 and we can afford to take the action necessary in a period of low growth for the world economy. It is because our fiscal rules are set for the long term and because we paid off debt during times of high growth that our fiscal policies can adjust to the economic cycle.

The shadow Chancellor says that the position—

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) rose—

Mr. Brown: I cannot resist the hon. Gentleman.

Sir Peter Tapsell: I am grateful to the Chancellor.

The right hon. Gentleman is talking about his fiscal policy, but the great fault of his policies throughout his chancellorship has been the mismatch between his fiscal and monetary policies. We see that clearly at present when his Monetary Policy Committee is reducing interest rates just as he is about to put up national insurance. It is illogical for fiscal and monetary policy to operate in different directions.

Mr. Brown: I have a great deal of time for the hon. Gentleman, mainly because he attacks his party more than he attacks ours. However, may I remind him of what he said in the House of Commons, just after our announcement of rises in public expenditure? He said that "the Bank of England will raise interest rates still higher, and that . . . will force up the exchange rate of sterling against the euro."—[Official Report, 18 May 2000; Vol. 350, c. 443.]

Neither has happened.

For fairness, we should consider the fiscal policy alternatives being offered by the other parties. The—

Matthew Taylor (Truro and St. Austell): Will the Chancellor give way?

Mr. Brown: I am happy to give way to the other shadow Chancellor.

Matthew Taylor: At a time when the Chancellor is asking everybody to pay more in order to invest in health and education, which is right, is he happy that the Inland Revenue disposed of its property to a company based in a tax haven in Bermuda in order to reduce costs to the Treasury?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to the shadow Chancellor for raising that point. His hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws), who is a member of the Treasury Committee, has been giving radio interview interviews on the matter. The report of the Select Committee will be studied in great detail by the Treasury. We have made a number of changes as a result of what we already know. We shall respond to the Select Committee and take whatever action is necessary. As a result of that, we do not believe that such a situation will be able to occur again.

The hon. Gentleman's intervention allows us to focus on the policies of the Liberal party. Conservative Members, too, will be interested in that. As we know, for the past 10 or 20 years, the Liberals told us that we needed more public spending to deal with every problem that we faced. However, I have a letter written by the shadow Chancellor—the one who lives in Truro—to Liberal Democrat MPs. The letter is about "Alternative Budget 2003"; it is dated 8 January and begins: "Dear Friends". The hon. Gentleman sets out views that we should share with every elector in every part of the country. He wrote:

"Unlike recent years, the budget proposals cannot simply be based on our past programme of tax increases . . . We have already agreed at shadow Cabinet to start from the premise that the Government are now putting in vast real terms expenditure increases . . . simply proposing further spending . . . rises at this stage of the Parliament is unrealistic."

I am grateful for that private, if belated, acknowledgement of what we are doing to make public services—

Mr. Laws rose—

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman may want to be shadow Chancellor, but I shall give way only to the shadow Liberal Chancellor on this occasion. The Liberal Democrats should forget every promise that they have made to groups of pensioners and others over the past few years. They should drop their offer to spend billions on education, because it is unrealistic. What happened in the first few days of this month? Press releases issued by members of the Liberal Democrat shadow Cabinet and others said that more money was wanted for teachers' pay, and referred to a "derisory" increase; and that there should be more bonuses for members of the armed forces; more beds for care homes after "chronic" Government under-investment; more housing for key workers; and more for the Post Office, because £2 billion was just sticking plaster. Those were the press releases of just a few days from the Liberal Democrats—the party that is supposed to believe in freedom of information.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Is it not the normal courtesy for speakers, whether on the Front Benches or Back Benches, to address the Chair? Is it not totally discourteous to yourself, Madam Deputy Speaker, when the Chancellor persistently turns his back on you?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): That is the normal courtesy but not one that is always followed by right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the House.

Mr. Brown: Liberal Democrat Members should tell their constituents that which they have said among themselves in private—that they cannot make additional public spending commitments and that it is dishonest to do so. They should return to their constituencies and prepare to tell the truth.

Matthew Taylor: The Chancellor has revealed nothing by saying that Liberal Democrats welcome the Government's belated spending increases. We will lay out our alternative. We do not believe that the Government are spending their money well. Just today we discovered that thousands of old people are blocking hospital beds much needed for treatment because the Government are overseeing cuts in private nursing sector provision. It is possible to spend the money better than the Government are doing—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. That was a lengthy intervention.

Mr. Brown: We face the next local elections and the Scottish and Welsh parliamentary and assembly elections with the nationalists proposing to cut spending, the Conservatives proposing to cut spending massively and the Liberals unable to say, as they always have done, that they would spend more. That is a welcome tune and welcome honesty from the Liberal Democrat party, and it should be explained to voters in every constituency.

[Mr. Brown]

Conservative Members said that they would not make any public spending commitments while in Opposition but would wait until they had evaluated the circumstances, yet at the Conservative party conference, among the 20 commitments to public spending was one, not to the national health service, but to private health care in this country. The first priority of the Conservatives as set forth by their shadow health spokesman is full tax relief for people taking out private health insurance—a policy that Nigel Lawson, when at the Treasury, rejected as a wasteful use of public money.

If Conservative health priorities, whether in Folkestone or elsewhere, are to prefer private health care funded by tax relief, with all the deadweight costs to the NHS, I do not think that the shadow Chief Secretary's review can yield anything but disaster for the British people. The Government are running the economy in the interests of all, not a few. The Government are running public services for the people. The Government believe in the health service. I commend the amendment to the House.

Matthew Taylor (Truro and St. Austell): The Conservative party called the debate, so it is right to begin by commenting on its extraordinary proposition. Anybody reading the Conservative motion could conclude only that part of the Conservatives' proposals is a tax cut and a cut in public spending to go with it. The motion condemns current policy and the money that is to be put into the health service and education.

The Conservatives say that the problems of the British economy are predicated on tax levels under the present Government. However, the shadow Chancellor cannot or will not give any indication of Conservative tax and spending cuts. We heard not a single proposal for a tax cut from the shadow Chancellor, who says that the problems of the British economy are built on tax. Neither did we hear a single proposition for a cut in health or education spending.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): The hon. Gentleman's colleague and spokesman on health recently told the House that the Liberal Democrats would increase health expenditure through a new tax. Will that tax be set at such a level that health expenditure would be lower, the same or higher than it is currently?

Matthew Taylor: We welcomed the Government's increased taxes and argued that national insurance should pay for investment in the health service. We do not trust the present Government or future Governments to ensure that the extra tax will continue to go into the NHS, so we said that we would dedicate national insurance to the health service, ensuring that in future it will share in this country's increasing wealth, which it failed to do for many years in the past.

Dr. Fox: Will the hon. Gentleman answer my question?

Matthew Taylor: I have just said that we welcome the Government's expenditure and will make sure that it is dedicated to the NHS. I have not finished answering. I have a question for the hon. Gentleman: last year, he told the BBC that he conceded that taxes might have to rise for the NHS. He was immediately slapped down by his party leader, who insisted on taking him through a vote against increases in NHS funding. We know that the hon. Gentleman's position now is to spend billions less on the health service. Alternatively, he intends to raise the money by introducing charges for NHS operations. That is the position that he articulated before the last general election, and he has not said that he was wrong.

Dr. Fox: I asked the hon. Gentleman a simple question. The Liberals say that they will raise a health tax in a different way. Would that produce less, the same or more money than the Government are currently spending on health?

Matthew Taylor: The hon. Gentleman was not listening. I have said several times that we welcome the extra money going into the NHS. We do not believe that spending will rise from £45 billion under the Conservatives to more than £100 billion by 2008. Neither do we believe that it would be appropriate to argue at the moment for extra money. The issue is whether the money is well spent.

The hon. Gentleman opposed spending increases. Presumably he wishes that the Government had stuck to the funding plans in place when the Conservatives left office—not £1 billion or £2 billion less for the NHS but tens of billions. There would have been less for doctors, less for nurses and less in his constituency. We know that, instead, he wants more and more people to be forced to pay for private operations or to contribute to the cost of their operations. How do we know? Before the last general election, he was honest enough to say so. The Conservatives do not offer a single policy now. They have gone quiet. Theirs is a hushed-up policy. They make lots of criticisms but have nothing to say.

The fantasy offered by Conservative Front Benchers is irrelevant—no wonder their own focus groups laugh at any mention of the Conservative party. The Conservatives have no coherence and do not have the courage to spell out their alternatives because they are so unpopular.

The problem facing the Chancellor is whether he has a policy capable of delivering the changes for which he argues. The Monetary Policy Committee's decision to cut interest rates by one quarter of 1 per cent. has thrown the state of the British economy into sharp relief.

Mr. Bercow: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I seek your guidance. Is there any known precedent for a Front Bench spokesman addressing the House, which the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor) is now doing, without a single Back Bencher of his party being present to support him?

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order for the Chair.

Matthew Taylor: The Conservative party has a tiny proportion of its Back Benchers present. [Interruption.]

It suddenly has five, but a moment ago it had three. No doubt the Tory Whips will bring in a few more, but despite the fact that this is their debate Conservative Members have not even bothered to turn up. The hon. Gentleman, who resigned from the Conservative Front Bench in despair over their policies, presumably agrees with much of what I am saying and should perhaps refrain from intervening. [Interruption.] The Whips are doing a good job, because Conservative Members are pouring in—there are now five of them.

Mr. Redwood: Does the hon. Gentleman think that it is right that there are now many more administrators in the health service than there are beds, or does he think that we might be able to save some money on the way in which the NHS is administered?

Matthew Taylor: The right hon. Gentleman may not have noticed, but although the Government took too few decisions about investment one of their early decisions was to get rid of the extraordinary bureaucratic architecture of the Conservatives' internal market in the NHS, so as to cut the number of bureaucrats and put more staff on the front line. Liberal Democrats welcomed that. Perhaps he should spend a little more time studying the failures of the last Conservative Government if he wishes to make such points.

The Chancellor's optimism looks increasingly delusional. He is in denial about the state of the economy. Today, the MPC cut its growth forecast, partly because of uncertainty over Iraq but partly because of collapsing UK investment. The concern is that a Chancellor who will not admit the problems of the UK economy will never introduce policies to correct them. If we are to believe the Chancellor, Britain is racing ahead of the rest of the G7 and is a beacon of success in a world economy clouded with difficulties. However, it is not only the world that is at fault. Our economy has been dangerously split between a manufacturing sector in deep recession and a buoyant, if now slowing, service sector, fuelled by rising debt that even the Governor of the Bank of England has described as unsustainable. The overvaluation of the pound has hit every company that competes with imports or exports. The 2001–02 manufacturing recession was the longest since 1945 and the deepest since 1981. In 2002, we had the largest trade deficit ever.

The Chancellor's response is to say that we should expect that at a time of worldwide economic difficulty and uncertainty, but the manufacturing recession is not simply a symptom of a world downturn, as a few international comparisons make clear. UK productivity growth, which the Chancellor originally set as the benchmark for his chancellorship, has been dismal since 1997 at little more than half the average rate since the 1960s and well behind that of our competitors. We have had lower productivity growth in this cycle than in previous cycles. Output per job has increased at an average annual rate of 1.4 per cent. since the mid-1990s and output per person has increased by just 1.2 per cent., compared with average productivity growth of just over 2 per cent. since the 1960s.

The UK failed on seven of the 11 targets that the Government set for productivity growth. Of the four successful measures, two were our performance as measured against Japan and two as measured against Germany—hardly difficult benchmarks to reach on recent trends.

Andy Burnham (Leigh): In his determination to paint a picture of doom and gloom, the hon. Gentleman is being a touch selective with the facts. He mentioned today's announcement by the MPC, but would he care to comment on another announcement made today—the unemployment figures?

Matthew Taylor: Unemployment figures have fallen today, but that is due only to marginal growth in the retail and hotel sectors and substantial growth in Government employment. Manufacturing employment has fallen by 500,000 since 1997. Over the past year, falls in employment in agriculture, manufacturing, other production and financial and business services have been joined in the past three months by falls in employment in other service sectors. The only major economy to suffer worse falls in manufacturing employment than the UK over the past year has been Japan. Moreover, the UK suffered a larger fall in manufacturing output in the past year than France, Germany, Italy, Japan and the USA. It is the hon. Gentleman who is being selective with the figures.

Andy Burnham: Is the hon. Gentleman really saying to the 250,000 extra people in work, compared with the beginning of last year, that their jobs are not worth having?

Matthew Taylor: What about the people who are losing their jobs in manufacturing companies? What about the decline in investment, which tells us what will happen to employment in the future? Astonishingly, in the past 18 months, British investment has collapsed faster than it has in the supposedly stagnant economies of France, Italy, the USA and Japan. According to the most recent figures, investment is falling faster than it is in Germany. In fact, the fall in UK investment is the worst since records began.

Kali Mountford: The hon. Gentleman is being selective in the figures he is using to expound his case. Why is he failing to expose the massive job losses that have been experienced across the world, which are much greater than any that we have experienced in the UK? The issue of manufacturing does need to be addressed, but it is only fair to say that job numbers in this country have risen and continue to rise year after year, compared with the eurozone, the OECD and Japan. The hon. Gentleman pretends that Japan is the only comparison, but he is skewing the figures.

Matthew Taylor: I have given the figures on investment, manufacturing employment and other employment sectors, and I have acknowledged areas in which there has been some growth, but let us consider what underlies that growth. While the internationally exposed sectors of the UK economy are suffering, it is true that the service sector has increased as the housing and consumer debt boom continues. That allows the Chancellor to point to employment figures and GDP growth figures that are better than those of our competitors. However, as the Governor of the Bank of

[Matthew Taylor]

England and everybody else who has considered the matter have concluded, that growth is unsustainable. The economy cannot indefinitely sustain growth based on the fact that debt is rising faster than wealth or incomes. That is plain to everybody. We cannot continue to increase our borrowing faster than the economy grows, as we have done in recent years.

Without rising debt, the British economy would look less like the best among the G7 and more like the sick man. Investment is falling faster, manufacturing is falling faster and our share of overseas investment is falling faster than in other economies. On what measure, therefore, does the Chancellor claim that the underlying economy—not boosted by rising debt and increasing consumption by the British consumer—is doing well? It is not productivity or long-term investment.

Adam Price (East Carmarthen and Dinefwr): The figures for job creation mask a shift from high-wage jobs in manufacturing to part-time, lower-wage employment. That has hit especially hard the heartland manufacturing areas such as the one that I represent and those that many Labour Members represent.

Matthew Taylor: The hon. Gentleman may be right, but the biggest concern is that everybody will be affected. If the fast rise in debt, fuelled by house prices, stops—it is bound to stop, because it is unsustainable in the long term—the economy will not be underpinned by investment in business that could earn money in the long run, not only to deliver the standard of living and jobs that people need but to deliver the Chancellor's plans for investment in health and education.

It is worth looking internationally, because when the MPC cut interest rates again there was some criticism that the European Central Bank did not do the same. The truth is that UK real interest rates are substantially higher than those of our competitors, including our European ones, while investment is substantially lower. Our high interest rate in real terms keeps the brake on investment and keeps the pound uncompetitive.

The MPC has cut interest rates to help manufacturing and investment. Unlike the Chancellor or Labour Members, it has shown itself willing to face the problem. However, the Bank of England has one golf club—interest rates—to deal with one objective: inflation. It does an exceptionally good job in that respect, but it is the Chancellor's job to deal with the two-speed economy. He is so busy blaming everything on the rest of the world that he will not acknowledge the peculiarly British problem that this country faces.

For mortgage payers, of course, the news looks good. Interest rates are down, and another cut may be likely if the gloomy economic news continues. However, the Bank of England decision is a warning shot for householders, too. It implies that the MPC now believes that the threat from collapsing business confidence and investment outweighs the likelihood that house price rises and debt growth will continue to fuel the economy. In other words, the Chancellor may soon find himself with no clothes.

The implication is clear. Not only are house prices likely to go off the boil, in the MPC's view, but there is a risk of a downturn. If that leads to rising unemployment and falling consumer confidence, house prices could easily to start to fall. At that point, the rise in consumer spending will dry up overnight. There may be a return to negative equity and the one thing that is supporting growth in the British economy will have disappeared.

Over the past few years, when world growth sustained the British economy, the Chancellor missed the opportunity to take action to boost investment and productivity. He talks a lot about it, but he must know that his policies have failed because he can read the figures exactly like the rest of us. The record on productivity is catastrophically bad, as is the record on investment compared to that of our international competitors.

Of course, the Chancellor is right to say that inflation is low, which was not the case in the 1980s, and that that has allowed interest rate cuts to take some of the strain of the problems affecting the economy, but even with the interest rate cuts the picture remains unbalanced. Falls in the prices of goods are offsetting 5 per cent. inflation in services. Interest rates alone cannot tackle the wider problems in the UK economy. We need the Chancellor to take action in his Budget to tackle the problems that have made the two-speed economy worse—problems largely inflicted by the Chancellor in the first place.

First, he should stop adding more measures to complicate the tax system, and start simplifying it instead. The increase by one third in the number of tax complications since he took office has left business chasing accountants, while investment and productivity growth, supposedly encouraged by the various tax wheezes, has slumped. Productivity in the UK is dismal, and is growing dismally compared to our competitors. The Chancellor's micromanagement makes it worse—a tax complication here, a new piece of bureaucracy there, centralising targets everywhere. We need a Chancellor who meddles far less. It is time this Chancellor got off the back of business, because UK plc will not succeed if it is chasing tax breaks and fighting red tape.

The Chancellor also needs to take the exchange rate issue seriously. I was very pleased to hear today's announcement that we will get a report on the exchange rate issues associated with joining the euro. That is overdue, and it is a fundamental part of the question of euro entry.

The pound has persistently been in the range between €1.50 and €1.60. Although it is lower than it was, most economists reckon that it remains uncompetitive, and, worse, there is no confidence in industry that the recent fall against the euro will be sustained. The pound is now very high against the US dollar. That represents a double whammy for British exporters. No wonder Britain's share of inward investment in Europe has slumped from 28 to 16 per cent. since the euro was launched, while the eurozone share has risen. Again, that must, in the real world, be a concern for the Chancellor, even if he will not admit it here.

We already know from experience of the past few years that the merest mention by the Chancellor of the possibility of euro membership drives down the level of the pound, because almost everyone thinks that the pound is seriously overvalued. A more competitive rate would be needed before we could join the euro.

A positive assessment of the five tests may bring the pound down to more reasonable levels. If we joined the euro, it would permanently remove the exchange rate risk for more than half of our manufactured exports. With investment in the UK slumping, that is no longer a theoretical issue.

Those who do not want euro membership, and believe that we should put up with the fluctuations in exchange rates with the EU, our major home market, should provide some explanation of their alternative strategy for tackling a problem that has caused many of the manufacturing job losses—600,000 of them—that the Conservatives have described. I trust that when the Chancellor makes his assessment and subsequent announcements, he will acknowledge that the question goes beyond joining the euro. If he concludes that joining would not be right at this time, he must set out a strategy for dealing with exchange rates in the long term, in a world where speculation seems to be the driver of exchange rates, not underlying real values. Britain has lost hundred of thousands of jobs—probably millions—in the recessions of the early and late 1980s and now again in manufacturing. On each occasion, the pound has been very high compared with our major competitor currencies.

Mr. Bercow: Giving up British monetary policy in return for exchange rate instability against the dollar and the yen is not the height of economic wisdom, but will the hon. Gentleman say what assessment he has made of the effect of the rigidities of the planning process and of the Ofsted inspection system on the inadequacy of affordable and available child care in this country?

Matthew Taylor: I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman will find any solution to the exchange rate problems in that, but since leaving the Front Bench he has become keen on a change in the Tory leadership. He would prefer to have the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), the former Chancellor, as leader of the party. I remind the hon. Gentleman that the right hon. and learned Gentleman agrees with me about the exchange rate. He definitely does not share the hon. Gentleman's view on the matter. If there is a change in Tory leader, the hon. Gentleman may still not find himself invited back to the Front Bench.

Mr. Bercow: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for a Front-Bench spokesman so to suffer from short-term memory problems that he thinks a reference to the planning process is about the Tory leadership?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am pleased to say that that is not a point of order for the Chair.

Matthew Taylor: I want to focus on the Government for a few final moments.

The Chancellor understands that unsustainable increases in consumer debt cannot save his spending programme for ever. He talks about trying to boost investment and productivity, and I share his determination to do so, but I cannot share the prescription that he has laid out over recent years. The micromanagement of the tax system and the attempts to introduce tax breaks here and there to achieve the targets that he has set have failed demonstrably. The Chancellor needs to recognise that.

Britain needs to earn the money to invest in hospitals and schools. The Chancellor's strategy will not deliver that if he continues to allow all the internationally exposed sectors of the economy to decline. He cannot expect the MPC alone to deal with the wider issues through interest rate cuts, as he knows full well.

The first step on the road to recovery is to acknowledge one's problems. The Chancellor would do well to acknowledge some of the real problems in the British economy that are apparent to all but which are not shared by our competitors. Over the coming months, the Chancellor will be forced to acknowledge those problems. It will look far better for him if he admits as much and acts to tackle the problems before he is forced to do so.

The Conservative motion refers not only to investment but to delivering public services. The Conservatives failed entirely on health, education, housing and transport—the list is comprehensive. The Government are now making much-needed investment, but they need to decentralise and to let go of the controls. When I hear Ministers describe decentralisation as handing down targets to hospital administrators for the delivery of national targets set by Ministers, I realise that they do not understand what decentralisation means at all.

Decentralisation is not setting national targets for local delivery, but allowing local people to set their own targets for their hospitals and schools so that they can design the best services for local implementation. [Interruption.] The Chancellor says that that is what he says, but it is not—line after line in his speech is about the process of centralised controls, PSA targets and the rest of it.

I simply do not believe that Ministers in Whitehall, second-guessing those on the front line—doctors in hospital wards or teachers in classrooms—can ever deliver effectively the investment that the Government are now making. Ministers have to be willing to let go. In some cases, they have to be willing to allow local failure to show how things can be done better, just as they need to allow local successes to show how things can be done better because, just possibly, Ministers may never have thought of them. That is the way to deliver successful investment, and it is what the Chancellor needs to do.

Phil Hope (Corby): This is supposed to be an Opposition day debate, but I am struck by the absence of the Opposition—only four Conservative Members are in the Chamber. Still, that is up to them, I suppose. I had to check the date on the Order Paper because the motion has a lot more in common with the circumstances in which we found ourselves in the 1980s, rather than 2003. In the 1980s, the inflation rate was 10 per cent. for more than four years and the interest rate was at 15 per cent. for a year. Millions of people were unemployed, and millions more were on poverty wages. That was the state of the economy and public services then, not now.

The Conservatives have not learned the lessons, as we heard earlier from the shadow Chancellor. Their sole economic policy now appears to be to slash—to use a one-syllable word, as he said—public spending by 20 per cent. That is interesting, so let us just think about the figures. The statistics do not give the real picture of what life would have been like under the Tories if that kind of policy had been put into practice. The shadow Chancellor talked about being in a parallel universe. Let us imagine a day in the life of a Corby pensioner if the Tories had been in power and put in place their 20 per cent. slash in public spending.

Let us imagine that pensioner as she gets up in the morning and switches on her television. She will probably have to get rid of her telly because there is no free television licence under the Tories, as there is with the Labour Government. She leaves her cold flat because there is no £200 winter fuel payment a year, as is provided by the Labour Government. She goes out to catch a bus to visit her grandchildren, but she has to stand at a vandalised bus stop in the cold, waiting for a dilapidated bus that is probably running late because, unlike now, the Tories would not have put £1 million into Corby's urban bus challenge, which repairs bus stops, puts new buses on the roads and ensure that fares are affordable.

When the pensioner gets on the bus she now has a bus pass, provided by the Labour Government. However, 20 per cent. public spending cuts would have removed that pass from that pensioner if she had been living under a Tory Government. She would not have had a minimum income guarantee of £98.50. Her pension credit would not have been topped up from her late husband's steel pension because the Tories oppose the pension credit, and it would be cut by their 20 per cent. public spending cuts.

The pensioner arrives at her daughter's house to look after her grandchildren, but she has to do so because there is no £3 million sure start programme, as there is in Corby at the moment, providing help for parents with young children, and there are no nursery places for three and four-year-olds because the Tories would not match our pledge on that if they imposed their 20 per cent. public spending cuts.

While mum is at work, the pensioner decides to give her children some lunch when they come home from school, but, unfortunately, there is not enough money in the house. Child benefit was frozen under the Tories. She would not have the child care tax credit, the working families tax credit or the child tax credit, which is being introduced this April and which will put money directly into the pockets of poor families with children. Those families in Corby would have to live with the 20 per cent. public spending cuts.

So the children come home from primary school for lunch with my Corby pensioner who looks after the grandchildren at home. They are not doing too well because the school classroom is terribly draughty, as there has been no upkeep and maintenance because of the 20 per cent. cut in public spending under the Tories. There are no books. There are no computers to learn on, and there is certainly no literacy or numeracy hour, which the Tories oppose and which has dramatically raised educational standards for primary school children during the past six years.

The children have to keep their jackets and coats on because the council houses are incredibly draughty because they have not received the £3 million major repairs allowance that came to Corby council homes under the Labour Government. That money could not be spent with 20 per cent. public spending cuts under the Tories. So the pensioner says, "I'd better take the children out. I'll take them for a walk to the post office." Of course, under the Tories, £120 million would not be going into the post office network to support it, so the local post office would have been closed. Rural post offices, in particular, were closing hand over fist when the Tories were in power, and more would close if they were able to make their 20 per cent. cut in public spending.

On the way, the pensioner has to walk the children past the burnt out cars that litter the streets of Tory Corby. They would have to experience that because the measures and funding to deal with abandoned vehicles would not have been put in place or have been affordable under a Tory Government with 20 per cent. cuts in public spending. The new multi-agency team—we call it Caspar in Corby—which is successfully reducing antisocial behaviour would be swept aside because no one could afford to put the people on the streets to tackle that problem in Corby.

The council would have had another round of cuts. In the last four years of the Tory Government, we experienced a 7 per cent. cut in grants to local government. With the Labour Government, we have had a 25 per cent. real-terms increase in support for local councils—not a 20 per cent. cut in public spending, which the Tories would impose if they came to power.

Of course when the pensioner gets back home, she meets her son-in-law who has just finished his temporary job on poverty pay because, under a Tory Government, there is no minimum wage. At least, there would not be one for small firms because that is the little trick that the Tories would pull if they ever got back into power. There would be no protection for agency workers because the Tories do not support any of the new regulations. There would certainly be no new deal for that young chap, who got his job under the new deal for the unemployed. The Tories opposed the new deal for unemployed young people every time that it was considered in the House.

My Corby pensioner has toothache, and she would like to go to the new dental surgery. In fact, four new dental surgeries are being built in Corby to provide better dental care. With 20 per cent. public spending cuts, there would not be a single new dentist in Corby if the Tories were in power. Her day ends in misery, of course, when she gets a letter from her private health insurance company saying that she will have to find a little bit extra on the upfront excess to pay for her hip replacement. Under the Tories, there would be no hip replacements on the national health service; those operations would have to be done through private health insurance.

Thankfully, that nightmare life of a Corby pensioner under the Tories has not happened, but it could happen if they got back into power and introduced 20 per cent. cuts in public spending. Instead, we have the most successful economic performance in Britain's history. We are seeing step-by-step improvements to public services, and all hon. Members can see the tangible benefits in our constituencies.

Mr. Ivan Henderson (Harwich): The chief executive and chairman of my local health trust have just released its annual report, which states that the Government have put unprecedented investment into my local health service. They cannot understand the remarks of the shadow Chancellor when he says that the NHS is failing. He is accusing every person working in the NHS of being a failure. Does my hon. Friend share my view that that is disgraceful?

Phil Hope: My hon. Friend is right. The worst thing is that, to make a political point, the Opposition run down civil servants and public sector workers who are doing such a huge amount to bring about change. We gave the public sector a real challenge. We put in investment, but asked for reform to go with it. The police, teachers and nurses have risen to that challenge and are now providing better services with real outcomes. There have been cuts in waiting times and waiting lists, and better hospital procedures. When I go to my local hospital, I usually have to wear a hard hat because there is so much building work as new departments and services are put in. I am sure that that is true in my hon. Friend's constituency as well.

Mr. Bercow: The hon. Gentleman talks about "real outcomes". Will he tell the House why the Government have abolished their own 1998 target for the reduction of truancy and presided over a quadrupling in the level of assaults on staff in schools? Why?

Phil Hope: The difficulty that the hon. Gentleman faces is his failure to grasp—

Mr. Bercow: Answer.

Phil Hope: I shall answer the question in a second. The hon. Gentleman fails to grasp the consequences of his party's policies in schools in my constituency and, I dare say, in every constituency in the country. Teachers are now achieving results that they were never able to achieve before. They are achieving those results because of the investment that we have put into schools. We have backed head teachers with that investment and by giving them new powers and delegated authority, allowing them to control and run their schools to greater effect. As a result, less children are truanting—

Mr. Bercow: Fewer!

Phil Hope: I accept the hon. Gentleman's grammatical correction and thank him very much for it. It is the only thing that he has got right all afternoon.

Fewer children in my constituency are truanting. Unlike the situation under the Conservative Administration, when truant children were simply roaming the streets, measures are now in place to tackle truancy and ensure that those children are identified, provided with an education and brought back into schools, with—crucially—the involvement of their parents. The parents are involved in the school contract to ensure that they, and not only the schools, take responsibility. As a result, less children—fewer children—are leaving school inappropriately and more children are back in school and achieving a higher educational performance.

I will finish now as time is short.

Mr. Bercow rose—

Phil Hope: I will not give way now; I have answered the hon. Gentleman's question.

We have achieved a remarkable economic success. We are making step-by-step improvements to public services. However, there is another challenge—to improve people's quality of life. The challenge for the Labour Government, now that we have the economy right and now that we are seeing improvements to public services, is to raise the quality of life for every citizen in our communities.

2.22 pm

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): I have declared my interests in the Register of Members' Interests.

So far in this debate, we have heard a most lamentable speech from the Liberal Democrat spokesman, the hon. Member for Truro and St Austell (Matthew Taylor). He should have died of embarrassment as he was wilting on his feet trying to deliver it. He could not answer a single intelligent question—and my colleagues raised several—on Liberal Democrat policy. He was left stumbling by the question on whether they wanted a massive increase in tax and waste, on top of the tax and waste that we have got used to from the Government. He was quite unable to explain how, if there were to be no further increases in expenditure under the Liberal Democrats, there could be any improvement in services. As we well know, they are quite unable to deliver such improvement when they are trusted in councils around the country.

I wish to concentrate on the complacent and unconvincing performance of the downgraded Chancellor—the Chancellor of tax and waste; the Chancellor of boom and bust; and the Chancellor who came to power saying that he would bring about a great manufacturing renaissance, only to dash hopes, sacrifice jobs, and lead many manufacturers to a valley of tears.

Kali Mountford: If the Chancellor is complacent, will the right hon. Gentleman explain the complacency of the members of his own party? This is his party's debate, but where are they?

Mr. Redwood: This debate has been extremely well attended on the Front and Back Benches for the interesting speeches that were given by my colleagues.

Matthew Taylor: But not for yours.

Mr. Redwood: The Liberal Democrats have chosen to make this truancy hour, as we see from their absence from the Chamber. I am delighted to see the shadow Chancellor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis), in his place. This is a team and we are heartily sick of the way in which the Government team have let down this country, let down their pensioners, let down their taxpayers, let down their users of public services and let down, above all, their manufacturers.

Mr. Ivan Henderson rose—

Mr. Redwood: Briefly and succinctly, I wish to highlight 10 massive errors of the Chancellor. First, this is the Chancellor of tax and waste. This is the man who has tipped so much money into the health service that we get no visible improvement at all in health care in my part of the world. Where has all the money gone? It is not buying us the nurses and doctors that we want; it is not delivering the extra operations; and it is leading to bed closures and shortages. There has been incompetence on an enormous scale from the Chancellor of tax and waste.

The second great error of this Chancellor was to destroy the savings and pensions industry in this country.

Andy Burnham: Is the hon. Gentleman seriously suggesting that there has been no increase in the numbers of nurses and doctors, and no new NHS buildings and no improvement whatsoever in his local health service? I will look up the figures but I believe that he is wrong to say that. I would be grateful if he would be honest with the House.

Mr. Redwood: What can be achieved in my local hospital is all too little because of the changes in the way in which the health service is managed and because of the shortage of money to deal with the falling productivity that is the hallmark of the health service under this Government.

The Chancellor has a massive productivity crisis in the public sector and he has no idea what to do about it. The more targets and central controls that he heaps on the systems, the worse they become as local situations are undermined. I want more doctors and nurses, more treatments and more patient activity in my hospital. Despite the money, none of that is being delivered because of the fall in productivity

Kali Mountford: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Redwood: I have already given way rather generously and I wish to make some progress.

I had moved on to pensions. The Chancellor tried to tell the House that a £5,000 a year stinging tax on pension savings would not be visible. He and the Prime Minister dared to say that, because the stock market was rising when that tax was introduced, all would be well and there would be magic money—pensioners and savers would be better off, and, of course, the Chancellor would be better off with his bags of gold swelling every day. As soon as the stock market started to fall, we saw absolutely nothing from the Chancellor by way of apology or adjustment to his policies.

The Chancellor seemed so little to understand what he had done that he did not realise that there would be a stock market fall in company shares as a direct result of taking £5 billion off the people who had invested in those shares. The market was selling on 20 times earnings at that time. I do not know whether the Chancellor was aware of that or whether he understands it, but it meant that there was bound to be a £100 billion hit on share prices that were held by my constituents and the constituents of hon. Members on the Labour Benches through their pension and insurance funds. Either the Chancellor did not understand, or he did not give a toss. Either way, it is very bad news for the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he was so careless of the savings and future pension entitlements of so many people. Where is he now to apologise? Where is he now to start reducing the tax burden? Where is he now to help savers before many of them reach retirement with a fraction of what they were expecting from the hard-earned money that they had saved? People have been robbed by a rip-off Government and robbed by a rip-off Chancellor.

The third error has been the Chancellor's failure to deal with the problems of manufacturing. Indeed, the Chancellor is the main problem for manufacturing. It is this Chancellor who has stung manufacturing by £15 billion a year through his extra impositions, controls and regulations. It is this Chancellor who believes that he can regulate, control and harry manufacturers, taking money away from them but mysteriously believing that that will do them no damage and that they will come up smiling and bouncing.

When the Chancellor was in opposition as shadow Chancellor, his idea of a good evening out was to sit in the House of Commons Library puzzling over all the numbers coming out month by month from the then Government's statistical machine. As soon as he found a single bad number—jobs lost or manufacturing output not rising—he was on to it and would claim that it was a scandal and a disgrace. Why does he not read the figures now? Why does he not see that he has already presided over two manufacturing recessions? The second was long and deep, and some people believe that he will preside over a third if he survives long enough in office given all the current rumours. This is the man who has let manufacturing down, who has destroyed good, well-paid jobs and who has led to a crisis in our export industries, because he has damaged the productivity and competitiveness of those who make things in Britain.

That leads me directly to the fourth huge error and problem with which the Chancellor has burdened us. It is a problem that he and his Labour predecessors as shadow Chancellor used regularly to complain about when Conservative Governments delivered more modest figures in terms of the problem than this Chancellor has done. I am talking about the balance of payments. It really takes the biscuit for someone who campaigned against any balance of payments deficit in the Conservative years not only to preside over, in the past year, the biggest bumper deficit in history but to say nothing of the fact that we buy £34 billion more of manufactured goods into this country, which was once the workshop of the world, than we are able to sell from it. That is the magnitude of the crisis that he has created in manufacturing.

Many Labour Members have now gone quiet. They know that there have been factory closures and job losses in their constituencies. They are under pressure from their constituents to put that right, but they know that they have nothing to offer because the Chancellor does not care.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Redwood: I shall give way to the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hendrick) because he has not intervened.

Mr. Mark Hendrick (Preston): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that consumers, and not the Chancellor, purchase manufactured goods? In fact, the Chancellor has done a great deal to stabilise the economy.

Mr. Redwood: That was incredibly lame. The hon. Gentleman could not name a single thing that the Chancellor has done. I am glad that consumers are still allowed to make their own choices on some issues in this country, but I am sure that Labour is working on stopping that. When the Chancellor was in opposition, he said that he had all the answers. However, in government, he has adopted all the wrong policies. He is the man of taxation and regulation, so he is destroying jobs by his deeds. Lift the regulation, reduce the taxes and the situation would improve for many manufacturers.

The next issue on which the Chancellor has fallen down is the euro. Does he not realise by now that joining a Germany mired in recession, joining a large area where one interest rate certainly does not fit all and hitching our fortunes to the continent of Europe where growth rates and productivity growth rates are far worse even than in Brown's Britain would be the last thing that we need to do? Should he not now lift the burden and uncertainty from business?

One thing that the Chancellor could do today to make business a little happier would be to come to the House and say that he has decided that it would be quite wrong to destroy the pound and the separate controls over our economic life. He could say that business need not waste its time and money worrying about preparations and about whether the Government will hold a referendum. He could remove that uncertainty if nothing else.

The next thing that the Chancellor has done that shows how disastrous he has been was his pathetic sale of gold reserves. It was a signal to the market. If one had been looking for a contrarian view, one should have immediately moved in and bought however much gold off the Chancellor that one could afford to buy. He managed to find and create the deep bottom of the gold market. He sold this country out; he sold it short; he got it wrong; and he has never apologised for the losses that he has chalked up.

The losses to date are a mind-boggling £750 million. What could manufacturers have done with that sum if it had been given back to them as a tax reduction? What could my hospital and hospitals around the country have done with that money if it had been available to purchase enough nurses and doctors to get ahead of the productivity problem that the Government have created in the health service? This Chancellor decides that he can outwit the fund managers of the world. He sold the gold at the wrong price and, of course, he does not apologise. Britain is poorer as a direct result.

The next issue is the telecoms industry. The Government inherited a marvellous telecoms industry that had been created by the previous Conservative Administration's privatisation, liberalisation and deregulation. Their policies spawned thousands of new jobs, many new products, a great increase in exports, a huge improvement in service and an extension of telephony services to many people who simply could not afford them under a Labour Government with a monopoly public enterprise system. This sector of the market was leading the growth and the boom that Labour inherited. What did the Chancellor do? He imposed a swingeing telecoms tax on the industry, charging them £22 billion simply to stay in business.

I agree that that was very clever. The Chancellor wanted to maximise the take and he worked out exactly how to do that. He did that very well. However, he did not seem to realise that that would bankrupt half the industry, turn the other half into walking wounded, lead directly to huge job losses, slow down investment in new technology and extend the damage being done by the dotcom bubble bursting in the States. He made the problem more severe and more difficult in the United Kingdom. He decided to burst his own boom in the leading sector, and he did so dramatically with terrible results.

Mr. Ivan Henderson rose—

Mr. Redwood: No, I wish to conclude, because many other Members wish to speak.

Mr. Henderson: What about rail privatisation?

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Gentleman will be delighted to know that the next issue to which I shall turn is the railways.

This Chancellor took a private sector company that needed a modest amount of Government assistance to deal with the very large requirements that the Government were heaping on it to improve safety and standards on the railways and, through bankruptcy and the development of a new type of company—a third-way company, as they like to call it—he decided to waste billions of pounds of taxpayers' money that would not have been wasted if the Government had soldiered on with the system that they had inherited.

Kali Mountford: At the time of privatisation—which was clearly a privatisation too far—why did the right hon. Gentleman's Government not think more carefully about how it should be conducted? Why did they split the industry? Why did they make it unsafe? Why did they make it uneconomic?

Mr. Redwood: We did not make it less safe than the nationalised industry that it replaced. Privatisation led to the great increase in ridership and usage of the railways to which Ministers often refer. They do not realise that they are contradicting themselves when they point out that element of success in the system that they inherited and that they then enjoyed in the good times. This Government bankrupted the private sector company; they decided to impose such strong requirements on the railway that it was not possible to finance it at the then rate; and they decided to tip at least £14 billion into an organisation only to discover that railway services are now worse than they were when they started the dreadful odyssey on which they embarked.

The Government are wasting billions on the railways but commuters from my constituency of Wokingham still cannot get to work on time on a reliable service. The Government's rail regulator is saying that it will now have to cut services because, despite all the money, there is not enough to spend on the things that need doing. Despite all the money, the service is going backwards rather than forwards. The Government will rue the day when they bankrupted that company; they will rue the amount of money that is gobbled up by their new creature without it achieving good results.

Mr. Bercow: Is not the ultimate evidence of the Government's chronic policy failures on Railtrack and of the disinformation provided to the House about such matters the reality that the right hon. Member for Tyneside, North (Mr. Byers), who was the Secretary of State responsible, scuttled off and resigned from office?

Mr. Redwood: Indeed, the right hon. Gentleman had to do that. His policy was disastrous and, at times, incorrectly presented to the House and to those outside.

That brings me to the Chancellor's and the Government's ninth catastrophic failure. If he wants to have a fast growing, modern and successful economy, he will have to learn that the first thing that he needs is a good transport system. Yet this Government have managed to combine big increases in public spending on transport with a massive failure of performance.

This is the Government who now nervously await the introduction of the congestion charge in London, knowing that London has been brought to a halt by a combination of central Government misdirectives and a Labour Mayor whose one purpose in life is to stop anyone driving anywhere, whatever the hour, however much it might be necessary to take their tools to work or to travel at times when public transport is not available.

Until this Government understand that a modern economy needs to let vehicle traffic get around as well as railways, until they understand that we need a massive increase in capacity of all types of transport, there is little hope of restoring the levels of growth that the economy once enjoyed, which are now slipping because of the dreadful policies of the present regime.

That brings me to the tenth of my 10 points [Interruption.] Labour Members must be very relieved to know that I have limited my speech to 10. I could have done another 10.

The tenth point I have chosen is the Government's strange view that third-way finance will ride to their rescue, that there is magic money in the private sector that can be attracted into public service without a cost to taxpayers. Again, they will rue the day. They will discover that many of the half-baked schemes they have constructed, starting with the London Underground, are badly thought through and will end up with enormous risk to the taxpayer.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Shadow Chancellor is right. The £100 billion-odd of liabilities that are potentially already out there should be on the Government's balance sheet and should be clearly understood by the Government. Next time the Government should pause before signing some of these contracts, because there must be honest finance for these projects. If they are public projects, they will end up with higher taxes, and higher taxes mean a weaker economy.

We desperately need a Government who will lift the burden of regulation, will start to concentrate expenditure on the people and things that are necessary and will hack away at the overgrowth and undergrowth of the political classes and the spin doctors, the administrators, the consultation experts and the great raft of colour brochures that this Government now churn out to substitute for proper policy and managing services on the ground.

There is massive waste in this Government. I say to them: start to chop it out. Give the money back to the people, give the money back to business, and then things could start to grow again.

The Chancellor has let the country down. He has robbed and pillaged the private sector. He has driven people out of work in manufacturing. He should be ashamed. He should apologise to the House.

2.42 pm

Vernon Coaker (Gedling): I shall be brief, to allow other hon. Members to speak.

The debate is interesting because it shows that the Conservatives' tactics are to paint a picture of gloom and doom about our public services, to run them down and say that there has been no progress or improvement, whether in the health service, schools or anything else. Clearly, one of their prime activities between now and the next election will be continually to run down our public services.

It is important to acknowledge that we face challenges and difficulties, and that improvements are needed in some respects; but if all that we do in this Chamber is deny the improvement in public investment and progress that we see in my constituency, we shall not serve our constituents particularly well. I shall highlight some of the improvements that have taken place in public services, in the economy and in employment prospects, without failing to recognise that there are challenges in our public services that we need to meet.

Mr. Howard: I should like to remind the hon. Gentleman of one of the statistics to which I referred, which is that over the past two years spending on the national health service has increased by 22 per cent., but hospital treatment has increased by only 1.6 per cent. Does the hon. Gentleman deny those figures? I do not see how he can, because they come from the Government. Does he think that, in those circumstances, we should remain silent about them?

Vernon Coaker: I do not think that the right hon. and learned Gentleman should remain silent. What I am saying is that the Conservative party has clearly decided that in the run-up to the next election it will denigrate and run down our public services. The difference between us is that we are saying that we shall invest in and reform our public services, while recognising progress where there is progress and challenges where challenges remain. What we shall not do is say that the picture is of a complete mess and of failure.

On the number of people out of work, to which my right Friend the Chancellor referred, it is too easily forgotten that a few years ago people like me and many others used to go on marches for jobs. We carried banners at huge demonstrations, where we said that there could be no dignity for any family, no self-respect for any individual and no proper attack on poverty in society if we did not move towards full employment.

We too readily say that, whereas 3 million people were out of work, now the figure is less than 1 million. That reduction is a staggering achievement. It means that people have prospects in their lives. They have the possibility of inclusion, self-respect and dignity, which were denied them before. The reduction in unemployment in my constituency is a phenomenal achievement. In their welfare to work programme, the Government tried to tackle the problems encountered by people moving off benefit and into work caused by the benefits trap. Tax credits, the new deal and other measures introduced to deal with some of the difficulties have been a tremendous success.

I am proud of our record on employment and the fact that a Labour Government have delivered huge rises in the number of people in work and huge decreases in the number of unemployed. That is one of the greatest social steps that can be taken to tackle poverty and give people dignity.

In my local area, too, the increases in public spending have brought real benefits. It is clear from this debate that it is possible to take the Opposition's position. They can say that there is considerable waste, and considerable spending that should not be made, and that their policy is to reduce that spending by 20 per cent. because they think that it will deliver a better result. However, I must tell them that I shall not argue for a reduction in public spending when most people in my constituency are banging on my door calling for increased public spending. They want increases in the amount the Government are doing for their schools, hospitals, roads and transport. They believe not that there is over-investment in those services, but that the decades of under-investment in them led to the current problems.

We all accept that it is not possible simply to plough money in and expect services to improve. Reform is needed alongside the investment. Equally, it cannot be said that reform on its own will deliver improvements. Investment must be coupled with reform if we are to see improvements.

Mr. Bercow: It is a question not of denigrating the services, but of holding the Government to account for their policy failures, which make them worse than they would otherwise be. Will the hon. Gentleman tell the House, in response to the question that I posed to the Chancellor and that my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) has just posed to him, why NHS activity rates are rising at a rate of only one-fourteenth of the increase in NHS expenditure? That is the question; what is the hon. Gentleman's answer?

Vernon Coaker: We are investing in capacity to deal with some of the problems. As I understand it, the shadow Chancellor said that public services have been denigrated. He painted a picture of complete failure in which no progress or advance had been made, but we are making progress—although I accept that real challenges remain. The hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) identifies the problem of capacity, but we cannot address that without investment. We certainly cannot do it by inflicting cuts.

Kali Mountford: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Vernon Coaker: If my hon. Friend allows me to finish, one or two of our colleagues will also be able to speak.

My constituency of Gedling in Nottingham has new schools. Parkdale primary school has been rebuilt; millions of pounds of capital investment have gone into Arnold Hill school, Carlton-le-Willows school and Redhill school; and Arnold View school is to be rebuilt. There are new buildings at Arno Vale school; new classrooms at Burton Joyce; and a new hall at Seely church school. There are more nurseries, a sure start scheme and more teachers and teaching assistants. Colleges are expanding, and the Clifton campus of Nottingham Trent university is like a building site. Those improvements do not arrive out of thin air. They are possible only because of Government investment, and I am proud of that.

Building is going on at hospitals, too. The Queen's medical centre has a new accident and emergency unit; a new breast cancer unit is being built at City hospital, which I visited last Friday; a new urology unit and a new haematology unit are planned; and a cardiac unit is on its way, as are new wards for the elderly. There are more doctors and nurses, and the Gedling primary care trust is working to do something about substandard health centres. Just for the record, Nottinghamshire now has more police officers than ever before.

My central point is that the Government have invested huge sums in public services and we can see improvements at a local and national level. Of course it is necessary to have reform alongside that and to deal with some of the problems that investment brings, but there is a clear divide between those who believe that we can improve public services by making cuts and those who believe that we can do it by investment and reform. Another way would be to praise our teachers, doctors, nurses and police officers. We need to tell those people who work in our public services that we admire their work and understand the difficulties that they face. They need to know that we are proud of the progress that has been made.

2.52 pm

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield): It is a curious experience to follow the hon. Member for Gedling (Vernon Coaker), who represents the constituency that I represented for 10 years between 1987 and 1997. Although I recognise his sincerity, he has not answered the Opposition's case. Before I go further, I draw the attention of the House to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests.

I hope to build on the outstanding speeches by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood).

Roger Casale (Wimbledon): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Mitchell: No, I have barely started.

[Mr. Mitchell]

I do not have a list of 10, but will comment on one or two of the points raised. Whatever else comes out of the debate, it must surely be the stunning complacency with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer accounted for the state of the British economy. Things started so well. I remember him saying, probably in song, that things could only get better. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) bequeathed a brilliant economic platform on which to build. The Chancellor did the right thing with the Bank of England and stuck to Tory expenditure plans. He also accurately read the Asian crisis, for which he was rightly praised in the House and the City, when so many commentators got it wrong. I have said a number of times—I like to be fair—that he has been a successful and good Chancellor. However, like so many before him, he sadly believes his own propaganda, and hubris and nemesis are setting in. It will not be many months before he is reviled by every hardworking taxpaying family for presiding over what is about to come.

As the shadow Chancellor made clear, there are serious imbalances in our economy. Even the Liberal spokesman, the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor), made the dangers in the economy clear. A housing boom led to a £12 billion withdrawal of equity in the last quarter of last year. A consumer boom has taken place. The Confederation of British Industry has issued dire warnings not only about the massive increase in taxation, but about the massive amounts of regulation that are being ushered in every hour of every day. We also have Labour's tax on jobs, which starts in April. Those events are taking place when the stock market in Britain has fallen by nearly 50 per cent. from its height and our economy is in a dangerous state.

I call on the Chancellor to announce that he will suspend the £5 billion a year tax on pensions. I do not expect him to abolish it, but it is doing a great deal of damage. Almost everyone agrees that it is vital to put more money into our pensions, but he is taking £5 billion every year. He should announce, at the latest in the Budget, that he will suspend that forthwith while the current economic circumstances prevail.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton): That has been one of the Opposition's themes for years, but every time they are taxed with the idea of giving a commitment to re-introduce the £5 billion, they remain silent. What is the hon. Gentleman's view on that?

Mr. Mitchell: The shadow Chancellor of the Exchequer will make plain our position on taxation before and at the next general election. My point is slightly different, however. I am asking for a temporary suspension of the tax, which is causing such damage to British pension funds, while we allow the economy to recover.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has made things far worse. All the independent forecasters outside the House told him that his growth forecasts were wrong. Those people were rubbished and told that they had got it all wrong. Now it is they who are right and he who is wrong. Do we get any contrition from the Chancellor on his errors? We do not. Instead, we have to put up with the bombast, the guff about prudence, the puffed-up and stomach-churning lectures about his golden rules, and the ludicrous pseudo-intellectual speeches about the role of the public sector, such as the speech that he delivered last week to the Social Market Foundation.

Kali Mountford rose—

Mr. Mitchell: The Government blandly go on roaring along with their spending plans, but who will bail them out? Perhaps the hon. Lady will tell us.

Kali Mountford: It would be very nice if the hon. Gentleman could introduce some facts into the debate. He makes much about the forecasts. When did any Tory Chancellor get the forecasts right? Surely it is fair to refer to all the items in the Treasury Committee report that show that no one got the forecasts right, not even the independent forecasters. Let us get the facts straight.

Mr. Mitchell: I gave way in the hope that the hon. Lady would tell us who will bail out the Government. As she has not, I shall do it: it will be the long-suffering and greatly abused taxpayer. Had the Chancellor presided over such a failure as chairman of a public company, the company would have been forced to have a rights issue, the share price would have collapsed and no doubt the chairman and the chief executive would have been fired. Under the Government, however, the Chancellor will not be fired; he merely seeks a promotion next door.

We have the odious spectre of a grinning Government spraying around taxpayers' money as if it were going out fashion. They are frittering away the golden inheritance that they got from my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe and failing to take tough decisions on public service reform.

I wish to make a few points about the six wasted years, the empty promises and meaningless sound bites that we have all had to put up with from this spinning Government. My hon. Friends will remember with affection the slogan, "Tough on crime, tough on the causes of crime." Violent crime and gun crime have risen. In New York, crime is down by 62 per cent, but in Britain it is rising again. We were then encouraged to believe that the Government were going to "think the unthinkable" on welfare. They appointed a Minister who genuinely thought deeply about those matters, then fired him. Since then, the welfare budget has soared and the Government have had to reinstate benefit rules on asylum seekers coming into this country. They had torn into Conservative Ministers for imposing those rules, describing them as wicked, but six years later they have had to reimpose them.

Then there was "24 hours to save the NHS". Waiting lists are still over 1 million, and we have heard the eloquent comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) about the state of the health service. Government Members should think about the following statistic—survival rates for prostate cancer in Germany are 68 per cent., but in this country, in my constituency and the constituencies of Labour Members, they are 44 per cent. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham said, spending on health has gone up by a staggering 30 per cent., whereas activity—operations—has gone up by only 2 per cent. In Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland there is higher spending, but longer lists and worse cancer care.

We were told throughout the 1997 election campaign that there would be no rise in income tax, which was a deeply disingenuous piece of spinning. Today, there are 1 million more higher-rate taxpayers, and the tax burden has risen from 37 to 42 per cent. I could go on and examine transport, but my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham has already done so extremely skilfully. In the past six years, public spending has risen by a staggering £111 billion or one third. That money has been removed in tax from hard-working men and women who have paid higher tax and got precious little back. That is the catastrophic effect of Labour's experiment in throwing tax money at unreformed public services.

David Wright (Telford): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that a key statistic in measuring economic success is the number of unemployment claimants in our constituencies? Is he aware that from 1997 to 2002 the number of claimants in his constituency fell by 33 per cent.?

Mr. Mitchell: There are two answers to that point. First, the hon. Gentleman knows that in Sutton Coldfield there is a tiny handful of unemployed people. He gave not a number but a percentage. Secondly, unemployment has fallen since 1997 because of the firm economic foundations that his Government inherited from their Conservative predecessors.

Finally, the Government have flunked reform. They had the opportunity, and we have heard about their interesting ideas on private investment in education and foundation hospitals, but they are fettered by old Labour dogma. Even the Blairite think-tank Demos in its interesting pamphlet "System Failure", published on 20 May last year, made it clear that those reforms are essential, but said that the Government have failed to implement them. They have failed to learn the lessons that Governments have had to learn since the second world war: government is too big. My hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride) pointed out in an intervention that a quarter of the workforce, or 7 million people, are now Government employees. There is micromanagement by politicians, who are using a 50-year-old model that simply does not work. There is no competition or choice, and there is bureaucracy, regulation and waste.

Even the NHS says that 20 per cent. of its budget, or £10 billion, may be wasted, and there is serious capital under-investment in the health service because of the system. We have a poor service, and there is low morale among those who work in the NHS. Recent surveys show that a fifth of GPs say they want to quit and a third of teachers say that they want to quit within five years. The Government have failed to make reforms and have failed to learn lessons that have been learned overseas. If they cared to look at Denmark, Holland and Sweden, they would see that there is a free choice of school, whether public or private, which is paid for by the taxpayer. In Holland, 70 per cent. of schools are non-state owned; in France, a third of hospitals are non-state owned; and in Germany, 50 per cent. of hospitals are non-state owned. The eternal post-war truth that Government Members should have learnt is that choice and competition deliver for our fellow citizens.

The Government and those on the Treasury Bench have forgotten those lessons. The Government are bent on an orgy of spending our hard-earned taxes, but they are unwilling to make that spending count by making fundamental reforms. They have been found out. Increasingly, they will find themselves paying a terrible price for wasting our hard-earned tax money, and frittering away and destroying the good will and opportunity that they clearly had when they came to power in 1997.

3.6 pm

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley): We have heard some deluded comments and nonsense—it is a case of collective false memory syndrome on the Opposition's part. I was going to give a brief speech, but as only one Opposition Member still wishes to speak, I shall allow myself a little more time. We have been presented with another rehearsal of the same ideas, but Opposition Members are blind to the truth. We have been offered a new opportunity to increase unemployment by 3 million; a new opportunity to cut nursing training places; a new opportunity for yet more privatisation. The cat is out of the bag. We have just been told that the way forward is to privatise, privatise and privatise again until everybody pays through the nose for what they are now getting free at the point of delivery. I cannot accept that Opposition Members truly believe that a mix of markets in public sector services would be more efficient or cost-effective or, indeed, deliver the services that people need when they need them.

Dr. Fox rose—

Kali Mountford: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman—it might be interesting.

Dr. Fox: I believe:

"Choice mechanisms enhance equity by exerting pressure on low-quality or incompetent providers . . . Competitive pressures and incentives drive up quality, efficiency and responsiveness".

I hope that the hon. Lady does too, as those are the words of the Prime Minister.

Kali Mountford: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not saying that the vast majority of public sector workers are incompetent or unable to do their job. There is, quite rightly, a case for introducing measures to make a work force more effective, such as mechanisms for dealing with a teacher who is not delivering in the classroom, a nurse or doctor who is not treating patients well, or a police officer who is no longer fit for service. However, that is not what the Opposition are talking about. They are saying that a new infrastructure is needed for privatisation, as nationally delivered services are incompetent and incapable of delivering. The Wanless report, however, clearly showed that the NHS is the most efficient and cost-effective way of delivering services to the vast majority of people.

I cannot imagine why the Tory Government in 1996 thought that cutting 7,000 nursing places could increase capacity in the NHS or improve standards. To improve nursing standards, we should give nurses a clear career path and incentives in their pay structure. They should have ways of demonstrating clinical skills so that they can have enhanced job satisfaction and improve delivery of services to patients. That is the sort of reform that we want. We do not want reform ensuring that one of part of the population gets one sort of service, while another part—those who can afford to pay—gets the cream of the services. The people who are in the middle and have managed to put away a little bit of money should not suddenly find that that money does not cover all the health provision that they hoped it would. That is not the sort of health delivery that I want.

Nor do I want a mixed-market economy for education in which people get their children into classes of 12, 13 or 14 if they can afford to do so, while the children of people who cannot afford such provision end up in a class of 50 or 60 pupils at primary age. That is the situation that we inherited in 1997. It was not some sort of Utopia, but a nonsensical education system that did not deal with the basics. It was a system in which not one or two children came out of each school at 11 to contribute to illiteracy levels; in some areas, 25 per cent. of children were unable to read and write before they went into comprehensive education.

How could we possibly expect a child to develop, grow and be able to gain some sort of advantage from their secondary education if we never got the basics right? Merely to consider a one year downturn in standards without looking at all six years under this Government and the year-on-year improvements in literacy and numeracy is simply ridiculous. Hon. Members talk about a 1.6 per cent. decrease this year, but let us have a look at the 25 per cent. increases in standards year on year.

I am proud of pupils in my constituency, who have this year lifted standards beyond anybody's expectation. That has happened not only in well-off areas, but everywhere. Children who have a history of parents, grandparents, aunties and uncles being out of work now have the prospect of work. In my constituency, nobody leaving school in the past three years has been incapable of getting a job. That even includes people leaving education with special educational needs and disabilities. The new deal programme has ensured not only that the majority can get jobs, but that those who previously found it hard to be placed in a job can gain employment. We are now saying to employers—this is the sort of measure that the Opposition do not want—that we will be fair to people with disabilities and find ways of ensuring that they get the same opportunities as everybody else.

Of course, that is the so-called new red tape that we are all supposed to be throwing away. That red tape, which the Opposition hate so much, is the very protection that people need. Let us think back to the situation when we had the sort of Government who hated red tape and did not believe in the public sector. What did they say? They said that they would cut red tape, which would instantly mean cutting civil service jobs.

Roger Casale: Will my hon. Friend comment on the bombastic rant that we have just heard from the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell), who was not gracious enough to accept my intervention or to remain in the Chamber to hear the next speech? He was gracious enough, however, to remind the House that he had been the Member of Parliament for Gedling between 1987 and 1997—

Dr. Fox: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. It is only fair to say to the House that I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) has told those on both Front Benches, both Whips and you that he is attending a Select Committee sitting.

Roger Casale: That may be the case, but I am sure that the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield would have had time to accept my intervention. Indeed, his having to leave the debate after making his speech was perhaps even more of a reason why he might have accepted interventions.

Will my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Kali Mountford) comment on whether the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield lost his seat in 1997, as he reminded the House, because the verdict of the electorate at that time—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should bring his remarks to a close. His contribution is very lengthy for an intervention.

Kali Mountford: I assume that my hon. Friend was rightly reminding the House that the Opposition lost the election because of the very measures to which I have been referring.

As I said, the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield is simply suffering from false memory syndrome. He has forgotten what it was like in those dark old days. He said a great deal about the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), but what did he do? Immediately before the election, when everybody thought that interest rates should have gone up, what did the former Chancellor do? He sat on his hands. Why did he do so? He was worried about the election, but even that decision did not buy the election result for which the Conservatives hoped.

That is why the current Chancellor rightly dealt with the Bank of England and said that we must be independent and that interest rates should not be tied to the electoral benefits or disbenefits of the Government of the day. It was perfectly correct to do that and it is right that that freedom exists for the Bank of England, but the Conservative party never had the guts to introduce it, as they had to have control to fool the electorate repeatedly and bribe them by saying "We should not take this measure now, but we need to deal now with taxes, interest rates and the retail price index." At each general election, they had to buy off the public. In the end, the public saw through that approach and showed that they cannot be bought off with short-termism. That is what we are hearing today—short-termism and a failure to look to the long term. People are looking only at what affects us today.

Let us consider the long term and Britain's overall performance. It is uncharacteristically unfair of the Opposition to say that Britain is in doom and gloom and is about to be in a slough of despond. Nothing could be further from the truth. Let us consider some fair comparisons. On every economic indicator, Britain performs well against all its major competitors. It is easy for the Opposition to denigrate the Japanese performance, but let us remember Japan's position in the past. It was the envy of the world and it had the economy to which we all aspired, but now that economy has slumped. Have no lessons been learned from that?

Mr. Flight rose—

Kali Mountford: I see that the hon. Gentleman is twitching in his seat.

Mr. Flight: I thank the hon. Lady for giving way. Does she have any worries at all about the crowding out of the private sector, which produces the money and wealth to pay for the public sector, after we have seen a halving of the stock market in the past three years?

Kali Mountford: The hon. Gentleman raises a very interesting point. Indeed, it is a point that I raised when the Labour party was in opposition. At a party conference, I expressed concern about the same issue with regard to the then leader of the Conservative party, Margaret Thatcher. At that time, we saw absolutely desperate measures being taken, and she told us that we were going to be the shopkeepers of the world and that that was how we would support our economy. I could not understand how an economy based on only one strand of activity could possibly be successful and believed that it would be wrong to let all the manufacturing base simply dwindle away.

Two parts of the manufacturing base are under particular stress—textiles and steel. It is false to say that the whole of manufacturing is declining at the same rate or that it is declining only in the UK. We must consider the whole world economy and the changing economic base. We must look at the new industries, which are not only service industries. In the 1980s and 1990s, I was terribly worried about the growth rate of hotels and the disappearance of the steel and coal industries. Perhaps Opposition Members should be giving us some lessons about what they did wrong at that time, but in similar circumstances, we must ask what is different today.

Let us consider new measures and issues such as the amount of equity release, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield and was also part of the total collapse of the economy under the Tories, when house prices were fired above inflation so that people could not afford to keep up. What is different now is the stability that we have in the economy. We do not have the soaring interest rates of 15 or 20 per cent., the rocketing inflation rates or the massive unemployment that we used to have. We have greater confidence in people's own abilities to sustain themselves, and that matters a great deal. If we keep talking down people's confidence and the confidence in the markets, and if we keep talking down Britain, that will become a self-fulfilling prophesy. It is madness, if we look around the world today and see how Britain is faring, even against the strongest economies such as the United States and Germany—

Dr. Fox: Germany!

Kali Mountford: The hon. Gentleman is disparaging Germany, but I seem to recall that it is one of the G7 countries, and one of the four biggest economies in the world. It is another economy that we once aspired to be like, along with that of Japan.

Mr. Howard: Is the hon. Lady seriously suggesting that we want to aspire to be like the German economy? In its latest unemployment figures, 400,000 more people were put out of work, and nearly 5 million people are out of work altogether. Its growth forecasts have recently been reduced so that they show barely any growth at all. Is the hon. Lady seriously suggesting that we should aspire to be like the German economy?

Kali Mountford: I realise that the shadow Chancellor never really wants to hear anything that I say, and that he has probably been half asleep while I have been speaking. I was saying that we used to aspire to be like countries such as Germany and Japan, but we now fare far better than them. They had the strongest economies in the world, but they are now a long way behind the United Kingdom. [Interruption.] The right hon. and learned Gentleman obviously does not want to hear this, but the UK economy is stronger than the German economy. During his time in government, however, it certainly was not. That is my point.

Mr. Flight: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Kali Mountford: How can I resist?

Mr. Flight: I thank the hon. Lady for giving way. May I ask her for her views on why the German economy has gone off the rails so much? Will she not concede that part of the problem is that the private sector has withered because the burdens that have been put on it have been too great for it to sustain growth under them?

Kali Mountford: The hon. Gentleman is forgetting the great number of people who went to Germany after the Berlin wall was pulled down, which was an effort for peace that we all wanted but which had a great economic impact on the German economy. There were outflows from that. Every country has to go through the economic cycle and, to be fair to the German economy, it is at the downward end of its economic cycle now. That is one of the problems for convergence, because the cycles simply do not match up at the moment.

Roger Casale: Does my hon. Friend share my surprise that this Opposition day debate has been called one week after interest rates were cut to their lowest level in 50 years, and on the very day on which unemployment figures have fallen by 36,000 to a new historic low? That is the day on which the Opposition have chosen to discuss the Government's failure in economic management.

Kali Mountford: The key fact that my hon. Friend mentioned is the job figures. A Conservative Member tried to imply earlier that the new jobs in the economy were somehow detracting from the manufacturing sector, and that they were poor, part-time jobs that nobody really wanted. But we have to consider those jobs against the background of average earnings. Earnings have risen year on year over the last few years. In the public sector, earnings have risen by 5.7 per cent.

in the last year. I do not call that peanuts. In the economy as a whole, earnings have risen by 4.9 per cent. If those jobs were rubbish, we would not be seeing that level of increase in overall earnings.

Mr. Bercow: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Kali Mountford: If I must.

Mr. Bercow: I am very grateful. Given that the hon. Lady referred earlier to housing, what assessment has she made of the effect of the change, during the last Parliament, in the rules on the use of capital receipts from the sale of council houses on the size of interest repayments on local authority debt?

Kali Mountford: The hon. Gentleman is digging a hole for himself. I was a member of a council at a time when capital receipts were not allowed to be spent on housing in any way, shape or form.

Mr. Bercow: Debt?

Kali Mountford: If the hon. Gentleman will let me finish, I will tell him that the whole point of housing receipts was that they ought to have been ploughed back into housing. This Government have insisted that, at the very least, that money should be released for investment in social housing and, most importantly, in improving the quality of that housing.

Mr. Laws: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Kali Mountford: I have not quite finished my point, but since the hon. Gentleman and I have been old friends on the Select Committee, I cannot resist him this time.

Mr. Laws: I am most grateful to the hon. Lady. I agree that it is important that the receipts from the sales of social housing should be able to be reinvested. Is she not, however, somewhat concerned and embarrassed that, since her Government came to power in 1997, the number of social housing starts and completions has halved from the level at which it stood in 1996–97?

Kali Mountford: I point the hon. Gentleman to the Local Government Bill that is going through Parliament now, and to the housing strategy that has been announced by my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister. I would be embarrassed if that money had not been invested in improvements to the housing stock, over whose deterioration Conservative Members presided. If we do not invest in housing—in terms not only of numbers but of quality—there will be no social housing available and nobody would want to live in it anyway.

It is an important aspect of the economy that we get the housing strategy right. While there is scope for more house building, we must also look at properties that are hard to let because they are in undesirable areas or simply empty because people have moved out to new areas. That relates to some of the differences in the growth of the economy between one area and another, which we need to look at. We need to ensure that prosperity is spread equally and fairly across the whole economy, through all sectors and regions and to all people.

I cannot imagine that the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) would agree with the Conservatives' strategy for improvement. I am sorry to embarrass the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) again, but that strategy includes a 20 per cent. cut across the board. That simply does not cut it with me. At one point, I even heard a Conservative Member argue that that 20 per cent. cut would be implemented only on Government services. Well, we have been there before, and I have been there before in this speech. Would a cut in public services that related only to bureaucrats—these supposedly sinister creatures of the night—imply that their jobs were not worth while? Are the Conservatives seriously saying that civil servants do not do a good job? As an ex-civil servant, I do not think that that is the case.

I simply do not believe that the proposed 20 per cent. cut would be aimed only at those bureaucrats. It would have to be aimed at the people who keep the whole system running. It would have to be aimed at the local education authorities. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] I am simply considering bureaucrats here, so as to be helpful. Let us consider the managers of our primary care trusts. Now, there is a reform and a half that the right hon. and learned Gentleman never even dreamt of. If we are looking at reform, and at spending money wisely, we could do no worse than to point to that. With a 20 per cent. cut, the primary care trusts would not have the money to spend on their managers—the people who keep their drug budgets down and who invest wisely in their patients' future.

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme): My hon. Friend has obviously read her John Maynard Keynes. Does she agree that under the Chancellor's handling of the economy we have been prudent in squirreling away capital receipts for a rainy day—the proceeds of the mobile phone auctions, for example—whereas the Conservatives not only squandered those receipts, but counted them, using dubious accounting, as negative expenditure?

Kali Mountford: My hon. Friend is right. When we have sunshine we squirrel money away, and when we have a rainy day it is there to spend. We are now seeing expenditure in the form of largesse of which Conservative Members would never have dreamed. Moreover, going by what we have heard today, they would not have approved of it and certainly do not aspire to it. Conservative Members do not want to invest in public sector services. Clearly, they do not believe in Keynesian economics, but even if they did I expect that they would get it wrong.

I congratulate the Chancellor on getting this country through some stormy waters in difficult times. That is something of which to be proud, not to denigrate, as Conservative Members continually do.

3.30 pm

Mr. David Cameron (Witney): I draw the House's attention to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests.

I am pleased to take part in the debate and to follow the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Kali Mountford). She spoke with great passion and at some length, but I enjoyed listening to her. It has been a controversial and heated debate; I fear that my contribution may be slightly less so. I intend to be constructive by trying to solve a genuine mystery—where has all the money gone? In our experiences in our constituencies, we have all seen a large amount of Government money being spent, yet, although there have been some improvements, performance in many public services has remained flat or, in some cases, has gone down. My right hon. and learned Friend the shadow Chancellor gave the most telling figure of the debate—in the past two years, there has been a 22 per cent. increase in health spending, but a mere 1.6 per cent. increase in activity.

Andy Burnham: On that figure concerning NHS productivity, does the hon. Gentleman accept that the biggest problem that the NHS faced in 1997 was a lack of capacity in buildings and in human resources, and that making those investments does not necessarily lead to an increase in patient outcomes? Will he address that specific point? Conservative Members have mentioned it at least four or five times, but it is facile rubbish.

Mr. Cameron: I shall come to that. A particular problem in the health service, especially in the south of England, concerns the number of nurses. That is the key factor, and it has to be got right.

Here are my three reasons why I believe that money is being wasted. First, we have heard the Chancellor say many times that resources must be backed by reform. Conservative Members would all say that we agree with that, but the question is, what reform? There have been loads of changes in the health service—the primary care trusts, which are now being repackaged and reformulated, the Commission for Health Improvement, and a billion quangos—but have they been the right ones? Take the NHS in Oxfordshire, where the problem centres on nurse shortages. In the John Radcliffe hospital, which serves my constituency, there is a shortage of 400 nurses and a 14 per cent. vacancy rate. The effect of that is cancelled operations. Many constituents come to my surgery having had their operations cancelled six or seven times. There are queues in the accident and emergency department, and our trust is one of the places where patients are being kept in ambulances outside the hospital. We also have bed blocking. Older people who should go into homes in the community cannot because their care packages cannot be put together. What is the problem? A shortage of nurses. Why is there a shortage of nurses? Because in the south-east the cost of living is much higher and we cannot retain them.

Phil Hope: If the hon. Gentleman's criticism is that there are insufficient nurses in Oxfordshire, can he explain how a 20 per cent. cut in spending on the health service will resolve that problem?

Mr. Cameron: As I sat down I thought that it might be a mistake to give way to the hon. Gentleman—now I am certain. If he has been listening to the debate and it has stayed in the gap between his ears for long enough, he should know that we are not committed to a 20 per cent. cut across the board—we are looking for savings.

If the extra money cannot go into extra pay for nurses in areas that need to retain nurses, the money simply will not work. I speak from experience, because my son has been ill and I have spent two of the past 10 months in various hospitals in Oxfordshire and London. The John Radcliffe hospital in Oxford has a superb staff who do a fantastic job. Money is being invested in it. The accident and emergency department has been closed, the temporary department is much better and the new one will be even better. However, delays persist because the hospital does not have enough nurses. The number of entry points to accident and emergency does not matter; if the nurses are not there to process the patients, the problem cannot be solved.

I shall give the hon. Member for Corby (Phil Hope) another example, from a conversation with a male nurse in Great Ormond Street hospital. I was on my way to Health questions and I asked him what he would like me to ask the Secretary of State if I was called. He wanted me to ask about the appalling waste of money on agency nurses. He said, "They cost this hospital hundreds of thousands of pounds. They're far more expensive than normal nurses. It's an absolute scandal and not nearly enough has been said about it." I asked how he knew so much about the subject. He replied, "I am an agency nurse. I'm doing quite well out of it, but the amount of money being spent is scandalous."

I shall relate one more story from my experience. I had to go to the accident and emergency department at St. Mary's, Paddington—a hospital in the centre of London—with my son at about 11 pm. I waited seven hours. We were not in the children's accident and emergency department because a shortage of nurses means that it does not open at night. After sitting there for seven hours, we were offered a bed. None was free in the whole of central London; the nearest was in Guildford.

Shortage of nurses is the problem in south-east London. The extra money will not work unless we have different rates of pay in different parts of the country. [HON. MEMBERS: "More money."] It means more money in some parts of the country. However, the key element is more freedom. We must give all hospitals, not simply 12 foundation hospitals, the freedom to respond to their needs.

In the remaining four minutes, I want to draw hon. Members' attention to another example of wasted money and no improvements. It is a microcosm of the debate. In some places, more spending does not lead to a better or even a level outcome. It can lead to a worse outcome. The NHS has experienced problems with care homes, and the new regulations have led to the closure of several. To give the Government their due, they have listened and intend to make some changes, which may have an impact.

No one, however, has paid attention to the effect of regulation on adult placements in the community. In Oxfordshire, 100 adult placement carers take vulnerable adults into their homes. They are like foster parents. They are heroes and heroines, who do a fantastic job. They are paid a modest amount of money and they keep vulnerable adults, who often have mental health problems, physical handicaps or have been in care, out of the care system. They do a great job.

[Mr. Cameron]

Until now, county council social services departments regulated the carers. The departments interviewed them for 40 hours and inspected them every year. That system worked well. In Oxford, 100 adult placement carers look after approximately 250 people. The Government, armed with all the new money, set up the National Care Standards Commission and introduced the Care Standards Act 2000. As well as care homes, the commission has to regulate adult placement carers.

First, the carers must read a document that is approximately an inch thick and pay for the privilege of registering. They subsequently have to read a 75-page document entitled, "Care homes for younger adults in adult placements". I remind hon. Members that we are considering people who look after vulnerable adults in a loving family atmosphere in their homes, not care homes. The carers must also read the regulations, which comprise 27 pages. They have to plough though 142 pages simply to be regulated.

It is unsurprising that several of the 100 carers who take in vulnerable adults are giving up the ghost. A letter from Oxfordshire county council states:

"At the time I last wrote to you on this subject, an adult placement carer had resigned from the scheme and many more were expressing unhappiness about the changes arising from the introduction of the Care Standards Act 2000. I am afraid that the tally has risen further and 13 carers have now either withdrawn from the scheme altogether or have reduced the categories of care they are willing to provide in order to avoid the implications of registration and inspection by the National Care Standards Commission."

Paul Farrelly rose—

Mr. John MacDougall (Central Fife) rose—

Mr. Cameron: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman who used to work for The Observer.

Paul Farrelly: Before we explore every nook and cranny of Witney, let me take the hon. Gentleman back to his initial question. He asked where all the money had gone. Given the public debt that we inherited in 1997 and the state of the public infrastructure, will he explain what happened to the windfall from privatisation and North sea oil under previous Conservative Administrations?

Mr. Cameron: The hon. Gentleman would probably have done better to stay at The Observer.

An easy answer is available to the Government. They need only tell those running adult placement schemes, "You do not have to be regulated by the National Care Standards Commission; the arrangement works perfectly well when managed by social services departments". If the Government do not do that, they will find that in this and other areas all their extra spending will be devoted to extra bureaucracy, extra publications, extra documents, extra inspections—and no extra services. Indeed, in some instances, such as the one I have given, services will actually get worse.

3.40 pm

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): It is clear from the debate that some things are beyond dispute. That the Government have taxed more and that the Government have spent more cannot be disputed by anyone with any objective sense. The question is this: why have the Government failed to deliver? Today the Opposition have first tried to reveal areas in which the Government have failed to deliver, and then suggested reasons for that failure.

The debate began with a forensic dissection by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), the shadow Chancellor, of the Government's failures to handle the economy. He mentioned the unpredicted deterioration in the public finances, the disastrous state of our manufacturing sector, the fear that grips the business community in regard to our economic prospects, and the long-term suffering that older people will endure as a result of the Chancellor's pension theft. Robert Maxwell's pension theft was a national scandal; the Chancellor has made it a part of central Government policy.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) told us that more regulation, higher taxes, more bureaucrats and greater waste led to a weaker economy and poorer public services. He depicted the Chancellor as the destroyer of pensions. He spoke of the Chancellor's failure to build on the success of the Conservatives' telecommunications revolution, and dismissed the disastrous sale of gold that has cost the British taxpayer more than £750 million. It did my heart good to listen to my right hon. Friend. Far too many Conservatives readily accept criticism of failures in office; too few are willing to accept responsibility for our many achievements.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) rightly spoke of the golden inheritance received by new Labour. Never had a Government come to office, he said, at a time of more favourable economic trends. As he also said, despite that—and despite two overwhelmingly good parliamentary majorities—the Government have achieved very little during their time in office.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) pointed out, the shortage of nurses, the huge vacancy rates, the cancelled operations and the level of bed blocking are indicative of a mismatch between supply and demand in relation to NHS staff, especially nursing staff. That in itself points to the need for substantial reform. As my hon. Friend said, flexible pay arrangements are needed, but there are other ways of attracting nursing staff. We need to think about shift flexibility, the physical security of staff—all staff, that is, not just nurses—training and supervision, and professional freedom and self-respect. In the case of the nursing profession, that means not using surgically trained or gynaecology nurses in general medical wards, but affording them the respect that they are entitled to expect given their expertise.

One of the most enlightening speeches was made by the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor). As usual, he had his finger on the pulse of public sector failure. He said, "We found out today that thousands of old people are waiting for discharge in our hospitals." He must be one of the last people in Britain to discover that; only Liberal Democrats could be surprised by it.

What really galled me about the hon. Gentleman's performance, however, was this. It is clear that the Liberal Democrats will tell one group that taxes are too high, and will tell others that they should be raised. They will tell one group that spending needs to increase, and as the Chancellor said, they will write to another group saying that it does not need to increase at all. They tell one group that they are the party of the inner city; they tell another that they are the party of the country. They are pro-war; they are anti-war. They are for free nursing care, but they will raise the cost of nursing care when they are in charge of local government. The fact that the once great Liberal party has descended into the second-rate charlatan collective that the Liberal Democrats are today is indeed a national tragedy.

My hon. Friends have drawn attention to Labour's failures on a number of fronts—education, for instance. The hon. Member for Colne Valley (Kali Mountford) talked a great deal about literacy and numeracy, but according to the 2002 survey one child in four now leaves school unable to read, write or count properly. These pupils are leaving primary school after six years of her Government's being in office, so talk of incremental change is complete nonsense. In GCSEs, the gap between children in inner cities and elsewhere is actually growing, according to a departmental survey of December 2002. Only 39 per cent. of children are getting grade C or above in maths, English and science.

On law and order, the Prime Minister said that "crime figures are the measure of whether this Government is succeeding or failing".

In the year to September 2002, overall crime was up by 2 per cent. Robberies were up by 13 per cent., domestic burglaries by 5 per cent., retail crime by 6 per cent., and drug offences by 12 per cent. In the past year, crimes involving the use of firearms were up by 35 per cent., and those involving the use of handguns by 46 per cent. The number of robberies involving the use of firearms increased by one third in the past year, and such robberies are at their highest level for more than a decade. Crimes involving the use of firearms are up by 80 per cent. since Labour came to power in 1997. How can there be any doubt about their failure to deliver on public services?

Transport is a complete shambles. So far, the Government's answer to making the trains run on time is to cut the number of trains running. Well, that is an act of genius. The London underground is a complete debacle. The Government do not know whether to build more roads or to have fewer of them, and they cannot seem to make up their mind whether to build more airports, or to have fewer of them. Today, they have tried very hard to distance themselves from the soon-to-be-hated congestion charge, which is a direct result of their Transport Act 2000.

We need to look not only at the failure to reform, but at the reason behind it, which is to be found in the contradictions within the Government themselves. As I have pointed out, the Prime Minister said:

"Choice mechanisms enhance equity by exerting pressure on low quality or incompetent providers. Competitive pressures and incentives drive up quality, efficiency and responsiveness in the public sector."

How far can that possibly be from the Chancellor's view, as expressed in his speech to the Social Market Foundation? In it, he said:

"In health not only is the consumer not sovereign but a free market in health care will not produce the most efficient price for its services or a fair deal for its consumer."

These views are not compatible, but at least the clear difference that has emerged in the war of No. 10 succession—in the axis of acrimony—is far better than the confused position of the Secretary of State for Health. He began by saying that he would "come down like a ton of bricks on anyone who has anything to do with the private sector".

Now, not only does he use the private finance initiative at every opportunity; he also wants to establish foundation hospitals, with the freedom to borrow and to set pay and conditions. As a concordat with the private sector, he is using private hospitals for NHS patients, and he wants to put private management into failing NHS hospitals. That is rather striking when one compares it with what he said in this House on 26 June 2001:

"by and large, we thankfully have one monopoly provider and that is the NHS. As long as a Labour Government are in power, that will remain the position."—[Official Report, 26 June 2001; Vol. 370, c. 500.]

Little wonder that we cannot get proper reform, and that there is no impetus for real change in the public sector, when there is such a division of ideology and philosophy on the Government Front Bench. The Cabinet fight like ferrets in a sack. They cannot sit on the same platform, and now it is more a question of who is likely to succeed the Prime Minister, rather than what is best for the country. We are all victims of the proxy war in the battle for No. 10.

We have heard several times today about the statistics that are most damning in respect of the national health service. Despite a 21.5 per cent. increase in real-terms funding in the past two years, the level of finished consultant episodes has increased by only 1.5 per cent., and the number of patients admitted to our hospitals actually went down last year by 0.5 per cent. It takes quite a lot of doing to spend that amount of money and get fewer patients into hospitals.

No one doubts the need for greater capacity or the Government's genuine commitment to achieving it. However, before any Government spend the tax that they are taking away from hard-working people, they have a duty to ensure that it is wisely spent. The NHS remains too centralised, too politicised, and too bureaucratised, and there is too much waste. The NHS is a victim of the target culture, and there is too little choice. There is an incipient crisis in general practice, for which vacancies have risen by 70 per cent. in the past year. Indeed, the number of applicants for each place has fallen by 50 per cent. in that time.

The Chancellor has had a good political run, but his own share price is falling. No. 10 and No. 11 may be very close to each other geographically, but the distance politically can be very great indeed. The Government need to remember that they have no money but taxpayers' money. Anyone can spend more money—spending it well is much more difficult. The Labour Government believe that the state can make better choices than individual citizens. We believe that citizens make better choices than the state. Labour believes that the state is the best manager for public services. We believe that the state is an inappropriate and poor manager for public services.

The Labour Government believe that Whitehall knows best; they believe in standardisation, centralisation, taxation, taxation, taxation and taxation. We believe in personal choice. We believe in diversity. We believe in innovation. We believe in excellence. We believe in trusting individual citizens. Enough is enough.

3.50 pm

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Paul Boateng): This has been a good debate, with excellent speeches from my hon. Friends the Members for Corby (Phil Hope), for Gedling (Vernon Coaker) and for Colne Valley (Kali Mountford). My hon. Friends the Member for Preston (Mr. Hendrick) and for Central Fife (Mr. MacDougall) were desperate to contribute, but there was not enough time.

How different my hon. Friends were from Opposition Members! They called the debate to talk about the economy and public services, but they failed to call in their Back Benchers. At 2.36 pm, during the speech of the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), I, too, did some counting. We all remember his speech and the 10 catastrophic failures. I counted seven: three behind him and four directly in front of him on the Opposition Front Bench. The reality is that Conservative Members failed to come to the House this afternoon because they are either indifferent or ashamed. They are ashamed of their party's record when it was in government: 3 million unemployed, interest rates at 10 per cent. and inflation at almost 10 per cent.

We do not need to look only at the Conservatives' record in government; let us consider their record when they were—as they are now and as they will remain—in opposition. They opposed the independence of the Bank of England; they opposed the new deal; and they opposed the minimum wage, yet they have the nerve to take us to task on our economic competence and the stewardship of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor.

The Conservatives want to talk about public services. Let us talk about public services. What is their position? What is their record on the NHS? They opposed the NHS at its inception and they oppose its principles today—the very principles that we are pledged to stand up for. Those principles are stability, enterprise and fairness and they characterise the Labour Government's stewardship of the economy and of our public services—[HON. MEMBERS: "Enterprise?"] Yes, enterprise. We are supporting enterprise at a time when the world economy is uncertain. We supported enterprise when world trade growth fell by 12 percentage points in 2001 and when 20 of the world's largest economies were either in recession or just coming out of recession. We are doing so at a time when there are real risks and uncertainty, yet at this time and in this country we have GDP growth. At this time and in this country, we have the macro-economic stability that truly gives businesses what they want: the certainty that they have a Government who are on their side.

Mr. Redwood: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Boateng: No. The hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) did not give way during his summing up, so I shall not do so during mine.

Macro-economic stability is not enough on its own; we have to do more. This Government are doing more to bridge the productivity gap. It is this Government who are targeting reforms at improving the productivity of British business. It was this Government who introduced independent competition authorities. It was this Government who ensured that we had a simplified VAT system. It was this Government who introduced the research and development tax credit. It was this Government who extended to all companies better education and improved work force training. We are entitled to be proud of that.

In November, in the pre-Budget report, we introduced policies that will combine enterprise with fairness. Yes, we believe in enterprise; we are the party of enterprise. In deprived areas, classrooms or boardrooms, the message is the same: "Yes, we can do better, but the Government are there to help and the Government are on your side".

Let us recall the Conservative record on public services. Under the Conservatives, crime doubled; the hospital building programme ground to a halt; eyesight testing charges were introduced; and education funding was cut by £80 per pupil in real terms in their last three Budgets—and they presided over a massive backlog in transport investment.

Conservative Members ask what has happened to the money and what has been going on in the NHS. There has been a 4.9 per cent. increase in elective admissions; a 3.2 per cent increase in outpatient consultation; an 11 per cent increase in patients admitted to hospital since 1997–98; waiting times are coming down; more people are benefiting from new drugs; and more patients are being treated closer to home. That is what we are doing for the NHS. If Conservative Members had their way, all that would come to an end.

Of the extra £5 billion in 2001–02, 40 per cent. was used to pay for additional staff, drugs, supplies, increased activity and the quality of activity; and 14 per cent. was invested in building capacity for the future, which the Conservatives never did. They simply tore down the present. We are delivering; they failed to deliver. In all the contributions by Conservative Members this afternoon, we heard not one constructive suggestion on how they would do better.

Equally important, we have not heard one suggestion either about how a Conservative Government would pay, which is why the hon. Member for Woodspring wound up. The Opposition did not dare let the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) speak. He had to fight his way to the Dispatch Box by way of an intervention. They would not let him speak because of what he had told not only selected groups of journalists but the readers of any newspaper whose journalists were prepared to interview him.

Mr. Howard: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Boateng: I will not give way but I challenge the shadow Chancellor to disown his phantom Chief Secretary—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. We must hear the conclusion of this debate in reasonable silence.

Mr. Boateng: Will the shadow Chancellor disown the comments of the phantom Chief Secretary? Will he publish the memorandum? If not and he will not let us see the figures, we cannot believe a word he says.

Mr. Howard: Has it occurred to the Chief Secretary that this debate is about the Government's failure over the economy and public services? Does he not realise that whereas my hon. Friend the shadow Health Secretary and I are happy to share this debate, the hon. Gentleman cannot get the Secretary of State for Health and the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the same room—except when they meet to squabble in Cabinet?

Mr. Boateng: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman answer the question? Will he respond to the challenge? This is what the phantom Chief Secretary said: "Oh yes, we are certainly looking at sayings." The Leader of the Opposition said, "We are looking at savings." That is exactly what was said by the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs.

David Maclean (Penrith and The Border) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, That the original words stand part of the Question:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House notes that as a result of this Government's economic management, even in times of global economic uncertainty when the world economy is experiencing the first simultaneous downturn for nearly thirty years and twenty of the world's biggest economies including the United States, Japan, Asia, much of Latin America and Europe have been or are in recession, the UK economy continues to grow with low levels of inflation and low interest rates; welcomes the 1.5 million extra jobs created since 1997 and resists any attempts to abolish the New Deal and the tax credits that make work pay; further welcomes the cuts in the rates of corporation tax, capital gains tax and small business corporation tax since 1997 and the introduction of the R&D tax credit; and believes that after years of neglect between 1979 and 1997 it is even more important to invest in public services and to support the Government's record extra investment in Britain's health, education and other public services combined with reform to build high quality public services for all and its resistance to any attempt at this time of global uncertainty to cut public spending.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Not three hours ago I raised a point of order with Mr. Speaker, in which I pointed out that the chairman of the Labour party had made very strong statements about the problems that gave rise to the action at Heathrow. Not very long after I raised that point of order, the chairman of the Labour party appeared on the radio again, not in this House, and made statements that appear to contradict his earlier statement. That is a very serious matter.

We are dealing with life and death. It seems appropriate that there should be clarity. Conservative Members support the actions that the Government are taking. We want to have the opportunity to ensure that, in a sober-minded fashion, the nation can hear a clear account. Have you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, received from Ministers any request to make a statement about this matter?

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As you will be aware, my constituency lies directly to the west of Heathrow, under the flight path, and a large number of my constituents work either at Heathrow or for various airlines. There is immense confusion after the contradictory statements from the chairman of the Labour party. Whereas my constituents and I do not expect detailed information that might be security sensitive, I would ask you whether you have yet received any request for any clarification to be made at this very difficult time, which is what my constituents would want?

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Mr. Speaker has on many occasions deprecated Ministers' making outside the House statements that should have been made in it. It is a folly that is compounded when contradictory statements are made. Would you be kind enough to have a word with Mr. Speaker? I realise that he cannot summon a Minister to make a statement, but could the concern that is felt both in the House and in the country, with people feeling exceptionally confused and worried, be reflected in a message to Ministers, so that before the House rises tonight we have a statement of clarification?

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I understand that other hon. Members will have local concerns, and the whole House obviously has deep concern over what is acknowledged on all sides to be a grave matter, but, as has already been recognised in one of the points of order, the Chair cannot dictate when a Minister of the Crown should come to the House.

I am aware that the Government gave a commitment some while ago that they would keep the House informed. I am sure that they will have heard what right hon. and hon. Members have said, and I imagine that this matter could further be pursued through the usual channels.

The straight answer is that the Chair has not received any indication as of now that there is to be any further ministerial statement in the course of this sitting day.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Just for clarification and to help the House, which I know you want to do, when you say that the Chair has no power, is it not the case that, procedurally, if the Speaker granted an urgent question on the matter, the Minister would be obliged to give an account of events to the House? That and perhaps other procedures are available to the House and the Speaker for us to ensure that we hear about vital matters from Ministers rather than hearing contradictory accounts on the radio or, indeed, anywhere else.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The right hon. Gentleman is correct that that procedure exists, but it cannot apply at this point in the sitting day. There is a time when submissions can be made to Mr. Speaker, which he considers totally impartially and on which he reaches a decision. It is open to any right hon. or hon. Member to make such a request to be considered at the next opportune time.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You probably recall that the IRA terrorist attack on Heathrow was mounted from my constituency and that the aircraft involved in the last crash at Heathrow came down in my constituency, so you can guess how my constituents feel at the moment. I have been trying all day to get information that I can convey to my constituents to reassure them about what is going on so that they know that their interests are being looked after. Is there any way at all that my constituents, who are rightly worried by what is happening, can get some information from someone? If we cannot get a Minister to the House, can you suggest how else we can get some facts?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman's concern is perfectly understandable bearing in mind the geographical placing of his constituency, but I cannot add to my ruling. I am sure that the concerns that are felt will be reflected in the Government's thinking and no doubt in the mind of Mr. Speaker if he is called on to adjudicate on another request for an urgent question.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Do you think that Mr. Speaker would be more minded to grant an urgent question tomorrow bearing in mind the fact that the co-operation of hon. Members on both sides of the House is essential on matters of security and intelligence, so the Government's behaviour should be of a higher standard than is usually the case in the party political situation?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I cannot possibly anticipate how Mr. Speaker will react to any such matter that is put to him. I do know, however, that he will give it sober and impartial consideration. We must now move on.

HUNTING BILL (PROGRAMME) (NO. 2)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Orders [28 June 2001 and 29 October 2002],

That, in accordance with the Resolution of the Standing Committee of 11th February 2003, the programme order of 16th December 2002 in relation to the Hunting Bill be amended as follows—

In paragraph 2 of the order, for '13th February' substitute '27th February'.—[Mr. Derek Twigg.]

Question agreed to.

Orders of the Day
Income Tax (Earnings and Pensions) Bill

As amended in the Joint Committee, considered.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That the Committee of the whole House be discharged from considering the Bill.—[Dawn Primarolo.]

Question agreed to.

Order for Third Reading read.

[Relevant document: The First Report from the Joint Committee on Tax Law Rewrite Bills, Session 2002–03, on the Income Tax (Earnings and Pensions) Bill, HC 287—I.]

4.33 pm

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I am pleased to open the Third Reading debate on a Bill that rewrites income tax rules on employment income, pensions and taxable social security benefits. It has been produced by the tax law rewrite project, which is a long-term undertaking to modernise direct tax legislation so that it is clearer and easier to use. Before dealing with the specifics of the Bill itself, it may be helpful if I explain a little about the work of the project.

The project was set up in 1996 to rewrite most of the direct tax law, currently running at more than 7,000 pages of legislation enacted over the past 200 years. The key aim of the project is to produce rewritten legislation that is acceptable by all the main users as clearer and easier to apply. While making measures more accessible, the project takes a great deal of care to preserve the effect of the present legislation apart from minor agreed changes.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): I wonder whether the right hon. Lady can help me. She said that the project reflects the 1996 announcement to rewrite tax rules over many years. How up to date is it? Has it taken into account all the new taxes that the Government have imposed on the British people?

Dawn Primarolo: The project was started in 1996 by the previous Administration and the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), and is supported by the Government. The answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is yes—both the Capital Allowances Act 2001 considered by the House two years ago and the Bill cover all the legislation to date. If he cares to scrutinise the Committee proceedings, he will find some interesting debate on the more unusual measures that the previous Government introduced into our tax system. I am sure that he is waiting with bated breath to read that as his essential bedtime reading.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester): I am sure that there have been failings by Members on both sides of the House in the past. However, was the Inland Revenue asked to provide a full compliance cost assessment of each measure while, at the same time, looking at the way in which they could be rewritten? Will the right hon. Lady put that full compliance cost into the public domain? Having looked at the matter, has she concluded that the best way to simplify the burden of dealing with those forms is not merely to rewrite them but to simplify the tax system itself?

Dawn Primarolo: On this occasion, it is not for me to criticise the previous Government on its foresight in establishing the tax law rewrite. As the hon. Gentleman will know, it is precisely that—a rewrite of the current tax legislation. The question of tax simplification, which the House has discussed many times, and will do so again in future because of its importance to the tax debate, is a separate issue. The hon. Gentleman asked about compliance cost assessment. As a measure in the new format, the Bill has to undergo an assessment on compliance costs. That information was available to the House on Second Reading and in Committee and is included in the explanatory notes. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is pleased that there will be negligible compliance costs, if any. Because the increased compliance is so small it is impossible to measure. However, there is considerable evidence from everyone who was consulted that the new legislation is easier to understand and therefore less of a burden on taxpayers.

Several hon. Members rose—

Dawn Primarolo: I am happy to give way, but I hope that hon. Members will look at the tax law rewrite, rather than extend it into a wider debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The right hon. Lady has a number of hon. Members from whom to choose.

Dawn Primarolo: What an enviable position to be in! While not wishing to detain the House, perhaps we should work through them one by one. I shall give way to the hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban).

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham): On the issue of compliance costs, given that the Bill is the second measure to come before the House from the Joint Committee on tax law rewrite Bills, what research has the Treasury done on the beneficial effects of the first measure, the Capital Allowances Act 2001?

Dawn Primarolo: I do not have the regulatory impact assessment of that Act with me, although it has already been discussed and passed by the House. However, I can make sure that a copy is sent to the hon. Gentleman. I draw his attention to the regulatory impact assessment accompanying the Bill, which is one of the papers available to the House today and will answer his questions. On capital allowances, he will know as well as I do of the enormous relief, amounting to many billions of pounds, that they provide for businesses.

Several hon. Members rose—

Dawn Primarolo: I shall give way to the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell), as I am pleased to see him back in the House again.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield): I thank the Paymaster General for that kind endorsement from the Labour party, which I shall bring to the attention of my constituents at a subsequent election.

I strongly support the rewrite Committee and the work that the Paymaster General and her colleagues are doing. Of course, as she said, the project was set up by the last Conservative Government. Clearly, the rewrite is enormously technical and involves a lot of practitioners in the City and elsewhere. How does she go about ensuring full consultation with all interested parties and with practitioners in particular? Will she tell us whom she consults, and on what basis and how she consults them?

Dawn Primarolo: In giving way to the hon. Gentleman, I said that I was pleased to see him back in the House on this occasion. I was not extending my remarks any further, much though I recognise that he may be an agreeable fellow.

I shall deal in my speech with the points that the hon. Gentleman raised about who was consulted and the consultation process. The point that underlies his question is extremely important. We must have very wide consultation. If the process is to achieve its objectives of being easy, clear and helpful to practitioners, the practitioners themselves must agree that that is the case.

Several hon. Members rose—

Dawn Primarolo: I shall give way first to the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight), who is sitting at the back, but I shall work back down the Opposition Benches and I shall not forget the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow).

Mr. Greg Knight: (East Yorkshire): I am most grateful to the Minister for giving way. Will she not keep us in suspense until later in her speech, but deal with a point that follows on from that which my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) raised? I notice from the Committee's minutes that, on 14 January, it ordered that > "The uncorrected transcript of the oral evidence together with the associated memorandum be published on the internet."

When were those details placed on the internet and are they still there? If so, can the Minister tell the House the URL—universal resource locator—for the internet page? Has provision been made to encourage public feedback? Those of us who are interested in pursuing more online consultation want the public to be encouraged to give their feedback on such issues via the internet.

Dawn Primarolo: At this precise moment, I cannot give the right hon. Gentleman the exact reference for which he asks.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) rose—

Dawn Primarolo: I should like to answer one question at a time, even though the hon. Gentleman might be trying to help me.

I shall ensure that I provide to the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) the information that he requests before the end of the debate. He is absolutely right in his comments, as the hallmark of the consultation on the Bill was that we continued the process even after the final drafts had been published to ensure that all possible corrections and errors could be put before the Committee. When I have given him the reference that he requests and he looks at the proceedings of the Committee, he will see that the Government had to table amendments even at the Committee stage to correct some aspects of the draft Bill. We will continue to pick up those issues.

The organisations that took part in the consultation are listed in volume 1 of the explanatory notes to the Bill: the Cardiff law school at Cardiff university, the Chartered Institute of Taxation, the City of London Law Society, the Confederation of British Industry, the construction industry joint taxation committee, Deloitte and Touche, Ernst and Young, Global Employment Solutions, the Holborn Law Society, ideasUK, the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland, the Institute of Directors, the Institute of Payroll and Pensions Management and John Jeffrey-Cook. Other representations came from KPMG, Mayer, Brown, Rowe and Maw, the share scheme lawyers group and the special committee of tax law consultative bodies. The list goes on; I shall not read all the names into the record, but they are there for the right hon. Gentleman to see.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien rose—

Dawn Primarolo: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman on the Front Bench first, as that is what I am required to do, but other hon. Gentlemen should not be too worried, as I shall give way to them as well.

Mr. O'Brien: I am most grateful to the Paymaster General for giving way. She has most helpfully read out a list of the many consultees that have been helpful and supportive in the project. In case it is of some help to her, I should like to point out that the URL that has just been requested is www.inlandrevenue.gov.uk/rewrite/index.htm.

Dawn Primarolo: I thank the hon. Gentleman for supplying that information to the House. That reinforces the point about cross-party support for the tax law rewrite project. The Special Committee procedure was chaired by the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke)—who very skilfully saw us through our Committee stages—and Lord Howe of Aberavon, who has been energetic and committed to this project for some time. If anything had been awry or not correct, or if the Government had been attempting to do anything in the Bill that they should not have been doing, I am absolutely confident that those two right hon. and learned Gentlemen, whose skills are enormous, would have spotted it.

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton): The right hon. Lady will be aware that the Inland Revenue's 2002–03 annual report on this project stated:

"The current volume of new legislation annually on direct tax means that the project is now operating in a very different environment from that in which it was conceived."

I am not entirely clear what that means. Does it mean that there are many more taxes being introduced now than in 1996? The report also says:

"This has made it all the harder to find and maintain resources for our work."

Will the Paymaster General confirm that those resources are being provided to the Inland Revenue?

Dawn Primarolo: I can confirm that the resources are being maintained and committed to the Inland Revenue tax law rewrite project. Indeed, if the hon. Gentleman reads our Second Reading debate in Hansard, he will see that the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe complimented the Government on continuing their commitment to ensuring that the tax law rewrite project would work through the programme of legislation. He also took note that, when the tax law rewrite project was announced in 1996, the then Government gave it five years in which to complete the review. He accepted, as did Lord Howe of Aberavon, that that was somewhat optimistic, but good progress is none the less being made in what continues to be a complex area of taxation, particularly in the international dimensions.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): I well recall the racy and intoxicating speech made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe on a previous occasion in a debate not dissimilar to this one. I am grateful to the right hon. Lady for confirming that the Government's 53 new taxes are included in the rewrite project, but will she tell the House—in the light of the 2,000 new clauses and schedules proposed by the Government over the last five years—whether a distillation and synthesis of the material is intended, such that there will be a reduction from the current 7,000 pages to something altogether more manageable?

Dawn Primarolo: It is part of the project to ensure that the legislation is easier to read, has shorter sentences, is easier to use, and has comprehensive signposts—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) is pleading for larger print. It is true, however, that a simpler explanation that is easier to use can sometimes be of greater length than the original. Above all, however, the tax law rewrite project enables us to remove legislation that is no longer needed but happens still to be on the statute book, so this is a win-win situation. The legislation is usable and, where possible, shorter, and redundant legislation is removed so as not to confuse the taxpayer.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): I have been listening intently to the Paymaster General's intentions regarding the simplification of the tax position that underlies the Bill. Surely the best way to simplify the tax situation is to abolish some of the taxes. The former Chancellor, Lord Lawson, made it a hallmark of his tenure of the chancellorship that he abolished a tax in each of his Budgets. Can the Paymaster General tell us how many taxes she or the Chancellor of the Exchequer have abolished over the past six years, in addition to the 53 extra taxes that her Government have created?

Dawn Primarolo: I stress to the hon. Gentleman that the tax law rewrite project is not about simplification as it is understood within the tax debate, but about ensuring that the existing legislation is easy to understand. I can give him one clear example; there are many. The Government removed the tax relief for private medical insurance, which a Government of his party would apparently want to add to the system. That relief was complex, expensive and made no progress at all in terms of its use. I venture to say to the hon. Gentleman that if he suggested to business that the Government should remove capital allowances from the statute book—

Tim Loughton: Taxes.

Dawn Primarolo: Well, he needs to be clear. The tax system and its complexity is made up of many areas. People want relief when it will help them, despite the fact that it brings complexity, but do not want complexity if the relief goes to someone else.

Mr. Bercow rose—

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) rose—

Dawn Primarolo: I have already given way to the hon. Member for Buckingham, so I shall be fair to the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), who is rising for the first time.

Mr. Cameron: I am grateful to the Paymaster General for giving way. I am enjoying this debate more than some of us may have expected. Given that the rewrite has been delayed, can the right hon. Lady explain how much of that delay is due to the length of the Budgets of this Chancellor who, I believe, holds the record for the three longest Budgets in our history?

Dawn Primarolo: The tax law rewrite project has not been delayed. I was being generous to the previous Administration, but that was clearly a mistake on my part. When the previous Administration made their original assessment that the entire tax code could be rewritten in five years, they were a tad optimistic, and that would be an understatement.

Mr. Cameron: Will the Paymaster General give way?

Dawn Primarolo: I know that hon. Members are enjoying the debate enormously, although it has taken a slightly different turn than I anticipated. I assure them that the rewrite is necessary because the central objectives and the central pieces of legislation involved in the tax law rewrite have been in place for some considerable time.

Mr. Bercow rose—

Dawn Primarolo: Before I give way to the hon. Gentleman again, I should check that no other hon. Member is waiting in the queue. If not, I shall gladly give way to him before I make progress on my speech, for which I am sure he is waiting with bated breath.

Mr. Bercow: I look forward to it with bated breath, eager anticipation and beads of sweat upon my brow. However, I must implore the Paymaster General to widen her intellectual horizons. Tax law rewrite and tax simplification need not be mutually exclusive. In the interests of good governance, she would be well advised to take note of the seminal ten-minute Bill on tax simplification that my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) introduced in the last Parliament, as well as a similar Bill that I introduced for the edification of the House on 6 June 2000.

Dawn Primarolo: I always follow closely everything that the hon. Member for Buckingham says on the Floor of the House, irrespective of whether I agree with his allegations.

The tax system—in terms not only of the language of the legislation and its accessibility to those who wish to use it, but also of balancing fairness, certainty and continuity for business with ensuring that all taxpayers get a fair response from the tax system—does not always lend itself easily to simplification. Simplification can be unfair, short and discriminatory, like the poll tax. I am sure that hon. Members will therefore agree that I should move on to consider the Bill.

It is beyond the project's remit to make any change in the main tax policies. However, as the long title suggests, the rewrite can encompass minor changes in detail that further improve the Bill. Examples include: new provisions to fill gaps in existing legislation; incorporating extra statutory concessions; abolishing obsolete material, and correcting minor anomalies. Major changes to tax legislation are matters for the Finance Bill alone. Hon. Members who want to discuss the complexity of the tax system should make their points during consideration of that measure, as they do every year.

Mr. Eric Forth: (Bromley and Chislehurst): Will the Paymaster General give way?

Dawn Primarolo: I have been very generous. I appreciate that the right hon. Gentleman is the only Conservative Member to whom I have not given way and I shall therefore allow him to intervene later so that he does not believe that I am persecuting him. First, I should like to make a little progress.

The Joint Committee focused on the minor changes and satisfied itself that their significance was small and thus within the Bill's remit. The Joint Committee also noted the wide public scrutiny of the Bill, especially the minor changes, which the consultation process clearly flagged up. The project drops any proposed changes that do not fulfil the public scrutiny test.

There is a rigorous system of public consultation for the rewrite Bills. For example, three exposure drafts and a draft Bill were published for formal consultation before the current measure was issued. Meetings have taken place with representative public bodies and informal contact has been made by electronic means with various interested parties.

The Bill is the second measure to emerge from the project. The first dealt with capital allowances two years ago. Tax professionals and other users warmly welcomed the Capital Allowances Act 2001. On Second Reading, I said that I was gratified to read the comments of a leading tax author, who wrote:

"For those learning about capital allowances for the first time, the Capital Allowances Act 2001 is an unqualified blessing. Besides consolidating the old law into one Act, the new legislation is much more clearly laid out than the patchwork of legislation which it replaced."

That is considerable praise.

I want to consider the second rewrite Bill. It makes a start on the rewrite of income tax by rewriting schedule E. Approximately 25 million people are taxed under it, giving rise to more than 90 per cent. of total income tax. The charge to income tax is currently broken down into several schedules. They have come and gone, but we currently have schedules A, D, E and F.

Schedule E deals mainly with income from employment but also includes some charges on pension income and social security benefits, when they are taxable. The Bill covers the current schedule E provision. It brings together all provision for pension income in part 9 and therefore includes even pensions that are currently taxable under schedule D. It also includes the primary legislation for pay-as-you-earn. In the spring, in response to users' representations, the project will publish for consultation a complete draft of the rewritten pay-as-you-earn regulations.

The Joint Committee concluded that the Bill was a welcome clarification of existing law and would be easier to use and more accessible to Parliament, the judiciary, informed professionals, business people and other users. Various techniques have been used in the Bill to effect that.

The first and most important element is the imposition of a coherent structure. Instead of the ramshackle order of provision in existing legislation, the Bill presents all the material logically and groups linked topics. For example, all provisions dealing with taxation of benefits in kind are drawn together to form a benefits code. And, for the first time, all legislation for share-related remuneration is brought together, including, for instance, the various types of share scheme and share option plan.

Another feature that makes the Bill easier to use is the inclusion of plenty of navigational aids for the reader, such as introductory scene-setting chapters and signposts to other relevant provisions. All those are designed to help readers find their way through this large body of legislation. Other features of the rewrite include shorter sentences, modern language, more consistent definitions and, where it is helpful, more use of reader aids such as formulae, tables and method statements.

All that combines to make a new style of tax law that is more accessible, easier on the eye and altogether more user-friendly. That is evidenced by public reaction. For example, the Confederation of British Industry described the Bill, as published in draft last summer, as "a very great improvement on the existing legislation", and the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales said it was

"another major step forward in improving the intelligibility of UK tax legislation in areas of the law that affect the majority of taxpayers".

The title of the Bill is self-explanatory. It is a Bill to "Restate, with minor changes, certain enactments relating to income tax on employment income, pension income and social security income; and for connected purposes".

That is its limit. It is not a tax-reforming Bill. It is, however, an important Bill, and it is also a success. I am firmly convinced that it will make things better for everyone who uses tax legislation.

Before I finish my speech I will give way to the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), if he still wishes to intervene.

Mr. Forth: The Minister can now claim almost to have achieved a full house, or a running flush, or whatever the appropriate term may be.

In paragraph 3 of the Joint Committee's first report, we are told

"The Committee is satisfied that the only changes that the Bill makes to the existing law are of such minor significance that they need not be referred to the attention of Parliament."

I must confess that phrases such as that cause me some concern. I take the view that nothing is of such minor significance that it need not be referred to Parliament. While I accept that the process we are now undergoing constitutes a reference to Parliament, what reassurance can we have that these matters are indeed of "such minor significance"? Even if they are of minor significance, why is there an implication that the rest of us need not be bothered about them?

Dawn Primarolo: Extra-statutory concessions would not normally be in the body of the tax legislation, but would be used alongside it. One example of a minor change would be the incorporation of such a concession in the legislation.

The right hon. Gentleman suggested that he might want to elaborate on his point. If he looks at the explanatory notes, he will see that every minor change in that category is flagged up. The notes explain what the change is, and where it can be found in the Bill. Committee members focused specifically on those changes to satisfy themselves as to the procedure. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, the Committee considering the Bill was not dissimilar to one that would consider a consolidation Bill. It is a Committee of both Houses, in which the Government do not carry their automatic majority. Its discussions follow a slightly different procedure from those in other Committees, and it is able to call independent witnesses if it so chooses.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon): Will the Paymaster General give way?

Dawn Primarolo: This is the very last time that I shall give way before I sit down.

Mr. Burnett: I am extremely grateful to the Paymaster General for giving way. Are those the only changes that are being made through this legislation? I had heard that one or two others are perhaps being made, particularly with regard to pay-as-you-earn regulations, some of which may well have been ultra vires since about 1960.

Dawn Primarolo: I wish I had had written notice of that question. As I said in my opening remarks, the PAYE regulations are being re-drafted and are going out for consultation. They will be fully scrutinised through such public consultation before they are updated.

Mr. Cameron rose—

Dawn Primarolo: I have been extremely generous in giving way, and if hon. Members want to make other points during the debate, I shall of course pick up on them, if I can catch your eye at the end of the debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I commend this Bill to the House.

5.6 pm

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury): Let me begin by noting that when my colleagues saw that the Paymaster General would be taking this very interesting measure through the House on Third Reading, they could not resist packing the Chamber to listen to her. Hers has been a useful opening to this important provision, which affects everybody in this country who has income.

This Third Reading debate follows Second Reading upstairs in Committee on 16 December, and the formal granting by the House of a Second Reading two days later. I thank the Paymaster General for the lucid and comprehensive way in which she has set this important Bill before the House—[Interruption.] She seems to be implying from a sedentary position that that might be the kiss of death, but I should like to thank her for the courteous and patient way in which she dealt with numerous interventions from my colleagues, who on this occasion are themselves numerous. Collectively, they have provided a remarkable fount of wisdom to assist her in today's discussion. I hope to cover some of the points that they made in those interventions, to the extent that I can possibly add to the answers already given.

As the Paymaster General said, this is the second Bill to emanate from the tax law rewrite project. The first became the Capital Allowances Act 2001, which applies primarily to businesses. This Bill has a much wider application and involves many of our constituents, which is why it has attracted so much interest and attention. It is no mean Bill, as it consists of 725 clauses and eight schedules. That may come as no surprise, given that it deals with the significant arena within the overall income tax field of earnings and pensions and, as she rightly said, of social security income.

Against the background of the introduction of income tax in 1799, the Bill seeks to encapsulate law that has more than 200 years of history behind it. Given the Bill's sheer size, right hon. and hon. Members will doubtless have found that the best way to gain the clearest possible understanding of it—given the remarkable speed with which my colleagues have attended to it, they must have used this technique—is to start with the exceptionally helpful accompanying explanatory notes, and then to contrast and compare provisions and expressions in specific parts of the Bill with what they replace.

Mr. Greg Knight: May I associate myself with my hon. Friend's remarks about the Paymaster General?

Has my hon. Friend received any assurances from the Government that the whole rewrite process is not putting undue burdens on the office of the parliamentary draftsman? I am among those Members who want more pre-legislative scrutiny. The Leader of the House has told us that there are difficulties due to the pressure of work on the parliamentary draftsmen. This process—worthwhile though it is—should not mean the neglect of other work that I regard as more important.

Mr. O'Brien: My right hon. Friend raises a fundamental and important point about both the rewrite project and the pressure on parliamentary draftsmen generally. Under the ghastly guillotining procedure, the bulk of legislation is passed with no scrutiny, which puts even greater burdens of responsibility on the parliamentary draftsmen.

Later, in what I hope will be relatively short remarks, I shall ask the Paymaster General to answer particular questions, one of which will address the point that my right hon. Friend has raised.

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend will have seen that the Order Paper helpfully notes that this debate can continue until any hour, so I hope that he will not deprive the House of his research and comments on the Bill by feeling any time constraints whatever. The House is at my hon. Friend's disposal. We want to hear what he has to say "until any hour", so I hope that he will take every advantage of that.

Mr. O'Brien: I am most grateful to my right hon. Friend. No one in the House has a greater reputation than my right hon. Friend for day-in, day-out commitment to parliamentary scrutiny and for using this Chamber as the proper forum for debate and holding the Government to account. I noted the words on the Order Paper and, as we explore the issues, we may be glad to avail ourselves of the opportunities that they offer us. Under the hideous new hours to which we are subjected, the 10 o'clock motion is now the 7 o'clock motion, so we shall have to contend with that. If my right hon. and hon. Friends and, indeed, right hon. and hon. Members from other parties find that they are fully engaged with the issues, they may feel that they need time to explore them.

These important issues relating to income tax apply to many citizens.

Mr. Bercow: The compassionate instincts of my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) are never far from public view. Does my hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) agree, however, that my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) is indeed right, and that it is especially incumbent on my hon. Friend to discharge his responsibility and to offer us his exegesis of the work and lucubrations of the parliamentary draftsman, as represented by the 13 major publications in the form of exposure drafts issued during the past five years?

Mr. O'Brien: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I wonder whether "exegesis" might not qualify for the tax rewrite project itself, but I take his point on board. In what I thought were going to be brief opening remarks, I was trying to show that I had genuinely tried to understand this vast mass of documentation before we allow the House to enact the measure. I hope that gives my hon. Friend some comfort.

[Mr. O'Brien]

I am confident that the Bill is a genuine stride forward in making our existing primary, direct income tax legislation on earnings and pensions clearer and easier to use. I do not propose to take up too much time itemising, contrasting and comparing each clause—save to admit to donning an anorak for that purpose. With a wet towel wrapped around my head, I have studied the Bill. In my view, the Joint Committee has done a truly excellent and admirable job.

Mr. Hoban: Does my hon. Friend share my concern that a Bill of such magnitude and importance was covered by only four sittings of the Joint Committee? Notwithstanding that it received extensive pre-legislative scrutiny, should not the House spend more time on a Bill of such magnitude and importance?

Mr. O'Brien: I believe that the Paymaster General had a genuine point when she made it clear that the process of consideration involving a Joint Committee of the House was designed to tap into the vast expertise and experience of individuals who are able to bring their work to the assistance of the House, in supporting that which we as legislators want to achieve: a rewrite in much clearer, user-friendly language of a measure covering the important subject of income tax law as it relates to earnings and pensions.

Although it may seem on the surface that there has been less than the full number of debates that my hon. Friend might have expected, I am satisfied with the process because so much has been done through a number of Committees that have reported to each other. Although it is up to the Paymaster General to give my hon. Friend the reassurance that he seeks to pass on to his constituents, I have taken the trouble to satisfy myself that the process has been well designed and properly adopted.

Mr. Hoban: Has my hon. Friend read the speech that my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) made in the Second Reading Committee about the process that led up to the Bill? He said:

"It is rather difficult to meet our duty of scrutinising legislation when these Bills come here after so much consultation, which usually leads to the full-blooded support of every professional body for the work that is produced."—[Official Report, Second Reading Committee, 16 December 2002; c. 10.]

Mr. O'Brien: No doubt the Paymaster General has listened to my hon. Friend's point with care and wants to comment.

Dawn Primarolo: I am sure that the hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban) is not seriously suggesting that the Government should not make every effort to ensure that legislation is properly drafted before it reaches the House, simply so that outside bodies can give Opposition Members something to say in debate? Surely the Government should be applauded for undertaking so much consultation and ensuring that legislation before the House is of the highest possible standard.

Mr. O'Brien: The Paymaster General almost takes the words out of my mouth. It is wholly proper and appropriate that, in addition to the genuine tribute that I have paid to the Paymaster General, the House should record its gratitude to a number of the prime movers. The tax law rewrite project was established in December 1996 by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), who gave it the authority and impetus that has led to the overall project's success so far. My right hon. and learned Friend would like to have been with us today but is unavoidably detained.

I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), who is elsewhere on Select Committee business. These ghastly hours mean that we all have to be in too many places at once. I pay tribute also to the hon. Member for Warwick and Leamington (Mr. Plaskitt), who has dedicated himself with great assiduity to the Bill. [HON. MEMBERS: "Where is he?"] He is not in the Chamber, but that is forgivable, given the absence of my right hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. Forth: As ever, my hon. Friend is a true gentleman in seeking to exonerate the other right hon. and hon. Members whom he mentions. However, if the Bill is as important as the Paymaster General suggested—and as important as my hon. Friend suggests by giving so much of his time to it—is he puzzled and disappointed that the very people to whom we should have looked for guidance today deem it to be more important to be elsewhere, rather than in the Chamber assisting us with the knowledge and experience that they gained in Committee? My hon. Friend and the Paymaster General apart, are we not left rudderless on the matter as a result?

Mr. O'Brien: I am somewhat disappointed that my right hon. Friend feels that I am not up to the task. The absence of the right hon. and hon. Members is understandable in the circumstances. However tempting it is to make a cheap point by condemning hon. Members for not being present in the Chamber, I shall not do so. It is encouraging, however, that so many of my right hon. and hon. Friends have felt it necessary to ensure that the Bill is given proper scrutiny on Third Reading. The Bill is the result of a long and rigorous process and I therefore hope that my right hon. Friend will gain some comfort from the knowledge that proper scrutiny has been granted to it. During the debate, he will have many opportunities to assure himself that that is the case.

Mr. Greg Knight: May I reassure my hon. Friend that we make no criticism of his handling of the matter? He is a powerful advocate. However, can he reassure me that nothing in the Bill alters the ruling in the well-known revenue case of Hochstrasser v. Mayes?

Mr. O'Brien: My right hon. Friend has obviously had the opportunity to read the explanatory notes. If not, paragraph 17 on page 5 explains everything that he needs to know about Hochstrasser v. Mayes (1959) 38 TC 673, [1960] AC 376. We should pay tribute to the hard work that has gone into the explanatory notes that support the Bill. As is so often the case on other Bills, they are exceptionally helpful to Members. On this occasion, my right hon. Friend will find all the answers that he needs, and it would be tiresome and unnecessary to read out the paragraph concerned.

Mr. Cameron: My hon. Friend's wet towel exercise—as we shall now have to call it—of looking through the Bill was obviously complete. Did he consider clause 700, which deals with the taxation of share options? Does he share my concern that the proposed law may differ from the existing law, because the Bill mentions taxing an option the moment that it is assigned, instead of the moment that it is exercised? In that case, the person holding the option would not have made a profit out of it, but would be taxed on the nominal value of its assignation.

Mr. O'Brien: Accountability for the content of the Bill lies ultimately with the Government, but if it is of assistance to my hon. Friend in seeking further assurance from the Paymaster General, I can tell him that the annexe to the Bill contains a list of 183 changes, which are classified as minor.

Mr. Forth: Oh!

Mr. O'Brien: My right hon. Friend will no doubt be interested to learn how those changes are classified and how the House may be assured that they are not a cause for concern. He will then have to decide whether he is satisfied with the explanation.

If my hon. Friend looks at the schedule 183 changes, he may well find that the change in clause 700 is classified as minor. I shall look it up if he needs further clarification, but his challenge is appropriate in this debate. He mentioned the wet towel. I assure him that it was very wet, but I am satisfied that the change is in line with the original intent not to inflict unnecessary burdens on users of the Bill.

Mr. Bercow: Will my hon. Friend allow me to intervene?

Mr. O'Brien: This must be the last intervention, as I need to get to page 2 of my speech.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend is typically generous. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) said in his Budget speech in November 1996 that the project was as ambitious as an attempt to translate "War and Peace" into lucid Swahili. He and other senior and influential Members are too busy to be here today, but does my hon. Friend think that they would approve of clause 130 on the notional price of an accessory?

Mr. O'Brien: I was born in Tanzania and my father speaks fluent Swahili. The Bill is more difficult than the translation suggested by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe. I suggest that my hon. Friend looks at the definitions of any terms contained in inverted commas. That is always useful in tax matters. He can then decide whether "notional price" amounts to correct English usage. It is helpful to wear an anorak when comparing and contrasting this Bill with the wording in the original legislation.

I want to make progress. The Paymaster General was exceptionally generous in giving way to interventions, and I do not want to be less so. However, Labour and Liberal Democrat Members seem unwilling to intervene.

As I was saying, I pay great tribute to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe, but also to my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde and to the hon. Member for Warwick and Leamington, both of whom served with great dedication on the steering committee overseeing the project. I salute all the steering committee members, under the indefatigable, focused, charming and determined chairmanship of my noble Friend Lord Howe of Aberavon, which has been patently effective.

Mr. George Osborne: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. O'Brien: I should like to make progress, but I appreciate that my hon. Friend wants to make a relevant point.

Mr. Osborne: We are praising the work of the Joint Committee and approving the project, but the regulatory impact assessment states that the costs of the rewrite project are almost impossible to quantify in advance, and that it is impossible to arrive at an objective measure of the benefits. Does my hon. Friend and constituency neighbour agree that it is surprising to be considering a Bill whose costs and benefits remain unknown to us? I hope that the Paymaster General will at least say something about the costs.

Mr. O'Brien: My hon. Friend and constituency neighbour raises an important point, which the Paymaster General and I discussed in the Second Reading Committee, and I shall refer to it a little later in my remarks. If my hon. Friend will be patient until I reach that point, I shall perhaps be able to deal with it in the round and he will get a more contextual answer. We have to bear in mind where the offset of the costs may arise, as well as the actual numbers. However, given the assurances in the regulatory impact assessment, it would be fair to say that, overall, they are relatively de minimis.

I add our genuine thanks to the many members of the accountancy and legal professions and taxpayer representatives who have taken part in the consultative committee that has reviewed this work, as well as to all those who have participated in the consultation, among whom are those listed on pages 3 and 4 of the explanatory notes, which the Paymaster General so helpfully read out during her opening remarks in response to an intervention made by my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight).

I make no apology for taking time to pay tributes because the House would be unable to undertake such work without the support and expertise of so many people dedicating considerable time and effort. Our gratitude rightly extends, equally, to the Inland Revenue staff who have been involved and, not least, to the team of parliamentary draftsmen, to whom my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire referred, who have grappled with this complex and continuing project.

It is important to note that the Bill, as with all rewrite Bills, is not intended to change the effect of current legislation in any significant way. That point was made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth). However, each rewrite will include a number of minor changes to the law—for example, to legislate for extra-statutory concessions—and this one is no exception.

As I said earlier, 183 changes are listed in the second volume of the Bill. I ask the Paymaster General to highlight a number of those changes, including additional examples of where this project has afforded the opportunity to discard obsolete provisions, during our proceedings this afternoon—it is rapidly becoming this evening—to underwrite the crucial element of trust that has to inform our proceedings.

In the Second Reading Committee, I raised that issue with the Paymaster General and asked her to flag up those changes well in advance so that, in addition to the process being transparent, it continues to carry with it the crucial trust and integrity by which it has been characterised to date. That should provide some of the assurances to which my right hon. and hon. Friends alluded in earlier interventions.

Although it was estimated that the rewrite project would involve 6,000 pages of legislation and initially take about five years, it has long since been recognised that the original programme would not be attainable. I agree with the Paymaster General that it is more important for work to be done properly, rather than quickly, as she said in a written answer on 31 January 2002.

Since its inception, this project has rightly attracted interest and support across the political spectrum, as well as in the business and financial services community. We have to recognise that the whole tax law rewrite project is a continuing one and that it will improve the democratic settlement between taxpaying citizens and the state in terms of transparency, communication and clarity, as is our obligation, only if it maintains its momentum and the Government remain wholeheartedly committed to it.

I have no doubt, frankly, that that is the Paymaster General's intent, but I ask her to confirm to the House that, as a minimum, the same resources—not least the availability of appropriately skilled and experienced parliamentary draftsmen—are maintained and supported in moving on to the next stage in rewriting the PAYE regulations, which, as she rightly said, are out to consultation.

In answer to an intervention made by the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett), it is important to recognise that the Paymaster General would help the House enormously if she were to tell us the programme for the next stage of the project. Although the rewrite of PAYE regulations was not within the original remit of the rewrite team, it has rightly been included in response to representations. Will the Paymaster General confirm that resources will continue to be made available for a timetable within the overall tax rewrite project? Will she push the project forward?

Will the right hon. Lady tell us what resources will be made available for the third Bill of the rewrite project—covering trading, property, investment, miscellaneous, and exempt income—in 2004–05? The boundary between the Bill that we are discussing today and the third income tax Bill has, understandably, been fluid. However, it was said that the boundary definition would be finalised during 2002–03. Will she give us that boundary definition?

In the Second Reading Committee, there was confusion in one quarter, but it is important to acknowledge that this Bill, and the whole rewrite project, is not aimed at the simplification of tax policy. The Paymaster General rightly said that we must distinguish between clarification of tax, in the rewrite project, and simplification of tax, which is a separate project. The rewrite project concentrates on codifying English tax law. However, there is an important qualification. Were my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst still here, he would be able to hear the assurance that I promised. I will tell him that tomorrow's Hansard will make riveting reading. The qualification is that, under Standing Orders Nos. 60 and 152C, it is for the House, in scrutinising the Joint Committee's work, to determine tax law. The Committee's judgment on any changes made by the Bill will have to be scrutinised by the House in order to determine whether the changes are minor or not. That goes to the heart of the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) made a few minutes ago. That point underscores the point that I made earlier about trust. The powers of the House must not be prejudiced. On the issue of trust, I ask the Paymaster General to take a few examples from note 183 in the annexe to volume 2 to show that they are indeed minor.

This Bill is before the House as a result of considerable work and time devoted by many experts and professionals, who have had to consider a number of what are called exposure drafts. There has been concern—and even complaints—about a new syndrome, which has become known as exposure draft fatigue, or EDF. The 2002–03 tax rewrite annual plan says:

> "In order to build on the consultation process—and with the full support of the project's Steering and Consultative Committees—we now take a more flexible approach to the development of draft legislation prior to a final round of formal consultation. This includes more use of the Internet and, as soon as Departmental IT resource permits, we hope to set up a discussion group for draft legislation—that is an Internet page where people can post comments, reply to comments posted by others, and read the project's response."

My noble Friend Lord Howe of Aberavon has taken that point on board and the process has become more streamlined. It is, I would say, the better for it. There is now a considerable amount of material on this project, which the Inland Revenue has helpfully published on its internet site: www.inlandrevenue.gov.uk/rewrite/index/htm.

Accompanying the Bill is a regulatory impact assessment, and some points have already been made about it. It is an important and useful document that was signed by the Paymaster General and discussed in Committee. While recognising that it is difficult to quantify the costs to taxpayers, it is important to recognise that there will be some costs involved in retraining tax practitioners so that they become familiar with the new structure. However, the regulatory impact assessment is fair in regarding the costs likely to be offset or, taken as a whole, to be relatively de minimis.

Will the Paymaster General confirm the Inland Revenue's view contained in the regulatory impact assessment? It said that although "it would be difficult to quantify most of the benefits in advance, and impossible to arrive at any objective measure of the benefits . . . the interested parties, whom we consult during our work, still firmly believe that any costs will be more than outweighed by the benefits flowing from the project."

Mr. George Osborne: Unfortunately, I have not read the Hansard report of the Committee discussion on this point, but was there any discussion of the costs to the Inland Revenue of the project? What are the direct costs to government from all the work that has been done on the rewrite, the use of the parliamentary draftsmen and so on?

Mr. O'Brien: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, not least for his rapier-like persistence that we should at all times discharge our duties to look out for the waste of taxpayers' money. He will see in paragraph 28 of the regulatory impact assessment that the cost to the Inland Revenue of producing the Bill has been estimated at about £7.6 million spread over a period of six years that started in 1997 and goes through to the current financial year. As the assessment says:

"These costs can in part be offset by the costs that would have been expended on the consolidation of the ICTA 1988"—

the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988—

"and the subsequent Finance Acts, but for the work of the project."

Paragraph 29 adds:

"There will also be a small cost to the Inland Revenue in updating the relevant parts of the guidance manuals and internal training material."

There is, therefore, a cost, but it has to be considered in the round. As my hon. Friend heard earlier, we have to consider whether making income tax law—particularly as it relates to earnings and pensions and income from social security—easier to understand represents value for money in terms of the significant cost that is incurred. I believe that it does.

Mr. Greg Knight: Is there not another cost that I touched upon earlier? That is the cost of a possible lack of scrutiny that results from the fact that the parliamentary draftsmen have been overworked by this project. They are therefore not able to devote their time to producing every piece of proposed Government legislation in draft. That is what we want. The Leader of the House said that he also hopes that that will happen.

Mr. O'Brien: My right hon. Friend makes an interesting point. In a sense, I defer to him because he has experience in government and I do not. It is my impression from what I have managed to glean as a member of Her Majesty's official and loyal Opposition that the parliamentary draftsmen are not only an expert but a somewhat scarce commodity available to Government. They are under enormous pressure given the volume and weight of Bills that are continually being introduced. It is important therefore to recognise that we seek an assurance from the Paymaster General that the resources that have been devoted effectively to date will, at least, be maintained at that level. That will enable us to move ahead with the third Bill on the tax law rewrite in the 2004–05 Session and the additional rewrite on the PAYE regulations that will affect everyone who earns. I hope that that reassures my right hon. Friend, but the Paymaster General may have an opportunity to add to my remarks.

Mr. Hoban: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way again. He has been very generous at taking interventions.

My right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) talked about the burden on parliamentary draftsmen as a result of the process of pre-legislative scrutiny. My hon. Friend has referred to exposure directive fatigue. In parallel with parliamentary draftsmen becoming involved, external bodies also have to look at these matters. It is not just the tax law rewrite that involves professional advisers. Before the last Finance Act, there was a considerable input from practitioners on capital gains tax. Is my hon. Friend concerned, as I am, that professional bodies may be devoting a great deal of resources to tax law rewrite, when they may have other tasks because of the Government's programme?

Mr. O'Brien: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, because what he has said helps me to repeat the gratitude of the whole House to the enormous number of experts and practitioners who, because they are so expert—one can place enormous reliance on them for their judgement and expertise—are exceptionally busy in their professional and other practical work. To have a satisfactory consultative body that is effective in support of the tax law rewrite project, which I believe our consultation Committee is, inevitably puts an enormous strain and demand on the time and effort of those people, who are already very busy in their own right.

It was exposure draft fatigue, not exposure directive fatigue—if I may gently correct my hon. Friend—that led to the establishment of use of the internet for dialogue, rather than the many meetings and paper drafts. Those of us who have been in professional practice, as I was before I entered the manufacturing industry, know that it is very time consuming to have to measure one draft against another. On the internet, as my hon. Friend well knows, time can be saved, not least because, in a rather professional way, there is a chat room to exchange good ideas.

Mr. Forth: I worry when I start to hear talk of chat rooms and e-things. Is not my hon. Friend worried that a large proportion of the population is disfranchised by this ghastly modern process? Every time I hear glib talk of internet chat rooms and the like, it comes to my mind that the latest figures show, I think, that only 40 per cent. of households are connected to the ghastly internet. Therefore, potentially 60 per cent. of households are disfranchised from the so-called consultation process. How do we non-cyber folk get to know about these things, and how are we simple, non-electronic people, consulted?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. Before the hon. Gentleman responds, I would point out that we are going a little wide of the Third Reading of the Bill.

Mr. O'Brien: I am grateful for your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Indeed, I could almost say

[Mr. O'Brien]

"rescue". I was concerned that my right hon. Friend might be referring to E-substances in food, given the nature of his question at one point, but I understand where he is coming from in terms of his non-cyber existence. I recognise that he inhabits the non-cyber world in a very firm and, I suspect, unshakeable way. But when he quotes statistics as to who is and is not hooked to cyber, it is important to recognise that we are not talking about the broad citizenry at large. We are talking about the professionals and those with particular expert knowledge in the field, who can help on the consultation Committee and also as consultees in the process. It is also important to recognise that it would be very difficult for them to do their professional work if they were not prepared to join what is regarded as the more modern e-world, with all its opportunities—and indeed shortcomings, as my right hon. Friend is never remiss in observing and pointing out to the rest of the nation.

I shall move forward as rapidly as I can with opening remarks that have taken somewhat longer than I had expected. I support and reiterate what my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde said in our Committee proceedings, that we not only hope that the precedent of issuing a regulatory impact assessment of the Bill will be followed for all future tax law rewrite projects, but also believe that it should be applied to all future tax changes, to include economic tests and an analysis of what the Chancellor expects any tax measure to achieve.

Dawn Primarolo: Has the hon. Gentleman been following the same debate in the United States, where Congress and the President disagree on how to make an assessment on that basis? Given that they cannot resolve the problem, is he seriously suggesting that it would be helpful for us to engage in such a dispute?

Mr. O'Brien: In a sense, the Paymaster General gives me the assurance that I seek. The fact that she is conscious of the debate in the United States means that Treasury Ministers are keeping a watching brief on it. That gives me some encouragement. The model in the United States is often much more fruitful than models nearer to home. It will be helpful to see how the debate develops and how—if at all—the Americans manage to resolve the problem. If it is resolved satisfactorily, it will help to underpin the settlement between the citizens of this country who have to pay tax and the state, as represented through the Executive, which takes and applies the money. We need to ensure that they have the best possible information to understand how the money is valued and what is expected up front.

It is no different in the private and commercial world. It is no bad thing for hon. Members to experience the discipline of working in the real world that everyone else inhabits before they come here. If someone wants to raise money by going to a bank, he would be held to his business and repayment plans and would need to have an idea of how things might work out. That is not the habit of Government, as the Paymaster General knows. It is worth considering such a project, especially on the back of what is being considered in the United States. I am grateful to know that that might be under the gaze of Treasury Ministers, and we look forward to further reports on it.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde said in Committee, tax legislation is too often enacted "on a wing and a prayer, wondering whether it will do some good or hoping—for political reasons—that it will", but all it can add is further complexity. Therefore, for all users of tax legislation, the overriding need is for both clarity and certainty. Indeed, the Paymaster General made that point in her opening remarks. Although the rewrite project addresses clarity, I hope that the Paymaster General and the Chancellor will listen carefully, especially as the Budget is coming soon and the planned tax increases, which will hit everyone's pockets, are just 53 days away. They need to act on that, not least to make it easier for tax practitioners and taxpayers, but also to gauge, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde said, the "before-and-after effects" of tax measures. That is, perhaps, the equivalent of the proposal, coupled with a post-audit review that one would expect in any walk of private business and commercial life. My hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) touched on that in the context of the compliance issue. I am grateful that the Paymaster General is nodding. She obviously acknowledged the importance of that, and I look forward to further announcements from the Treasury.

I hope that I am pushing at an open door, because in Committee the Paymaster General concluded with the words:

"Tax legislation is not always perfect. It is, however, about striking a balance between fairness and enabling competition, and it is about giving certainty."—[Official Report, Second Reading Committee, 16 December 2002; c. 12-17.]

That is a fair test and we need to adhere to it.

As we said in Committee, there would be no harm in submitting the document for scrutiny by the Plain English Campaign. That would help with clarity. Some of us have tried to earn a return for shareholders' money while at the same time supplying high-quality goods and services that customers want at a fair price. Many of us who have worked in the manufacturing, wealth-creating side of the economy have had to produce annual reports, especially if we have done that on the back of other people's money. In this ever challenging, regulated and, at times, politically correct world, annual reports have to contain all manner of things. They assume that people are always driven by the worst of motives rather than the best. Given the plethora of regulations that have to be satisfied in companies' annual reports, the application of the crystal mark by the Plain English Campaign has been particularly helpful. One of the first companies to use it, to its credit, was the National Westminster bank, in which, I hasten to add, I have no interest. I was going to say that I have no money, but that is another point. The bank's annual reports are a model of their kind, especially as many of the areas that they cover, including compliance and liquidity, are not dissimilar to those covered by the Bill. As part of the rewrite project, it would be exceptionally useful to submit the Bill to the campaign, as it is more likely to be read by private citizens than by businesses, which, with their professional tax advisers, are more likely to read the Capital Allowances Act 2001, the first of the tax law rewrite measures.

It would be useful to submit the Bill to the Plain English Campaign to discover whether the test that the Government have set themselves satisfies the campaign as well. The campaign would also have to recognise that it is not possible to reduce everything to a small novella. In our earlier debate, there were some interesting examples of fictional novellas from Government Members, who were trying to pretend that they were delivering a critique of Conservative policy. We, however, had the chance at last to hold the Government to account for their disastrous economic policies. I am straying outside this debate, so I shall simply tell the Paymaster General that it would be helpful to introduce a further test in the tax law rewrite project by submitting the Bill to the Plain English Campaign to discover whether it could attain a crystal mark, which would be a signal demonstration of the success of all the fine work that has gone into it.

Clause 176, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde highlighted in Committee, can be understood with the aid of the exceptionally helpful flow chart on page 72 of the first volume of the explanatory notes. For the assistance of Members following our debate with intense interest, there is another chart on page 91. It is unusual that explanatory notes should include helpful diagrams that make the flow of money readily understandable. In Committee, my right hon. Friend strongly recommended that such diagrams be more widely used, not just as part of the rewrite project but more widely in legislation, not least draft legislation to assist with pre-legislative scrutiny. I, too, urge greater use of that form of explanatory communication, and I ask the Paymaster General to tell us in her winding-up speech whether there are any impediments against the wider use of the technique. Diagrams are included in the explanatory notes, but are notably absent from the Bill. It would be helpful to have a flow diagram, even if only in a schedule or annexe, as our education system relies heavily on computer technology. I know that it would be a burdensome challenge for my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst, but the rest of the population is familiar with menu options—people are being educated to respond to more diagrammatic ways of learning and understanding. A chart may therefore have a greater resonance with them than the product of the more literary, arts-based education of the past.

Mr. Bercow: Far be it from me to seek to check my hon. Friend's heady and almost Panglossian optimism about pages 72 and 91, and the charts therein, of the explanatory notes, but will he remind the House that, as is customary with all legislation, there is a proviso on the front page of the explanatory notes reminding us that they are to be read in conjunction with, but are in no sense a part of, the Bill? Does he therefore think it necessary to issue a warning that the charts may not be a full, accurate and exhaustive description of the matters to which they relate?

Mr. O'Brien: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. I had hoped that he was listening a tiny bit more attentively, as I suggested that the charts were a helpful model that could be incorporated in legislation. I fully accept that the explanatory notes should be read in conjunction with a draft Bill and that they would always be available after a Bill was enacted. None the less, if such information were included in the legislation as a schedule or annexe, it would help us to understand whether it was a genuine, full and fair representation of reality. It would be readily understood by hon. Members as well as all the users who will have to deal with such provisions once they become law. Indeed, it would be reviewed from time to time if the legislation were amended.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) will be reassured by that clarification or restatement of the position that I sought to outline earlier. He is an example to all hon. Members of the benefits of a tremendous arts-based education, not least because of the great literary prowess that he demonstrates on numerous occasions, as well as his acrobatic ability with the English language. I hope that he will recognise that not everybody's mind works completely as his does and that some people may find the more diagrammatic and figurative—and even, dare I say it, more numerate—approach of some help.

As I seek to bring what I hoped would be short remarks to a conclusion—I do so somewhat desperately, given the late hour—I must highlight one area of caution.

Mr. George Osborne: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. O'Brien: I am trying not to be delayed, but I shall give way once more.

Mr. Osborne: My hon. Friend referred to the late hour, but I remind him that, as I am sure he knows, the business can continue until any hour. We are still only at 6 o'clock in the evening, which is fairly early in what used to be the parliamentary day.

Mr. O'Brien: I am aware that the business can continue until any hour, but I would not regard it as our proper duty as Her Majesty's loyal and official Opposition to do anything other than use the time of the House effectively, as I have been seeking to do. Given the shortness of the earlier debate, which occurred in Opposition time and dealt with the absolutely crucial matter of holding the Government to account for their failed economic policies and failure on public services, the way in which Labour Members used that time was questionable. I therefore feel no compunction or compulsion to feel constrained except by the need to hold the Government properly to account in the Chamber, where we have the opportunity to do just that. If it takes us until any hour to do that, we will take until any hour, but I hope that that will not be necessary and, given the number of questions that I have asked, I am looking forward to the assurances that I am sure the Paymaster General will be able readily to give us.

I was about to deal with an area of caution. Everything that today's Chancellor does works in contrary motion to the underlying principles of the rewrite project. There is growing evidence to suggest that the tax system has become more complex, especially in recent years, as a result of the weight and size of tax legislation and the guides written to assist persons or businesses that wish to understand it. The cost of administering the system has grown along with feedback from professional surveys. There has been growing criticism of the complexity of the tax system. Accountants and others have been arguing that the situation is beyond the comprehension of most ordinary taxpayers and is imposing an unnecessary burden on business.

Mr. George Osborne: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. O'Brien: My hon. Friend is exceptionally assiduous.

Mr. Osborne: My hon. Friend will be aware that "Tolley's Tax Guide", the bible of tax accountants, has grown in size by 30 per cent. in the past few years. Indeed, smaller print now has to be used to accommodate all the extra complication of the tax law that has occurred under the current Chancellor.

Mr. O'Brien: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend. It is clear that he has received the same briefing as me. Indeed, I was about to deal with that point. Tolley's standard tax manual, the bible for tax accountants, has indeed grown by more than 30 per cent. in the past three years. This is a point with which I happen to be familiar, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising it. The Financial Times on 24 November 2001 highlighted the increase in the weight of tax manuals since Labour came to power in 1997:

"Britain's 'tax bible' has grown by more than a third since Labour came to power as the nation's accountants struggle to understand the word of Gord. Tolley's manuals on VAT, income tax and corporation tax—the accountant's favourite reference tool—have had to add a total of 855 pages to explain the gospel according to Gordon Brown."

A gospel is normally described as good news, so I have to take serious issue with the Financial Times on that. It goes on:

"The three guides, which together have 3,414 pages, are longer than London's residential and business telephone directories. Tolley's has even had to reduce the print size to cram in more."

When my hon. Friend talked about reducing the size, I was worried that hon. Members might be confused and think that the volume had contracted. Far from it—it has grown and has had to reduce its print size so as to cram everything in.

This is quite an extraordinary record, and one that fully illustrates how this Government's actions are going in contrary motion to the very proper tax law rewrite project that is gaining tremendous consensual cross-party support—and rightly so—in the House. Throughout the Chancellor of the Exchequer's tenure in office, a feature of his Budgets has been the sheer size of the subsequent legislation published in each Finance Bill. According, again, to the Financial Times, the "door-stopping" Finance Bill of 2002, with 140 clauses and 39 schedules, was the third largest ever. The Financial Times states:

"At 488 pages, it is the third-longest in history and it does not even include some of the most significant legislation coming out of the Budget, such as the rise in national insurance contributions" which we will all have to suffer in 53 days' time. Can you believe it, Mr. Deputy Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are not discussing the Finance Bill this evening. Perhaps we can discuss the Third Reading of the Bill that is before the House?

Mr. O'Brien: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I may have taken slightly longer than you think necessary to make my point about the 53 days—

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire): Not true.

Mr. O'Brien: I think that the hon. Gentleman is trying to place on record a comment about the question of 53 days. Of course, it depends on whether one is an employee or an employer. Both will face tax rises. The employers' contributions will increase at the beginning of the month and, as anyone who has worked in the real world of industry will know, the employees' contributions will rise at the end of the month, unless they have a special dispensation through their employer or through any other legislation or regulations—there are plenty of them—to change that to another date in the month. So it is 53 days until the employers' contributions will change, and we shall all have to suffer in 53 days' time—or more, depending on whether we are talking about employers' or employees' contributions. Given the appalling attack that this will represent on the pockets of the citizens of this country, I am very surprised that the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) should have the gall to highlight this matter in the way that he has done.

Mr. Bercow: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way so generously yet again. Surely the essence of this matter is that the tax law rewrite project has to be viewed in the context of the central charge against the Government, which is that of more complexity, on the one hand, and less information being made available to the public on the other. In that context, what consideration has my hon. Friend given to the verdict of the Treasury Committee, which is very germane to our considerations tonight, that the Chancellor is to be excoriated for his failure to publish the impact of his direct and indirect taxation measures on people in the respective income deciles?

Mr. O'Brien rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry, but the hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) is again being tempted into byways that are not really to do with the Third Reading of the Bill.

Mr. O'Brien: I will certainly take your strictures to heart, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and leave on the record what my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham has said. I hope that the Government will take serious note of his contribution in that intervention.

I was seeking to highlight, by way of example, why there is real concern about the consistency of the Government's action in relation to the tax law rewrite project, a crucial element of which is the Bill before us tonight, and to mention the assurances that we wish to see under the PAYE regulations.

Dawn Primarolo: The hon. Gentleman was complaining about the Finance Act 2002, in which the Government took out all the provisions on loan relations— which were a complete mess—and rewrote them, which equates to less pages of legislation.

Mr. Bercow: Fewer.

Dawn Primarolo: I thank the hon. Gentleman for the grammatical correction—fewer pages. The hon. Member for Eddisbury cannot seriously suggest that the Finance Act 2002 entirely comprised new legislation, because a huge chunk of it rewrote legislation that his Government had messed up.

Mr. O'Brien: Hon. Members on either side of the House will have different interpretations, but the recollection of my right hon. and hon. Friends is that the Financial Times was justified in calling that Finance Bill a doorstop, regardless of whether some clauses were taken out.

Given the consensual nature of the tax law rewrite project, the work of the Joint Committee and my support for what the Paymaster General has done, I hope that she realises that I do not intend to be unfair or difficult. However, there is a question in my mind about the consistency of devoting so much time and so many people to the valuable work on the tax law rewrite project, which is demonstrated by the Bill, and the inevitability of having such large Finance Bills. We do not know what will be in the forthcoming Finance Bill, and the Paymaster General will not disclose any of the contents of the Chancellor's Budget, whenever it takes place—I hope that we will soon be told the date. It will help the future work of the tax law rewrite project if the standards applied to that project are used in the drafting of Finance Bills. I believe that the Paymaster General indicated that that was the case in her opening remarks.

Dawn Primarolo: It is the case that when legislation is rewritten and put into Finance Bills, it is rewritten in the tax law rewrite style. When, for a Finance Bill of a few years ago, we completely rewrote some VAT legislation using the tax law rewrite style, Opposition Members thought that it was a completely new piece of legislation and opposed it on that basis.

Mr. O'Brien: The Paymaster General has the advantage of me, in that I was not party to that. Different interpretations can always be made, but the point is that every year we dedicate ourselves with a great deal of effort to the most important Bill that goes through Parliament, namely, the Finance Bill. I am simply asking the Paymaster General to recognise that it is important to take a consistent approach to the tax law rewrite project and to the framing of Finance Bills.

The Chancellor's Budgets of 1998 and 2000 were two of the biggest Finance Bills. As regards the 2002 Finance Bill, nine pages set out changes to rates of duty for small brewers, six pages dealt with new tax arrangements for community and amateur sports clubs, 14 pages set out new tax arrangements for vaccines research and five pages were given to revisions to the aggregates levy. Specialists are alarmed by the size of legislation. John Whiting of PricewaterhouseCoopers has said:

"The only thing that keeps it bearable is the fact that we have seen a lot of it before. But for that, we'd be utterly floored."

In response to the 600-page 2000 Finance Bill, John Whiting, who was then also vice-president of the Chartered Institute of Taxation, said:

"The whole of the personal tax area is ripe for simplification."

Again, I emphasise that point. We should not confuse the tax law rewrite project with tax simplification. That is another demand that the Government should note.

On the same subject, Frank Haskew, an executive at the Institute of Chartered Accountants, commented:

"This is out of all proportion to anything we have ever seen before. The volume of tax law has doubled since the 1980s. I do not know how ordinary people have a hope of understanding their tax affairs. Even accountants are struggling."

The trend of more complex and lengthy tax law is crucial to the debate. We hope that the Government will ensure that the standards that apply to the tax law rewrite project are adopted for all Finance Bills. I believe that the Paymaster General's intent is genuine, but the record to date gives no ground for hope.

As we rapidly reach the conclusion of my remarks on the subject, it is important to comment on the increasing complexity of the tax system in relation to the Capital Allowances Act 2001, which was the first measure in the tax law rewrite era.

Mr. John Taylor (Solihull): I had not intended to intervene, although I am an expert on income tax because I have paid it for approximately 40 years. However, my hon. Friend said that even accountants were struggling. In my experience, accountants do extraordinarily well out of such monsters as the Bill.

Mr. O'Brien: My hon. Friend makes an interesting and important point. I do not want to decry accountants, because so many experts on whom hon. Members have relied to reach our current position of considering a tax law rewrite Bill are accountants. It is not right to condemn those who are properly and professionally able to make a sensible and sometimes rewarding living out of being experts. Perhaps simplifying the law will make it more challenging for them to earn a crust. That relates to the impact assessments that some of my hon. Friends wanted clarified earlier. I try to emulate my hon. Friend the Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor) in many respects, but I dread the day when I shall have paid income tax for 40 years.

I am deeply conscious of your earlier guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker, about not being tempted to stray too far down alleys, byways and cul-de-sacs by my hon. Friends, who are perhaps struggling to come to grips with the vast array of documentation.

The Capital Allowances Act 2001 was the first element of the tax law rewrite project. My noble and learned Friend Lord Howe of Aberavon said:

"The Finance Act 2000 . . . is almost twice as long as our only rewrite product so far—after about four years' work—the Capital Allowances Bill. As I said last summer, 'It is like trying to repaint Brighton Pier at a time when its owners are trying to extend it to the French coast.'"

[Mr. O'Brien]

That has a sad resonance in the light of recent events at the West pier and the Palace pier in Brighton. My hon. Friends and I send our condolences to people in Brighton. Lord Howe's comment was so apt that I quoted it as a memorable illustration of our argument on the current tax law rewrite project.

We are also considering burgeoning costs to the taxpayer.

Mr. Bercow: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. O'Brien: I am in danger of never reaching the last paragraph of my speech, but I shall give way.

Mr. Bercow: I know that my hon. Friend wants to be reminded of the integral relationship between the complexity of tax law and its implications for the introduction of each Finance Bill. Does he agree that it is therefore right to record what Lord Howe of Aberavon is too modest to note? His first Finance Bill, in 1979, in marked contrast to a measure of 488 pages that the current Chancellor introduced, was merely 28 pages long.

Mr. O'Brien: I of course defer to the remarkable body of factual knowledge, both useful and completely useless, that my hon. Friend is so often able to deploy for our elucidation. The example he gives is, I think, an example for all time, and it would be most helpful if Chancellors—especially this Chancellor—heeded it. Under Parkinson's law, 22 pages are likely to receive better scrutiny.

David Taylor: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. O'Brien: I am happy to give way to the hon. Gentleman, who so far has spoken only from a sedentary position.

David Taylor: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that while there is sometimes a positive correlation between the size of Members—such as the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow)—and their quality, the correlation between the length of Acts and their quality can be inverse?

Mr. O'Brien: I hesitate to stray too far in the direction of the analogy about size and other matters. It is important to recognise that the contributions of members of all parties here are always to be respected, because they are all honourable Members.

This has been a helpful and, indeed, somewhat surprising debate. Like the Paymaster General, I dare say, I had not expected so much interest to be displayed. I am glad that I put in all those hours of work before a debate on what is, after all, quite a dry and technical subject. Thank goodness I did not decide to go and do something else, instead of doing at least some of the homework that was necessary for me to understand the vast array of documentation with which the Joint Committee has so ably presented us.

As I was saying, all this comes at a cost—a burgeoning cost to the taxpayer. If we have any duty at all, it is to consider taxpayers' interests at all times. Despite computerisation and the increased use of companies in the administration of the tax and benefits system, it costs about £6 billion a year to run the Inland Revenue and the Benefits Agency. In 1950–51 it cost less than £1 billion, in 2001 prices, to run the Revenue and the equivalent of the Benefits Agency. We should look for any available way of making legislation relating to the Revenue simpler.

I hope that part of the benefit of the tax rewrite will be the elimination of waste in connection with the running costs of a Department. I also hope that, as soon as possible, the Paymaster General will deliver a positive assessment. I should like to think that, as a result of the clarification and ease of use that will result from the rewrite project, some of the administration costs in the Inland Revenue will be reduced. As the Paymaster General is the Minister responsible for such matters, it is incumbent on me to address these remarks to her. We must always be on the lookout for opportunities to minimise waste of the public money that has been so hard earned by the taxpayer.

Given all that I have said, and bearing in mind the warning that I gave in the latter part of my speech—and provided that the Paymaster General and the Chancellor are prepared to heed that warning—my colleagues and I, as Her Majesty's loyal and official Opposition, will be more than happy to support the Bill. We congratulate all who were involved in its presentation in its current form.

Mr. Cameron: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Will you give us some guidance on the correct way to state Members' interests, including those of Ministers? The Bill deals with taxation arrangements for Ministers and other Members, specifically in clauses 291 and 295. Clause 295 covers transport and subsistence arrangements for Ministers. Should we have registered our interests, given that we all have an interest in the Bill?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Bill does not change the law in any way. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman and, indeed, all other Members are well aware of what they must do to declare their interests during debates.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil): I am delighted to be able, finally, to participate in this debate. My party welcomes the Bill, although my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett) may want to catch your eye later on, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to pick up on some points of detail.

I want to begin by making some general comments, and by following the hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) in congratulating all who put in the hard and not always enjoyable work involved in getting the Bill to this stage, including the Paymaster General, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), members of the other place and the officials who doubtless did some of the serious grind behind the scenes to introduce greater accessibility and, to some extent, simplicity to the Bill's wording.

We have consulted a number of tax specialists about whether the Bill is a success. Perhaps the kindest thing that I can say to the Paymaster General is that the salient comment of one tax adviser was that they take a very dim view indeed of measures such as this, which, in simplifying the tax system and making it easier for people to understand, could reduce their own fee income.

Dawn Primarolo: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's point about whether practitioners are happy with the rewrite. I direct him to the support papers, which include a list of all the changes that tax practitioners would like to be made to the system, every one of which would increase the complexity but none of which would pass the test of simplification.

Mr. Laws: I take the Paymaster General's point, but I hope that she noted the somewhat barbed compliment that was being paid to the work that she, her officials and others have done in respect of this Bill.

Dawn Primarolo indicated assent.

Mr. Laws: In making the tax system more accessible and simpler for the ordinary man in the street, they have created a potential benefit for the economy—even if it is a disbenefit for tax accountants.

Several detailed points have been made in the debate, one of which concerned the potential cost of measures such as this. In her closing comments, will the Paymaster General say a little more about what we have learned from the Capital Allowances Act 2001—one of the first benefits of the work done by Tax Law Rewrite Committee—whether business or tax advisers have made representations about the effects of that measure, and whether it has made the system simpler or added to costs in any respect.

Perhaps the most important point that I want to make, which was touched on by the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton), was also made in a debate in another place in January of last year. It is not the same issue that many Conservative Members sought to raise—whether the Bill's detail could change the precise nature of our tax law—albeit that that is a very important issue about which legitimate concerns have been expressed, including by my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and West Devon; rather, I am referring to the point made by Lord Howe in a debate in January 2002 about the general desire of both Houses, and of those involved in the Bill, to make the tax system more accessible, simpler and more economic to use, not just for tax practitioners but for businesses and individuals throughout the country. There is a great danger that this attempt to make the wording of tax law simpler to understand will mask other problems with the way in which the tax system has developed in recent years, not least since 1997.

Lord Howe said:

"My central conclusion is that there is no chance of a knock-out success against tax complexity . . . we need to identify, define and establish not an event"—

such as the Bill—

"but a process—a comprehensive mechanism through which the problems can be addressed and managed tenaciously over the years. It is a long-haul business. The continuing insistence of the process on simplicity must be as irremovable and as constantly present as the voice of the tax-raising departments and as the politically restless, impatient input of successive Chancellors of the Exchequer."

Lord Howe was warning us that we have much to learn. That is especially true of the Bill. Changes introduced by successive Chancellors, not least the current Chancellor, may not complicate the words that we use in tax law but they can certainly complicate the tax system itself, which is far more important.

Mr. George Osborne: The hon. Gentleman cites the sage words of Lord Howe. How would Lord Howe's comments apply to Liberal Democrat plans for local income taxes? We should then have 20, 30, 40—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) must not be tempted down that route.

Mr. Laws: It is immensely tempting, but I shall adhere to your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

"We need to ensure that the neglected constituency of stability, as well as simplicity, is effectively represented at every level and every stage of the tax-making system." —[Official Report, House of Lords, 23 January 2002; Vol. 630, c. 1470–71.]

Without straying from the substance of the debate, will the Paymaster General describe how we can embed the simplification of new tax changes in the Finance Bill and Budget processes; and how we can move away from the general trend of tax policy, especially over the past five years, to complicate the tax system, thus making it more expensive for practitioners and businesses to use?

Finally, I pay tribute to the Paymaster General for her work on the project. I hope that it will be the beginning of a process that ensures not only that the words in the tax system are easier to understand, but that the system itself is simpler.

6.32 pm

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon): I, too, pay tribute to Lord Howe, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), the Joint Committee and its officials and the Paymaster General. The rewrite project has been her Herculean labour.

The Capital Allowances Act 2001 was a significant improvement; it was reasonably intelligent legislation in which numerous provisions were dovetailed. This Bill does the same thing. I hope that, as the right hon. Lady has assured us, successive measures will continue to be written in the same style so that they fit easily and intelligibly with the Bill. The Joint Committee's ambitions have mainly been achieved. The use of plain English, with shorter sentences and a clearer structure, is welcome.

As I have said before, successive Finance Acts have added countless complications and numerous rates of taxes. It is asking enough of the Committee to rewrite the plethora of existing legislation and to dovetail it in specific Acts; the Government must resist the temptation gratuitously to tinker with the tax system, thereby making it more complex.

I do not want to be too pedantic and long winded, but there have been one or two changes, and they may not be inadvertent. Clause 684 is intended to correct PAYE regulations, some of which have operated ultra vires since 1960, especially those on the coding-out practice—a system of re-coding in the subsequent year underpayments made in the previous year.

I do not mean to be churlish, but one or two parts of the Bill are unnecessarily long winded. I am grateful to the Law Society for prompting me. I cannot understand why there need to be 15 definitions of "employee" and why clause 66(1)(b) and 2(b) inexplicably contain two definitions of "employer".

Clauses 638 and 639 deal with exemptions for awards for bravery. Right hon. and hon. Members will recognise that individuals who have won the Victoria Cross or other decorations do not have any complexities attached to their tax affairs. It should be made clear beyond all doubt that the entire income gained from a hard-won award is free of taxation. Both clauses begin:

"No liability to income tax arises".

I am not convinced that that wording will be fully effective. The fact that liability may not arise on those specific items of income does not seem sufficient to exclude the recipient's total income, which might affect the individual's entitlement to age allowance. I raise that point not because I think that income will be taken into account by the Inland Revenue but because, in the interests of the House and all taxpayers, it should be made absolutely clear that my understanding is correct—that payments for valour will not adversely affect any aspect of an individual's liability to tax and that he will be entirely free of taxation.

That is a small but important point, not least given the great sacrifices made by our service men and their families, who are likely to be called upon to do the same in the near future. If we can get that clarification on record in the spirit of Pepper v. Hart people will know how the system should operate.

The Bill is a success and perhaps the Paymaster General will remind us about the next project, which is probably in tow as we speak. I congratulate all those responsible for the measure; it is a remarkable improvement on what has gone before.

Dawn Primarolo: I begin with the point made by the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett) about awards for bravery. My understanding is that there has been no change, but I will check with my officials. As we have tried to demonstrate through the tax law rewrite project, we want to make the legislation clear.

It might help if I explain how minor changes are made to legislation in the rewriting process and how the tax law rewrite project undertakes consultation. Ministers receive the tax law rewrite project only when it has been completed and moves into its parliamentary stage. I said that I would give examples of minor changes to the legislation, such as new provisions to fill gaps in the existing legislation—for instance, the incorporation of extra-statutory concessions—the abolition of obsolete material or the correction of minor anomalies.

The project must first exercise judgment in deciding whether a proposed change is minor enough to fall within its remit. It identifies all proposed changes in the various consultations and asks for comments. That request does not come to Ministers. If respondents all agree that the change should be made, as part of the rewrite, it is placed in the Bill and flagged up so that Parliament may consider it. If the reaction is unfavourable, the change is generally dropped and a reason for it not being included is given. For example, an extra-statutory concession might need to continue.

In cases of doubt or mixed reaction to the consultation, guidance is sought from the Joint Committee, whose membership, of course, includes Members of both Houses; this evening, compliments have been paid to their work. Ultimately, it is for Parliament to decide whether the Bill should make those minor changes. Up to that point, however, the project is all embracing and, for Treasury Ministers, an unusual exercise in that it allows those outside the House who use the legislation to give their opinion on whether the change should be made. The hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) asked for examples of such changes and I shall provide them in a moment.

The next issues are not directly related to the Bill, but I hope that with your tolerance, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I may refer to them in passing. The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) raised the vexed question of complexity and simplicity, as if we lived in a perfect world in which the tax authorities never had to consider the practice of individuals or commercial organisations in respect of tax legislation and whether it followed the intent of Parliament in passing the legislation. The problem we have is mainly with anti-avoidance legislation, which is long and complex because it responds to complex relationships. The hon. Gentleman asked me to speculate on how we might overcome that. Could we get tax planners to agree a truce, under which they would stop their creative tax planning and we would not need our anti-avoidance legislation? I live in hope, but I think not.

Mr. Laws: The Paymaster General's comments notwithstanding, would she accept that a Chancellor can pursue a policy of tax simplification and reduce the number of taxes, as Lord Lawson did in the 1980s, or he can introduce new tax allowances and reliefs that complicate the tax system—as most people believe the present Chancellor has done since 1997?

Dawn Primarolo: With respect, the hon. Gentleman has never been in the position—and probably never will be—of receiving Budget submissions, be they from the CBI, the Institute of Directors or even the Liberal Democrats and the Conservatives. Without fail, those submissions ask the Government to intervene to assist in a particular area; they can be hugely beneficial.

For instance, the legislation on the research and development tax credit was widely celebrated and acclaimed by businesses small and large. I seem to remember that it took up some 90 pages, and that Liberal Democrat Members supported it in this House. However, when it comes to the question of simplicity and complexity, some hon. Members seem splendidly unaware that the UK economy is part of the global economy. Tax planners arrive at intriguing and interesting interpretations of tax law, and so the matter is never as straightforward as some hon. Members suggest.

I agree, however, that the idea that the Government set out to make tax law complex is rubbish. Even so, hon. Members must turn their minds to the challenges faced by all tax authorities, not simply by the authorities in this country. The hon. Member for Yeovil may be right to say that legislation that is easy to understand may not be so easy to get around; I doubt that but, again, I live in hope.

The hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) asked several questions about parliamentary drafters. A dedicated team of drafters is part of the tax law rewrite project, and that is taken fully into account in the resource planning for that office. That will continue. The PAYE regulations will be out in the spring, and the next tax law rewrite Bill will be available in the later part of this year or early next.

The hon. Member for Eddisbury asked about regulatory impact assessments. I know that he is familiar with the argument that they are difficult to achieve when the tax law remains unchanged. However, the assessment for this Bill makes it clear that when the rewritten legislation has been up and running for a number of years, the Government will work in conjunction with the relevant interested parties on the long-term and short-term cost of the Bill. In that way, a more meaningful understanding of how to proceed would be arrived at.

The hon. Member for Eddisbury asked for examples of minor changes. I draw his attention to the clause dealing with the exemption of certain lump sums from pension income, which now provides that the lump sums provided under retirement annuity contracts are exempt from income tax, as long as they are provided under the approved rules of the scheme. That change is in principle in the taxpayer's favour. Another example is the reporting requirements for the acquisition of shares. Those requirements used to be 30, 60 and 92 days, but the Bill sets them all at 92 days. That minor change introduces simplicity, and is clearly in the taxpayer's favour. The supporting material always makes clear whether a change is in the favour of the taxpayer or of the tax authorities. With only a couple of exceptions, the changes are all in favour of the taxpayer.

There are many examples of discarding obsolete provisions, but I shall give just one. Section 648(A)(2) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 has not been rewritten. Explanatory note 2381 makes it clear that that transitional measure is no longer needed.

The redraft of the PAYE regulations will be out in the spring, and I hope that they will come before Parliament later this year. However, the third rewrite Bill will be published in draft in the first half of next year—not later this year, as I suggested. I apologise for that error. It will cover income tax, property income, trading income, savings and investment income and foreign income.

Mr. Laws: Will the next tax rewrite Bill resolve any of the problems alluded to in today's Treasury Committee report, which touches on the issue of tax avoidance by the Inland Revenue?

Dawn Primarolo: I have been in the Chamber all day, and I have not had a chance to read the report to which the hon. Gentleman refers, but I am sure that, when this business concludes, I will rush out and study it avidly.

The hon. Member for Eddisbury also asked about flow charts. I agree that they are helpful and that they can be used, but there is a slight problem with incorporating them in legislation: it is very difficult to frame legislative amendments to flow charts. We shall be as helpful as we can, but I wonder whether that might just be a trick question.

It is not for us to submit the Bill to the Plain English Campaign, but I am sure that those involved in the campaign will study it, although I do not think that they are necessarily noted for looking at technical legislation. I concur with the hon. Gentleman's view that the Bill is an excellent piece of drafting and that it is well understood.

I was asked about electronic consultation. All the tax law rewrite project drafts and draft Bills are published in paper form, announced in press releases in paper form and are accessible to everyone in every way.

Finally, I thank all the professional bodies, the Inland Revenue team, the tax law rewrite team and the Members of Parliament involved in the tax law rewrite project. I also thank all those hon. Members who have stayed in the Chamber this evening and made this debate so fascinating, if a little varied at times. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Mid-Term Review of the Common Agricultural Policy

[Relevant Documents: European Union Documents No. 7964/00, Special Report No. 8/2000 of the Court of Auditors on the Community measures for the disposal of butterfat, No. 12457/01, Special Report No. 6/2001 of the Court of Auditors on milk quotas and No. 12782/02, Special Report No. 5/2002 of the Court of Auditors on extensification premium and payment schemes in the common organisation of the market for beef and veal. The Third Report of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee, Session 2002–03, on The Mid-term Review of the Common Agricultural Policy (HC 151).]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): I must tell the House that Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the official Opposition.

6.52 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Elliot Morley): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Union documents No. 10879/02, Commission Communication on the Mid-Term Review of the Common Agricultural Policy, No. 10896/02, Commission working document containing a report on milk quotas and No. COM (03) 23, draft Council Regulations on the reform of the Common Agricultural Policy; supports the Government's objective, to work for a sustainable Common Agricultural Policy which contributes to prosperous rural areas, enhances the natural environment, and provides high-quality, safe food and high animal welfare standards, a fair and competitive environment for farmers and better value for money for taxpayers and consumers; welcomes the European Commission's proposals on reform of the Common Agricultural Policy, in particular the proposals to decouple payments from production, to move from production-linked subsidies to wider agri-environment and rural development measures, and for further market reform, while lessening the adverse impact on trading opportunities to less-developed countries; but regrets that the proposals in several areas did not go further, that they include a complex and potentially unfair mechanism for transferring funds towards agri-environment and rural development measures and, on dairy reform, that they do not meet the requirement of the Berlin agreement that there would be a mid-term review 'with the aim of allowing the present quota arrangements to run out after 2006'.

The European Commission's proposals on common agricultural policy reform, published on 22 January, give us a real opportunity to set down a sustainable basis for European agriculture policy. As we said in response to the Commission's initial discussion document last July, the Government strongly support the direction of those proposals. They will enable us to lay the foundations for a sustainable and internationally acceptable CAP, which will command the support of all stakeholders in the enlarged European Union. However, we have some significant criticisms of the package—I will come to them later—but we believe that, in general, the reforms are going in the right direction. Of course there is much work to be done before we can be sure that we have fully evaluated those proposals. Finding a fair, practical and acceptable outcome will not be easy.

Against that background, there are three key points on which I want to focus: the importance of securing changes to the CAP that bring real benefits to all our farmers; the importance of the EU taking a strong and forward-looking stance in the World Trade Organisation negotiations; and the need to take account of the wider international context.

We must take this opportunity to reform if we are to avoid further environmental damage, regenerate our rural areas and support our farmers in ways that allow them to plan ahead with confidence. There are real benefits to United Kingdom farmers in those proposals. In particular, decoupling support from production will be a massive advance for us, not least because it will improve the financial position of farmers. They will continue to receive much the same level of support as they do now, but they will no longer have to stick to certain production patterns to do so. As a result, they will be free to optimise, rather than being driven to maximise, their output. Of course they will have a great deal of flexibility in their businesses.

Decoupling will have wider benefits, too. Our farming will come closer to its markets, and it will be more efficient and more environmentally sustainable, as well as being more profitable. Research commissioned by my Department and by the Commission concludes that incomes will rise as a result of decoupling. The CAP will be simpler to administer because of the major reduction in bureaucracy that will follow these proposals. Reducing the overregulation of farmers is a key outcome that we should aim for.

Decoupling will lead to changes in farming practices. In some cases, those changes may be significant, or have significant effects on upstream or downstream activities. The implications for extensive beef production in some parts of the European Community—including the less favoured areas—are one area of concern. We will have to explore flexibility in the regulations as a way of dealing with specific sectoral or regional problems.

Agriculture is both the prize and the stumbling block in the WTO Doha development round. The EU should seize the initiative and put pressure on the United States and others to change their protectionist policies. A good outcome on agriculture will unlock a wide range of opportunities for developing countries. By contrast, stalemate in agriculture could put the round in jeopardy and therefore deny us the gains that we could make in agriculture and in other sectors. Delay, evasion and prevarication are not in our interests. We must acknowledge that September's WTO ministerial meeting in Cancun is a real deadline. We must prepare for it accordingly.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire): The Minister refers to the widely welcomed change in direction that will lead to decoupling of payments. However, there are risks associated with that, as I am sure the Minister would agree. One particular risk is land abandonment. How might that risk be tackled?

Mr. Morley: My hon. Friend asks a reasonable question. If there are direct payments, issues to do with stocking arise. I think that my hon. Friend is alluding to that. We can deal with such problems through our agri-environmental approach. On some issues, such as upland management, the agri-environmental approach can be a more appropriate management tool than production support, which can distort markets and cause all sorts of problems. I assure my hon. Friend that we will take his concerns into account.

Andrew George (St. Ives): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Morley: Briefly. I want to keep my contribution brief because this is a brief debate.

Andrew George: I appreciate the Minister's willingness to give way. Following the previous intervention, I wonder whether the Government have made any assessment of the impact, on tenant farmers, rents and land values, of decoupling and direct payments to the farm simply for being a farm. Is the Minister concerned that there could be a hike in rents and land values that would put many tenant farmers in difficulty?

Mr. Morley: Some of the effects of decoupling are unknown. It does not necessarily follow that there will be a sharp hike in rents. There are changes in the proposals that would benefit tenant farmers. I am sure that we will touch on them in the debate. We will have to think carefully about certain issues and I accept that the proposals contain some unanswered questions. We will continue to debate such points among ourselves and in consultation with farming representatives.

We must not overlook the wider international dimension of CAP reform. Seen from the point of view of developing countries, our policies—and those of the US and other developed countries—deny them the opportunity to exploit their natural competitive advantages and trade their way out of poverty. CAP reform has to be part of the EU's efforts to help the poorer countries of the world to improve their lot. For all those reasons, the Government broadly welcome the proposals. However, we have a number of significant concerns that need to be addressed. I will run through them.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (South-West Norfolk): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Morley: I will, but I will make this the last intervention.

Mrs. Shephard: The Minister knows the concerns of sugar beet farmers. He is talking about careful negotiations at the WTO. What words of comfort has he for sugar beet farmers—on alternative uses of sugar beet, for example? Sugar beet production may be phased out in this country.

Mr. Morley: As the hon. Lady knows, changes will inevitably occur in the sugar regime. The agreement on the sugar regime means that it will run until 2006. However, we cannot ignore the implications of decoupling for the sugar regime. I agree that there is an important role for sugar in industrial crops, such as ethanol fuels and in other forms of industrial production. I know that research programmes at the Central Science Laboratory have been examining the whole issue of industrial crops, and I agree that we need to consider how we can broaden the opportunities for farmers and, in particular, for those who are involved in the sugar sector. I take that point seriously.

Although we support the general proposition that there needs to be a switch from the first to the second pillar of the CAP—from production-based support to agri-environment and rural development measures—we feel that the proposals should go further in that direction than the EU is proposing. I also support the view that the existing system needs to be considerably simplified. The proposals being made are very complex.

We also have problems with the specific approach proposed by the Commission. It appears to put the burden of reductions very heavily on a minority of member states, including the United Kingdom and Germany. That cannot be right in relation to how the reforms should be put in place. Their impact should be much more fairly distributed. Moreover, some of the proposals would put the burden of change on some of the more efficient farmers that have a viable long-term future. We run the risk of turning the clock back and driving farms to split up into less competitive units.

At the January meeting of the Agriculture and Fisheries Council, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State argued that we needed a simple system that applied the same rate or reduction to everyone. It must be fair and easily understood by farmers, and easy for our administrative systems to cope with. He also explained our serious problems with the Commission's proposed distribution key for the reallocation of rural development money between the member states as a result of the proposed modulation. This takes no account of the fact that the existing budget is not distributed on anything like a reasonable or equitable basis. The Commission proposals do nothing to correct this. We shall certainly want to press that point very hard.

It is ridiculous that a member state with an agricultural and rural sector as large as that in the United Kingdom receives only 3.5 per cent. of the current rural development budget. The Commission proposals would make the situation even worse. That is clearly not acceptable to us. The distribution of money raised through modulation must, at least, start to redress historic funding inequalities in the allocation of pillar 2 resources

We are also disappointed that the Commission proposals do not start modulation until 2006. If there really are barriers to an earlier start to the new system, I believe that more needs to be done to encourage member states to take better advantage of the existing voluntary system and to provide more flexibility within the system. One way or another, the rates of modulation need to be pitched so that they allow continued implementation of the rural development programme that we are developing in the application of modulation and into which we are putting more money.

Andrew George: I thank the Minister for giving way. It is important that interventions are taken as they help to make the Government accountable.

I agree with the Minister entirely in his criticisms about how the proposals for modulation have been drawn up, so what alliances will the UK Government seek to form with other member states to drive through the kind of reforms that he and I would like to take place?

Mr. Morley: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point. To get change, we need to seek the agreement of other member states. Other than ourselves, I think that Germany is the only other country that is currently using the voluntary procedures. France tried that, but its scheme ran into all sorts of problems. They applied 20 per cent. maximum modulation to some farms and it appears that the French did not have the schemes to spend the money on. It was not the most brilliant of programmes.

Germany certainly supports our views. Other countries also support our views on how the proposals should be changed. Many Scandinavian countries strongly believe that there should be a shift from production support to rural development support. Hon. Members will probably be aware that part of the Commission proposal is that not all the proceeds of modulation will go to rural development. Some of the proceeds will go into paying for restructuring of other aspects of the CAP. One can see some logic in that, but it is a pity that the way in which the modulation is constructed and pitched will reduce the amount of funds available for rural developments, which we think is where the money should be switched. Clearly, there will be considerable discussion on how that is applied and about the details.

Finally, in terms of our concerns, we find some of the proposals related to the reform of the dairy regime very disappointing. While I strongly support the Commission's approach in relation to extending and rebalancing the price cuts in this sector, I have serious concerns about the suggestion that the dairy quota regime should be extended for a further seven years. The Commission has proposed changes that go some way down the road we shall need to travel if we are to remove quotas entirely and to improve our competitive position in world markets. The United Kingdom's views are well known. We would welcome an orderly phasing out of milk quotas, and it seems that member states and the Commission are moving to a position in which they accept that milk quotas will end. If so, the sooner we do that, the better it will be, rather than extending it in this way.

David Burnside (South Antrim): As the Minister comes to the end of his concerns, will he comment on a major concern in Northern Ireland, where our farms are smaller than those in England, Scotland and Wales, with the 32,000 farms averaging out at about 60 acres? The biggest impact of the reduction of £340 million between 2006 and 2012 will fall on the small farm sector, and that is a major concern of the Ulster Farmers Union.

Mr. Morley: I understand that. The hon. Gentleman is probably aware that the Commission's proposal includes a threshold limit in which there will be no modulation, so there will be some protection in its proposals for the smaller farms. There are arguments for and against. We have applied modulation in this country across the board. We had some debate about that when we were originally discussing how modulation should be applied. There were proposals in our own country that there should be a similar approach of a threshold in relation to smaller units. However, when one looks at the detail one sees that there are all sorts of problems. There is the risk of encouraging people to divide farms into small units to get on to the threshold.

We felt that the standard, across-the-board modulation, which is simple, easy to understand and easy to apply, was the best approach. We believe that the Commission should take this approach as well. As it happens, this system, given the structure of Northern Ireland farms, which I know very well, offers them some protection.

Mr. Michael Weir (Angus): There are similar concerns in Scotland. Is the Minister convinced that the level, which I think is €5,000, is too low to affect smaller farms? There is also serious concern in Scotland that the medium-sized farms in constituencies such as mine, rather than the larger and very small farms, will be hard hit by modulation, because they will lose a considerable part of their income. Does the hon. Gentleman have anything to say on that?

Mr. Morley: I think that the €5,000 issue is a matter for debate. At this stage in the proposals, obviously all the details are debatable in the negotiations. We shall listen to views that we receive about the threshold levels.

With regard to medium-sized farms, if there is a percentage modulation the larger units and those receiving the most in subsidies are the ones contributing most in modulation. So there is an element of fairness in the way in which it is applied, in that it recognises the level of subsidy that individual units receive.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): The Minister said that he is opposed to the extension of the milk quota to 2014. I hope that he will understand that for those farmers who have quota, which include those who are still actively engaged in dairy farming and some who own quota for which they paid but who lease it out as part of their income, there is a need, as with any other business, to be able to plan for the medium and long term. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will qualify his remarks by saying, if he is opposed to 2014, what he thinks is the optimum time. Farmers, particularly in the dairy sector, are very concerned, and deserve clarification. If I catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I may say more about that.

Mr. Morley: The Government have made it clear many times that quota should be phased out. That can come as no surprise to the dairy sector. The hon. Lady will know that there are mixed opinions in that sector, but many people think that quotas have stultified its development by acting as a brake on innovation and expansion, and they would welcome their demise. I accept that people have invested in milk quota and we would not expect to see them end overnight. I agree that a reasonable date should be set which we can work towards to phase out quota. Although we think that the proposed dates are too far away, there are also proposals gradually to increase the amount of quota for each member state. That will liberalise the regime to an extent. We think that 2006 would be a more realistic date for the phase out of milk quotas.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire): With a reduction in the intervention price for dairy products, the value of quota could reduce to almost zero. The National Farmers Union anticipates a fall of more than 30 per cent. in milk prices. With farmers finding it difficult to produce milk that covers their costs, will any dairy farmers be left in Britain?

Mr. Morley: I believe that there will be because the dairy sector can adjust to the changes. Of course there are structural problems in the sector. My noble Friend Lord Whitty recently chaired the meetings of the food chain initiative. It has addressed some of the sector's problems, such as its seasonality and the slump in prices because of that. It has also considered ways to even out production and the low value products that milk goes into.

The issues can be addressed. I accept what the hon. Gentleman says about the value of milk quota. It is likely to fall. There is the added complication of the recent European Court ruling on non-producing holders of milk quota. They will have to divest themselves of it, which means that a lot of quota will come on to the market, and that is bound to influence prices. Having said that, there are complicated proposals in the mid-term review on calculating entitlement in terms of what quota someone may hold in future. That is unsatisfactory because it encourages people to accumulate quota on the basis that that might influence the support payments on the quota that they hold. In turn, that might remove quota from the market, especially in terms of lease availability. So there are all sorts of complications in relation to quota. That illustrates why we would be better off by moving away from them. We find it impossible to understand the logic that has driven the Commission to propose a further two years of price cuts on milk and an extra seven years of quotas. That is not appealing.

Those are the main criticisms, but we must not lose sight of the positive elements of the Commission's proposals, in particular the benefits of decoupling. That is an important gain and certainly one worth having. I also accept that much technical work has to be done on the proposals before the Council is in a position to assess the details of what they mean to our farmers. However, the reforms are crucial to our ability to deliver viable and sustainable farming in Europe and to withstand increasing competition from the rest of the world. That is why we need to get on with the negotiations, to reach an agreement and to address the details of the proposals. We will robustly make the case for UK farmers when the proposals are clearly against our national interest and we will argue for changes to be made. We will also look closely at how some of them are meant to work, including the problems inherent in the details and the possible bureaucracy that they might create. We will, of course, listen to the agricultural sector and other stakeholders, and will listen closely to hon. Members who wish to comment on such issues, especially in relation to their constituents. The CAP reforms are long overdue, but they are going in the right direction, as they put farming on a much more sustainable footing.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): I beg to move, To leave out from "Policy" in line 5 to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"recognises the need for a substantial recovery in farm incomes from the present low base to a level at which UK farmers are earning sustainable and competitive returns; supports the objective of achieving prosperous rural areas, an enhanced natural environment and provision of high-quality, safe food and high animal welfare standards; welcomes the European Commission's appreciation of the need to reform the Common Agricultural Policy, which absorbs half the EU budget, and recalls Government failures in this regard; further welcomes the proposals to decouple payments from production, and for further market reform; but has deep reservations about the effects of the current proposals on UK agriculture and recognises that the British people are increasingly hostile to a system that penalises both UK taxpayers and farmers; believes that dairy regime reform should provide greater opportunity for the UK dairy sector to add value to their product through producer-based processing; notes that the Commission proposals involve a potentially unfair mechanism for transferring funds towards agri-environmental and rural development measures; and urges the Government to use all the means at its disposal to ensure that these proposals are redrafted in the interests of UK farmers and consumers."

Calls for common agricultural policy reform have been the habit of politicians in the United Kingdom and across Europe as long as the common agricultural policy has existed. Crises, watersheds and turning points have come and gone, so the House will understand my scepticism about the likelihood or even possibility of reforming the CAP in our nation's farming interests. Similar scepticism among farmers is not just the product of realism about Machiavellian Euro politics, but is spurred by the demoralisation of British agriculture in recent years. Although it is understandable for reasons of political expediency, it is wholly unacceptable that the Government failed to mention in their motion the desperate state of UK farming. Our amendment properly sets that out, thus putting the debate in its proper context.

As the whole House knows, British agriculture is in crisis by any measure. Farm incomes are about a third below their 1995 level, a fall greater than that in any other European country. In 2001-02, input costs rose by 1.8 per cent. in Britain, whereas they have fallen in Europe as a whole. The number of people leaving the industry continues to grow, bank borrowing is still increasing, and in most sectors farm-gate prices are insufficient to give farmers a real chance of earning a decent living. British agriculture is in a desperate state, but things are different for our so-called partners in continental Europe – the kind of partners who are ever ready to take commercial advantage of catastrophes such as BSE or foot and mouth, and conspire to frustrate the Government's half-hearted efforts to protect our national interests. Conservatives recognise that there can be no viable British countryside without viable British agriculture.

It is unclear whether the Government share our view, but it is certain that most Europeans are not faintly interested in the survival of British farming. It is clear, however, that the CAP has encouraged highly intensive production-driven agriculture, as the Minister acknowledged in his opening remarks. Over-production, for example in the beef and dairy sectors, and price distortions have led to a perverse agricultural marketplace.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim): Does the hon. Gentleman acknowledge that to operate a viable farm business such as an intensive farm business in Northern Ireland and other parts of the United Kingdom, many small farmers have land on conacre year on year? It is not clear where the benefit of the new change will be felt. Will farmers benefit from the land that they own or rent on conacre, or will the benefit go to their landlord?

Mr. Hayes: There are genuine issues about whether the payments will go to the owner of the land or the farmer, and the hon. Gentleman is right to raise them. The hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) made a good, fair point about tenant farmers, which the Government need to address. We expect purposeful and robust answers from the Minister to clarify the sensible point made by the hon. Member for East Antrim (Mr. Beggs).

Mr. Morley: It may help the House if I answer straight away. Under the proposals, the payments go to the farmer, whether he is a tenant or landowner. If he is a tenant, he has the right to payment if he moves to new land, which gives him some protection.

Mr. Hayes: That is, of course, right, but there are often difficulties in the relationship between owner and farmer, and they need to be ironed out. If payments go to the farmer, they can be moved around as the Minister suggests, but we need clarity about the different responsibilities and opportunities that exist for owners and farmers of land. I think that that is the point that the hon. Member for East Antrim was making, and it is a good and solid point.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Hayes: I must now make some progress, but I shall give way again later if I have time to do so.

Farmers, often against their instincts, have pursued a regime that has resulted in a distorted market with an increased propensity for disasters, all at enormous cost to the British taxpayer. No one can blame farmers for dancing to a tune composed by others, nor honestly claim that the process has been led by consumer demand. Through its payment structure, the CAP has stimulated larger farms in the UK. I am mindful of the large, efficient arable farms in the east of England, many of which are situated in my constituency. They are good businesses run by good people, so it is a bitter irony that the Commission's modulation proposals will penalise large, efficient farms—in other words, British agriculture, in which farm size is larger than the European average.

Mr. Roger Williams: Last night, the National Farmers Union told us that the proposals abolished the €300,000 ceiling, yet the Minister said that there was some disincentive in respect of the efficient holdings that the hon. Gentleman is talking about.

Mr. Hayes: I can clarify that issue for the hon. Gentleman. That ceiling or cap existed in the proposals issued in July 2002. It was dropped in the proposals published at the beginning of this year, as I am sure the Minister will confirm by nodding, but he is right that there is concern that some member states want to reintroduce the ceiling. There is enthusiasm among some continental Europeans for reintroducing the cap, which would do even more damage to large farms, as he suggests.

It is clear that British farmers who happen to be large farmers will lose almost 20 per cent. of their income as a result of the direct payments. Worse still, it is true that some people want to reintroduce the cap to which the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) referred. In general, there is a strong case for allocating single payments to the farmer. As the hon. Member for East Antrim suggested, the complex issue of transfer of entitlements will need to be resolved where landlords and tenants are involved. As I said, it is important for the Government to develop a scheme that fairly reflects the legitimate interests of the relevant parties.

Mr. Beggs: Will the hon. Gentleman allow me to intervene again?

Mr. Hayes: Yes, but I want to make progress as this is a short debate. If I may, I shall ask the hon. Gentleman to keep his remarks fairly short. I shall then try to deal with them.

Mr. Beggs: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way again. We have an entirely different system in Northern Ireland. Tenant farmers have been mentioned and the situation is relatively clear in that respect. However, most farmers in Northern Ireland own freeholds and rent land from other farmers who are not active. That is where clear guidance has to be given.

Mr. Hayes: I would never attempt to second-guess the hon. Gentleman's legendary expertise in all matters Northern Irish, but I heard what he said, as I am sure the Minister did. Clearly, those issues will need to be taken into account when such matters are dealt with in further European negotiations.

The current reform of the CAP is motivated not by a desire to address the sort of problems that have already been mentioned in this debate, but by the realisation that maintenance of the CAP in its current form is incompatible with enlargement. For that reason, in addition to modulation, we face decoupling—a cocktail that, in its proposed form, is likely to be highly disadvantageous to British farming.

There is a good argument for recognising the special role that farmers play as custodians of the countryside through agri-environmental payments, but such payments must be equitable, enforceable and cost-neutral. To ensure that they are equitable, a baseline must be established that recognises past good practice and ensures that British farming is not measured merely by the unrepresentative post-BSE and foot-and-mouth years.

Mr. Richard Bacon (South Norfolk): My hon. Friend mentioned baselines. Foot and mouth and BSE are two diseases, but my constituents suffered very heavily as a result of classical swine fever. Is it not wrong that farmers who suffer as a result of such diseases and therefore have very atypical years should be penalised because those years are treated as a baseline?

Mr. Hayes: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I am familiar with the problems of that kind that have been suffered by pig farmers in Norfolk. The payment will be calculated on the basis of the physical facts of successful claims made over three years: 2000, 2001 and 2002. One or more of those years can be dropped if it is felt to be unrepresentative or exceptional, but the point is that all those years were exceptionally bad for British farming. The baseline that will be constructed will therefore be implicitly unfair to British agriculture, and my hon. Friend is right to highlight that point.

Measuring the environmental impact and the social and cultural importance of farming requires a balance sheet for agriculture. I recommend to the House and to the nation Lincolnshire's Charter for Agriculture and Horticulture, which provides an excellent model.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire): A fine document.

Mr. Hayes: My hon. Friend has obviously read it. It suggests such a calculation of the true value of food farming and horticulture, leading to an annual statement. To be respected, and therefore enforceable, any system must be founded on such a degree of empiricism. The criteria against which payments are made should be fairly scrutinised and cost-neutral to the industry. Farmers have faced a bureaucratic burden that has increased overheads at a time when incomes are falling. But if the integrated admission and control scheme—IACS—is complicated, imagine what a multi-faceted, multi-tiered environmentally friendly payment system might mean in terms of paperwork. Simplicity is crucial. A straightforward system of single payments based on a clearly defined, understandable set of criteria is the best means of re-establishing a demoralised industry's faith in the new regime.

Farming's problems are typified by the plight of the dairy sector. It is almost impossible to make money producing raw milk when farm-gate prices barely exceed the cost of production. The only way in which a viable future for the British dairy industry can be established is by creating a climate in which farmers can add value to their base product. This means collaborative, producer-based processing. The Minister—the whole House—will know that Britain is unusual in terms of the concentration of processing capacity outside the industry. That means that the dairy sector is particularly vulnerable to price pressures, and this must be addressed in the reform of the regime.

Dairy farmers also need action on bovine tuberculosis. The National Farmers Union said:

"The disease is completely out of control and the government have no policy."

In 2002, 16,066 new cases were confirmed, and if we wait until the end of the trials, the whole of the west country will be a hot spot. It is well established that badgers are one—I say only one—of the various causes of the spread of TB, yet the badgers culled so far have been killed to no effect. What vaccination measures are the Government considering? How quickly can reliable tests using the latest science be put in place? How bad will the crisis be allowed to get—with farmers suffering the horror of TB outbreaks and ever more taxpayers' money being spent—before the Government consider a limited cull of badgers outside the trial areas, when there is clear evidence of the infection being passed between species?

Mr. Bill Wiggin (Leominster): The Minister will be aware of how concerned I have been about the crisis facing cattle owners in the United Kingdom. There are several problems with the current situation. The Krebs trials, as they are known, will probably not produce a conclusive result. The huge amount spent on research into tuberculosis is spent mainly on human tuberculosis. Does my hon. Friend agree that the real problem is that a commercially viable vaccine might not be found? If one is found, the Government must insist that it is produced, or in some way make it economically viable to produce. I hope that my hon. Friend will continue to pay a great deal of attention to this crisis, which is having a big impact on dairy and beef producers across the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hayes: I am tempted to say that that is why I included the issue in my speech. My hon. Friend is absolutely right to say that there is a profound problem. He is also right about vaccinations, which is why I challenged the Minister on that matter. I know that the Select Committee will look at the question in some detail. My hon. Friend is a notable—some would say inspirational—member of that Committee, and he will bring the diligence that he has already shown in defending his farmers over this issue to the tasks that lie ahead. [Interruption.] I was pausing for breath as I thought about those dreadful problems.

Other important questions deserve equally clear answers. It is proposed to reduce the single payment between 2006 and 2012. As the Under-Secretary knows, the UK is one of the few member states that operate a voluntary modulation scheme to fund rural development. Does he agree that, to be fair to UK farmers, the current rates must not increase unless and until there is a parity of rates in a compulsory modulation scheme throughout the EU?

It is proposed to use a proportion of the amount arising from payment cuts to make budget savings that are destined for future market needs. Will the Under-Secretary guarantee that any such digression must be at the flat rate, with no de minimis exemption for small farms in the EU? Farmers rightly highlight their anxiety that the UK will suffer most from modulation and digression proposals because it has relatively large farms.

It is proposed to establish compulsory, permanent set-aside. Does the Under-Secretary realise that that is incoherent and unnecessary, and should be fought? Again, farmers have stated their opposition to the proposal and to the proposed ban on growing energy crops on set-aside land. The Chirac-Schröder agreement on CAP finance in October means that little money will be left for rural development. How will the farm advisory service and related measures be funded?

The British people have had enough of the wasteful, bureaucratic, inequitable common agricultural policy. Despite their rhetoric, the Government have not even taken up CAP reform where the Conservatives left off. The Under-Secretary looks sceptical, but I remind him that when in government, our Ministers produced "The Case for Radical Reform" of the CAP. It received little support from the then Opposition, of whose agriculture team the Under-Secretary, for whom I have a great deal of respect, was a prominent member. The Conservatives were determined to grasp the nettle, but the current Administration do not share that determination.

The motion simply expresses the Under-Secretary's regrets. He talked about taking robust action to defend the British position and highlighting some of the issues that hon. Members raised. However, the motion contains no call to action or fighting talk. Regrets come cheap and hon. Members will share my doubts about how hard he will fight and where he will draw the line on behalf of our farmers.

The tortuous negotiations that surround the reform are emblematic of Euro-politics. They are never straightforward, always esoteric and seldom in Britain's interests. Britons see their farmers facing ruin while they subsidise tobacco growers, non-existent olive farmers and bloated Brussels bureaucrats. The British people pay more than £1.5 billion a year for the privilege of being part of that club.

Mr Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): Daylight robbery.

Mr. Hayes: I would not put it in such lurid terms because I always speak with moderation. However, the British people's total contribution in 2000 was £1.8 billion and half the EU's budget goes on the CAP. In Blair's Britain, we all face the awful prospect of being robbed, but choosing to be robbed is extraordinary. Those whose nights are plagued by the European dream justify it on the basis that there is no alternative, and that some mythical, predetermined course of history makes closer and more expensive involvement in a failed collective policy for European agriculture inevitable. We are also told that our national freedom is irretrievable and that we have travelled too far down the road to national oblivion to turn back.

I do not share that defeatist mentality, and neither do most Britons. I was about to say that I did not share that Vichy mentality, but I did not want to make faint hearts flutter. The CAP must be radically reformed or die. This is the last chance for reform. Surely the Minister will not return to the House with a half-hearted package that will disappoint both Members and our farming industry, and tell us that further reform is on the cards. We have heard that so often before.

I am proud of British food and British farming. Agriculture anchors rural communities to the land. The availability of agricultural employment gives opportunities to young people and manual workers who would otherwise be excluded from the rural economy and from the countryside itself. But, even more than that, agriculture is at the heart of our consciousness and culture. It assures the continuity of our agrarian history and binds man to nature.

British farmers deserve better than these proposals, and Britain's countryside deserves a fair deal. The Government must fight for a decent future for British farming—or step aside and allow those of us who will fight to take on the people and policies that threaten rural Britain.

Viable British agriculture, policies that are accountable to the British people, and a living, working countryside—those are our goals; that is our mission. Conservatives will never be deterred from battling for British farming.

Mr. Anthony D. Wright (Great Yarmouth): As many Members will know, Great Yarmouth is one of the UK's major tourist resorts, but a large proportion is rural and there are many arable farmers. Over the past few years, one of my constituents, Richard Hirst, has raised several issues with me, one being the mid-term review of the common agricultural policy.

Mr. Hirst tells me that, while he does not disagree with the principle of decoupling payments from production, the current proposals will have a severe effect on farmers like him who have not used their entire farms to grow eligible crops but have engaged in a sensible rotation including cereals, sugar beet, potatoes, vining peas and other vegetable crops. Over the past three years about 35 per cent. of the cropping area of his farm has been eligible for area aid payments, and about 6 per cent. for set-aside payments.

The new proposals suggest a single payment—to which Mr. Hirst does not object—based on the average claim for area aid between 2000 and 2002. That means that he will receive a much smaller payment than neighbours who have made much higher claims in the past. He will also have to set aside 10 per cent. of the cropped area to qualify for the payment, with no restrictions on the cropping that he can undertake. That means that a neighbour could receive a much higher payment, and then start introducing other crops and offer his produce for sale for a lower price than Mr. Hirst can offer, in the knowledge that he is receiving a greater subsidy per hectare than Mr. Hirst can receive. Mr. Hirst will also have to set aside more land than he sets aside now, which will also reduce his income significantly.

At present, Mr. Hirst is trying to do all the things that DEFRA suggests. He is growing crops for specific markets, mostly with contracts with processors or as near to the end user as he can get. He has land in countryside stewardship, and is about to undertake a study with Birds Eye to look at the possibility of producing crops in a sustainable manner. Because he is doing all that, he will be severely penalised—to such an extent that he suggests it might be better for him to give up farming altogether.

Mr. Hirst has put to me two options that he believes may mitigate some of the proposals. If the Minister cannot deal with them now, perhaps he will write to me. The first suggestion is that payments should be based on all eligible land, not just that claimed for arable area payments in the previous two years. The set-aside levels would again be based on those of the previous two years. The second is that, if the proposals are not changed, there should be a restriction on cropping preventing farms from undercutting those who grow alternative crops.

I would appreciate a reply from the Minister. I am sure that farmers in my constituency appreciate the work that he is trying to do for farmers, not just in my constituency but in the UK as a whole.

Andrew George (St. Ives): I appreciate the Government responding to the European Scrutiny Committee by enabling this important debate on the future of agriculture in Britain, so that the House can give the Government a mandate to bat hard in Europe on behalf of our agriculture. It is clear that the proposals for the mid-term review, although welcome to some extent, do not go far enough. In many people's eyes they constitute a timid fudge, compared with what we should be seeking to secure. It is also clear that the Government need to form alliances in the manner that certain other countries have publicly sought to do, in order to secure the better outcome for British farmers that the hon. Member for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Wright) spoke of a moment ago when discussing one of his constituents.

Although the documents before us are somewhat technical and complicated, and use language that will seem opaque to those who are not linked to the farming industry, they relate to the heart of the British people's relationship with the land, and to their psyche. To some extent, there still exists in the rural community a whimsical romanticism and a sense of utopia: a sense of man in close relationship with, and being challenged by, nature; a sense of the connection between man and his environment. [Interruption.] I mean "man" in the general sense—mankind. Indeed, this issue is fundamental to the way in which we look at agriculture in this country; it is at the heart of our identity.

It is important to reflect on the fact that, as any agricultural economist knows, it is inevitable that farms get larger over time. Over the past two centuries, concerns have been raised and protests made about the drift towards ever-larger farms. Of course, as people spend less of their disposable income on food, it is inevitable that farmers need to make more money from their holdings if they are to retain the same living standards as the rest of the population. The inescapable result is that farms become ever larger, which is why it is important that the Government intervene. If we are to retain a connection between rural society, the countryside and the primary industry that occupies most of that landscape, and if we are to prevent the countryside from being turned into prairie and ranch, in my view and the view of many who represent rural constituencies it is important that appropriate interventions be made to ensure that small family farms have a future.

Despite what the Minister may say about the need to reflect and protect the interests of larger farms, and about the impact of these proposals on such farms, the fact is that in a year when 15,000 farmers went out of business—the largest number who have done so since the second world war—there is serious concern that that process is likely to accelerate over time under the current agricultural structure. Indeed, certain aspects of these proposals are liable further to accelerate that process, which is why many people are concerned about them.

There is cross-party consensus that the proposals on decoupling are welcome: to break away from production payments and to move towards single payments is essential. Will the Minister tell us how long taxpayers can be expected to tolerate payments to farmers for, in effect, doing nothing? I realise that there are cross-compliance issues, but farmers will be paid merely for being farmers. The European Scrutiny Committee felt that the point should be covered in the debate.

The Government must have made an assessment of how long the current arrangement is likely to last, so it would be useful to know their view. UK society is largely urban, so the majority of taxpayers are town dwellers. They will find it less and less credible to pay farmers merely to be farmers. The Government should link management contracts to those payments so that they can be used to deliver the public, animal welfare, environmental and other outcomes that, for example, the Government seek to achieve through the creation of environmentally sensitive areas and other types of scheme. The public would then see genuine benefits from payments to farmers.

The Minister drew attention to the significant unfairness in the system of modulated payments. It is fundamentally wrong that such payments should go to Brussels and be distributed through Brussels rather than a UK authority. I know that my colleague in the Scottish Executive, the Minister for Environment and Rural Development, has joined the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs in making strong representations to other European leaders and to the Commission. The arrangement is wrong. British farmers make significant payments to the central European fund but receive back only a fraction of them in the form of rural development and agri-environment scheme funds. British agriculture quite rightly protests that it does not operate on a level playing field in relation to the rest of the EU.

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. There will be inequities not only within countries but between them. Europe could absorb money from our farmers and our industry and then reallocate it to other countries. The money will be lost not only to farming but to the nation. The hon. Gentleman's point is worth amplifying.

Andrew George: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his support. I urge the Minister to tell his European counterparts that we require national modulation schemes whereby funds are disbursed in the country in which they are raised. Instead of taking a uniform approach on the exemptions—the floors and ceilings—that apply, it would be far better to have variations that reflect the structure of farm-holding in each EU state. We need genuinely to devolve some of those decisions, especially on the management of the system. I urge the Minister to pursue that point in his negotiations.

Mrs. Browning: I do not disagree with the hon. Gentleman about looking at the differences, but as a Liberal Democrat spokesman will he please understand that a single market—for which his party is constantly pressing—means uniformity? That makes it so much harder to achieve any distinction between different markets, methods of farming and sizes of farms in EU countries.

Andrew George: I am grateful for the hon. Lady's intervention but her party took us into the single market and encouraged us to take the line of bland uniformity that Liberal Democrats do not accept. As with fishing and many other policy areas, of course we need to agree fundamental reforms at the centre, but Liberal Democrats would like to see devolution of the responsibility for the delivery of those policies. This may come as news to the hon. Lady, but our policy has remained consistent. We cannot take a uniform approach to agriculture, fishing and other industries across the whole of Europe and say that it must apply however difficult the circumstances. We must have a policy that reflects agreement on fundamental principles, then applies them appropriately in a devolved way in each nation state.

As to the dairy regime, if the Government favour—of the four options available in the mid-term review—a rapid phasing out of quotas by 2006, in the Commission's own estimate that would result in the price of raw milk at the farm gate falling by 38.5 per cent. on the basis of the 2001 benchmark. Dairy farms in this country are considerably larger and much more efficient than in many other countries, but they are barely able to make a living from current milk prices. It is important that the Minister addresses the likely impact of a further 38.5 per cent. price reduction. It could bring a ranching of the UK dairy sector, with much larger units divorced from farming and the local community in a way that has not been seen before. Having broken up Milk Marque, which we argued was inappropriate, perhaps the Government need to grab the bull by the horns and address farm gate prices. It is clear that dairy farmers do not receive a fair income that meets their production costs.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): That is a desperately important point for dairy farmers, in terms of the asset value of quota and the revenue stream from milk prices, which are still far too low. Does my hon. Friend agree that one problem is the oligopoly in the supermarket sector, which will get worse if Safeway is taken over by one of the other big players? Does he agree that Safeway's acquisition needs to be put to the Competition Commission straight away?

Andrew George: I entirely agree. There is no point pussyfooting around. It is essential that the Government seek to intervene, make their view clear and ensure that the matter is referred to the Competition Competition. Whichever of the interested parties goes forward with the purchase of Safeway, that acquisition is likely to have a detrimental effect on farmers and farm-gate prices.

My concern is that the Government are lurching forward piecemeal, with no real vision or passion for farming. They are timid and uncertain in negotiation and insufficiently bold and brave to make clear beforehand how they will deliver a clear vision for the future of agriculture in this country. It is not that I believe that the Secretary of State or the Minister lack commitment or do not have a passion for farming, but the real Secretary of State for agriculture is the person appointed to the post of rural tsar by the Prime Minister—Lord Haskins. The Minister and the Secretary of State are merely the managers of the Department and the real vision comes from Lord Haskins, who was recently dubbed the villain of the countryside by Country Life magazine, perhaps appropriately.

We have serious concerns about the proposals in the mid-term review. It is an inadequate and timid fudge. UK farmers have lost out and will do so further unless we have an even playing field, especially in relation to modulation. We are concerned about the fundamental divorce of agriculture from the rural community if we let reforms go ahead that would result in the prairie and the ranch. Many of us fear the ranching of the British countryside.

We have not been given enough time to debate these important changes, which are fundamental to the future of our rural communities. Matters need to be resolved by June, and I urge the Government to give us more time to debate the issues before the Council of Ministers meets to resolve them.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): I wish to add my voice to the others tonight that have urged the Minister to set out a clear path for the future of UK agriculture. It is not clear what the Department's view is when it enters negotiations on the CAP reforms. The Minister touched briefly on some aspects of agriculture, especially the dairy sector, to which I shall return, but farms are businesses and they have been through a horrendous time, what with BSE, foot and mouth and other animal diseases.

I am concerned about planning for the future and how we can sustain the family farm. We need to address the shape of agriculture in the future. Ranching is a concern, but east and mid-Devon do not have much arable farming, because the good grass that we grow is well suited to livestock farming. I would hate to think that the countryside of Devon would be overtaken by conifers or some such commodity. As much as possible, we should provide the food that we eat ourselves, and that must include meat as well as grain.

The Department's latest figures show that farm incomes have risen by 14 per cent. in real terms in 2001, although that is still 62 per cent. below the 1995 figures. Worryingly, that increase depends on £140 million of net production subsidy, with only an extra £20 million coming from the marketplace. Whatever package of reform the Government produce, I hope that they will bear in mind the fact that although the dairy sector provides 95 per cent. of our own liquid milk production, it loses out time and again in the production of value-added dairy products because we suck in masses of imports.

Mr. Morley: The hon. Lady has correctly identified one of the problems with milk, and I do not disagree with her. On prices and incomes, she is right that incomes rose by nearly 15 per cent. last year. That was the second successive year in which farm incomes rose. I do not want to be complacent about the problems facing the farming sector, but the hon. Lady and the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) both used 1995 as the baseline year. That year was very unusual, in that price cuts in arable aid meant that compensation was paid for price falls that did not take place. That element of double subsidy in 1995 means that it is a very artificial base year to use as a comparison for price falls.

Mrs. Browning: I am quoting figures provided to south-west MPs by the south-west branch of the National Farmers Union. The information provided is excellent, and is said to be "according to DEFRA". I am therefore putting into the public domain information from the Minister's own Department.

The farm business survey shows that only two sectors are in decline. Dairy is one, and it is down 21 per cent. The situation for the dairy farm is dire. In my part of Devon, dairy farms are mainly family farms. I intervened on the Minister earlier to refer to a couple with bought-in quota. They still own that quota, because they hoped that their son would keep the farm on. He has now gone to live abroad. That is typical of many families in Devon, as the next generation of people look at what their parents went through. They consider the future of farming, and decide that it is not for them. That will have a huge impact on the shape of the countryside, its environment, and our ability to produce our food.

I have flagged up to the Secretary of State, in response to recent Government papers on agriculture, that there has to be competition and that we need good quality food. We also need to know about food's production standards and origins. However, countries in the single market covered by the CAP should not sign up to policies that would lead to their ability to produce the basic commodity and the finished product being leached away. That would mean that the UK would suck in more of those imports, with all the value added.

The Government's plan for CAP reform must set out where we can diversify, add value, and make sure that there is sustainability. Farming businesses need to be able to plan. The Minister will be amazed to learn that I am a vice-president of the Devon young farmers club, some of whom are not so young. When I talk to farmers, I am encouraged by the enthusiasm of many young people. They know that they will have to do things differently, but they want to know where the industry is going. They will give up if the direction and planning are not there.

My plea to the Minister is as follows: will he ensure that the country and the House know what the national plan is? When the Government negotiate at the heart of Europe, we will then have an idea of what the future will be for farmers and for the production of own food.

8.3 pm

David Burnside (South Antrim): I start by referring to the Register of Members' Interests, in which I make it clear that I receive an annual rent from my home farm.

Mr. Beggs: Will my hon. Friend give way?

David Burnside: Very well.

Mr. Beggs: I thank my hon. Friend, but I want to take this opportunity to declare my own interest. Although I will not have time to make a speech, I have made a number of interventions, so I want to draw the attention of hon. Members to my entry in the register.

David Burnside: If we do not look at CAP reform in a much more radical way, we will encounter many problems. We joined the common market in 1970, and the two biggest losers have been the farming industry and the fishing industry.

I am the son of a farmer, and I remember that the yield on barley was about 40 cwt an acre 20 years ago. Farmers received £120 a tonne in those days, without any subsidy. They now get up to 50 or 55 cwt an acre, and receive about £60 to £70 a tonne, plus a £40 top-up. They cannot cover their costs. At present, milk hovers at around 17p, 18p or 19p, but it costs 17p to produce.

We have had the wettest winter in history, which has destroyed hay and silage production and increased the cost of feeding during the wet period. I have asked the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs whether she will press for wet weather aid, but I have had no response. Farmers deserve special wet weather aid.

International comparisons are always a bit superficial, and I am sure that the Minister will have read the report produced by the Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs after our visit to New Zealand, which is often held up as the glowing example of freeing the market. Of course that market was freed after a currency problem in the early 1980s; people did not say, "We must free farming". The currency market created a reduction in subsidises across the board in a country with a very different climate and scale of farming.

The Ulster Farmers Union makes representations to me as the Ulster Unionist farming spokesman, and it is not happy with the deal. We will lose out because of the £340 million reduction between 2006 and 2012. The system will still be semi-subsidised. Farming is in a dreadful state. The pig industry in the United Kingdom is in an absolutely dreadful state. Dairy farmers cannot cover their costs, and no one can make money from barley.

Fudging around with this type of French-German deal on CAP reform is not in the interests of British farmers. Somewhere along the line, we will have to take hold of Europe by the neck, rather than being at its heart. We will have to take hold of the Commission and get a radical reform in the EU, because British farmers can be efficient.

We have to alter the scale of farming. I am afraid that we in Northern Ireland have to learn that the 60-acre has to become the 200-acre farm; the 80-cow dairy herd has to become the 250-cow herd—the minimum herd size in New Zealand—with a man and his wife, normally, farming.

Labour has declined on farms. On my father's family farm, we employed six to seven farm labourers—farm workers, as they are now called—20 years ago. In Northern Ireland, 32,000 farms are owned by 22,000 farmers, but there are now only 2,200 farm workers. In New Zealand, farmers can make money for 10 years, sell up and go on holiday, but it is difficult to persuade a son or daughter that it is a good idea to go into farming.

[David Burnside]

Farming is a very serious state, and I am afraid that there are not enough votes in fishing and farming for this Government. That is the problem, but it is time we had a radical review of the whole system of support because it is damaging farming. We are just surviving at present. I hope that the disease problems—obviously, foot and mouth and the other diseases that have had a short-term effect on us—will not come back. We are just about hitting our production levels at present, but those in some sectors are going out of business. We need a radical reform of the CAP, not the tweaking at the fringes that is currently being done.

8.9 pm

Mr. Bill Wiggin (Leominster): I want to touch on modulation and digressivity. Modulation progressively reduces the rate at which subsidies are paid, and digressivity involves progressively increasing the rate at which modulation is applied to farmers. Comparing the figures for other countries in the EU with the equivalent figures in the United Kingdom shows how disadvantaged this country is, especially given the combined affects of modulation and digressivity—it is not an easy word for me to say.

If we consider the bands in the proposals, we see that only 4 per cent. of UK farms fall into the band of farms that currently receive less than €5,000 a year in payments—which is approximately £3,300. Farms in that group would not lose out to modulation. A total of 41 per cent. of UK farms come into the €5,000 to €50,000 band, and a total of 55 per cent. of UK farms are in the overall group receiving more than €5,000. By comparison, France receives €5.82 billion in direct payments, compared with the UK's €3.2 billion. France will do far better than the UK. The figures in the various bands show that France has 7 per cent. in the lowest band, 72 per cent. in the €5,000 to €50,000 band, but only 21 per cent.—as compared with the UK's 55 per cent.—in the overall group receiving more than €5,000. That is where the cuts will be most swingeing. The average figures for current European Union member countries show 18 per cent. in the bottom band, 57 per cent. in the next band and only 25 per cent. in the overall top group, compared with our 55 per cent. That will make a huge difference.

The milk quota regime is obstructive and blocks development and expansion in the dairy industry. A Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food report in 1999 concluded that the quota system hampered efficiency and increased productivity. However, abolishing the regime overnight would not solve the problems. Abolishing the quota system would squeeze all small farms out of business, and small and medium-sized firms would find it increasingly difficult to sell into the bulk market. Individual farmers have little marketing strength. They need to form alliances to influence policy. In particular, investing in the production of their own milk, either individually or as part of a co-operative, would mean that they would have to have more control over the milk price and over the profits between farm gate and store.

When the proposals of the mid-term review were announced, the shadow Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington), said rightly:

"The CAP is in need of reform. It is right to move to a world where farmers are free to respond to the demands of their customers rather than of governments."

He also said that, without profitable farming,

"both the wider rural economy and the landscape that we all cherish will suffer."

The importance of the figures that I read out at the beginning may have escaped the hon. Members who are sitting behind the Minister. Because of the nature and efficiency of UK farms, and because our farmers are the best in the world, we will now be penalised by the change in the regime. That is extremely serious.

I urge the Government to consider the wording of their own motion, which ends:

"'with the aim of allowing the present quota arrangements to run out after 2006'."

However, the Minister will know that those arrangements will go on to 2014.

That cannot be good for Britain. It is especially damaging for our dairy industry, which is the largest part of agricultural production in this country. It is beset by problems such as bovine tuberculosis. That is especially evil because some farmers are dependent on the compensation cheques that they received for having beasts destroyed, and there seems to be no light at the end of the tunnel. The Government have to address the issue of vaccination. I sincerely hope that the Minister will consider that before he comes before the Select Committee.

I urge the Government to reconsider the wording of their own motion and to ensure that it will be possible for quotas to end in 2006.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams), I ask him to respect the fact that the Minister requires five minutes to wind up the debate.

8.14 pm

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire): I declare my interests in agriculture that appear in the Register of Members' Interests.

I am pleased to take part in this debate. Agricultural reform and CAP reform have been a continuing process, albeit one that has not been radical enough or fast enough to benefit British consumers or farmers. We have seen the McSharry proposals and Agenda 2000, and now we are going on to decoupling. They have led progressively to less market distortion and have therefore been advantageous to agriculture.

Many farmers, especially those in the livestock sector, are desperate to escape from the morass of form filling and record keeping. One of them told me that, when the last census was conducted, the Government found that there were several hundred thousand people fewer in Britain than they thought. However, farmers have to keep a record of every single animal that is on their farm, the day it was born, the details of its sire and dam and so on.

Matthew Green (Ludlow): We know more about animals than people.

Mr. Williams: Exactly.

Even the smallest livestock farmer will be involved in a number of support schemes that have different retention periods and retention dates. We need to move away from that, so that farmers can exploit the inherent entrepreneurship and business acumen that systems have so stifled over the past few years.

I want to say a few quick words about modulation. [Interruption.] I will not go into digressivity as that is a bit too complicated for this time of night. We must have a system of modulation that does Britain more justice. Under the present system, only 3.5 per cent. of the total of modulation money will be returned to Britain, and that has resulted from the reluctance of successive Governments to apply for money for rural development under the second pillar.

Although I commend the Minister for his bravura performances in the House, I must say that farmers are concerned about the weak role that the Secretary of State has played in looking after our interests in Brussels. For that reason, we will not be able to vote for the Government's motion.

8.16 pm

Mr. Morley: With the leave of the House, I note that we have heard contributions from the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes), my hon. Friend the Member for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Wright) and the hon. Members for St. Ives (Andrew George), for South Antrim (David Burnside), for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning), for Leominster (Mr. Wiggin) and for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams).

I welcome the overall support that we have received for the main thrust of the Commission's proposals. Indeed, there has been almost unanimous agreement on where the weaknesses lie and where there is a need to press harder on the issue of modulation. It disadvantages UK farming and the UK system and, as the hon. Member for South Antrim rightly said, we need to drive forward the move for radical reforms. I am glad to say that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has been very much in the vanguard of arguing that case and linking it to the need for change in the Doha agreement.

I want to correct a couple of points that were made in the debate. The hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings said that the reference years of 2000 to 2002 were poor years for UK farmers' incomes. That is true but, in future, the reference period that will count for future entitlement relates not to income but to the area farmed or the number of livestock held multiplied by the EU-wide rate. Therefore, UK farmers will not be disadvantaged in relation to net income, because the figure will be linked to what they receive under the EU schemes.

The hon. Member for St. Ives referred to the projected fall in milk prices of 38.5 per cent. Our economists do not accept that figure; we think that it will be much lower. The predominant effect will be on milk powder prices, which influence world prices.

Mr. Hayes: Will the Minister answer one point about incomes? In response to a comment from my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning), he suggested that 1995 was an unrepresentative year for British farmers. However, he will know that in Finland, Greece, Italy, France, Germany, Austria and Belgium incomes are higher now than they were in 1995. That is the truth of the matter. It may be unrepresentative, but it is undeniable.

Mr. Morley: I would not deny that for a moment. One of the reasons for the increase in farm incomes in those countries is the fact that they are part of the euro. Perhaps this is a bid from a euro supporter in the Opposition for early entry into the euro. However, at the right increase, that would immediately add about 25 per cent. to the bottom line for British farmers. Perhaps he is making an early pitch for a new direction from the Conservative party; that is very interesting.

Important points were made about bovine tuberculosis. Although that subject falls slightly outside the terms of this debate, it is important. We are financing vaccine research, and I shall be only too pleased to give more details when I appear before the DEFRA Select Committee, which is quite rightly looking into the issue.

I turn to the questions about compulsory set-aside. The Government are not enthusiastic about compulsory set-aside. It has some nature conservation advantages, but with decoupling and cross compliance the arguments for it are quite weak. We shall take that into account in future discussions on the matter.

I was also pressed by the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) to say what was the Government's vision. We set out a strategy for agriculture, following on from the farming and food commission. We have also implemented proposals to the England rural development programme, put forward a White Paper on rural development and set up rural forums, all matters which have been widely welcomed as showing the Government's commitment to the countryside.

In relation to what we have heard from the Opposition, I would repeat that the reason why we receive a pathetic 3.5 per cent of the rural development fund is that in the years of Conservative Governments it reflects a historic—

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Union documents No. 10879/02, Commission Communication on the Mid-Term Review of the Common Agricultural Policy, No. 10896/02, Commission working document containing a report on milk quotas and No. COM (03) 23, draft Council Regulations on the reform of the Common Agricultural Policy; supports the Government's objective, to work for a sustainable Common Agricultural Policy which contributes to prosperous rural areas, enhances the natural environment, and provides high-quality, safe food and high animal welfare standards, a fair and competitive environment for farmers and better value for money for taxpayers and consumers; welcomes the European Commission's proposals on reform of the Common Agricultural Policy, in particular the proposals to decouple payments from production, to move from production-linked subsidies to wider agri-environment and rural development measures, and for further market reform, while lessening the adverse impact on trading opportunities to less-developed countries; but regrets that the proposals in several areas did not go further, that they include a complex and potentially unfair mechanism for transferring funds towards agri-environment and rural development measures and, on dairy reform, that they do not meet the requirement of the Berlin agreement that there would be a mid-term review 'with the aim of allowing the present quota arrangements to run out after 2006'.

PETITION

Manchester Airport

8.44 pm

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton): I wish to present a petition on behalf of many of my constituents who live in the villages of Plumley, Lower Peaver, Chelford and Lostock Green against the Government's plans to expand Manchester airport.

The petition states:

The Petition of the Residents of the villages of Plumley, Lower Peaver, Chelford and Lostock Green declares

That the villages are being seriously affected by the ever increasing levels of aircraft noise pollution; that the Department for Transport has published projections, which indicate that aircraft movements will increase dramatically in future years and will considerably increase noise pollution in the area; that there is also a proposal to build a third runway and turn Manchester airport into a hub airport larger than Heathrow.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons do urge the Secretary of State for Transport to stop the mass expansion plans at Manchester airport.

And the Petitioners remain, etcetera.

To lie upon the Table.

Health Inequalities (Hemsworth)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Dan Norris.]

8.46 pm

Jon Trickett (Hemsworth): I am grateful to the House authorities for allowing me to lead this short debate. I am pleased that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary is in her place on the Treasury Bench.

All sorts of studies over many years deal with health inequality. I was interested to read the Wanless report, which examined premature death in some detail. Derek Wanless used the expression PYLL—potential years of life lost. He suggested that, as a nation, we have not done well historically in relation to our comparator countries. According to the Wanless report, we have the worst record on premature mortality. That is disturbing.

For example, we are 25 per cent. worse off than Sweden when we compare the potential years of lives lost in both countries. The Government are doing a great deal to tackle the problem through their emphasis on financing, reforming and modernising the health service. However, although the statistic is worrying, there are variations in the nation. A statistic that covers a nation perhaps conceals as much as—or more than—it reveals.

The Wanless report drew our attention to major health inequality in our society. The report states:

"Major killers are linked to socio-economic inequality. The key risk factors are much higher among people in deprived areas."

Premature mortality is not the only feature of the class system that unfortunately continues to exist to some extent in our society. Limiting, long-standing illness is also prevalent among what Derek Wanless describes as the "lower social classes". He does not use that term pejoratively. Of those suffering from limiting, long-standing illness, 32 per cent. are manual workers, whereas only 17 per cent. are in social class 1. The figure for the former category is almost double that of the latter.

My constituency consists of several mining villages and small towns, where deprivation is a major feature. It is possible to identify the character of my constituency in some detail. The Government produced an index of multiple deprivation, which shows that four wards in Hemsworth constituency are among the most deprived communities. Approximately 50,000 people live in the wards of Featherstone, Hemsworth, South Kirkby, South Elmsall and Upton. Figures for employment, income, housing conditions, literacy and numeracy or any other factor show acute and widespread problems of deprivation.

As Wanless and many other students of the matter predicted, along with general deprivation goes health deprivation. Sadly, when I examined the deprivation figures relating to my constituency along with the health deprivation figures, the same four wards—more or less contiguous—containing 50,000 people proved to be the most health-deprived as well as the most deprived in general. Two of them, Hemsworth and South Kirby—inhabited by probably 25,000 people—are among the worst 2 per cent. in the country. I doubt that there are many other constituencies, if any, that feature both such acute health deprivation and such a chronic spread across such a large area.

I do not want to bore the House, but I could produce a string of statistics relating to, for instance, coronary heart disease, mental illness, drug abuse and deaths from cancer. I shall confine myself to some particularly troubling figures relating to premature death from certain illnesses—troubling because I find them inexplicable.

It could be considered predictable for the incidence of lung cancer in a former mining community to be 22 per cent. higher than the national average, although that is a frightening statistic. It is hard to understand, however, why our cervical cancer rate should be 47 per cent. higher than the national average. That suggests that something troubling is happening in the constituency. And why should the figures relating to mental health problems be so high, particularly among women?

As the local Member of Parliament, I felt very dejected on discovering the high rate of male suicides. An alarming number of young men commit suicide between the ages of 15 and 34. Something must be going badly wrong with communities that were traditionally so strong and stable when they were mining communities.

In a mining community, respiratory diseases might be expected. What troubles me is that, according to the statistics, the problem is much worse than could ever be imagined. Deaths in Wakefield as a whole—and the problem is particularly acute in my constituency—from chronic bronchitis and emphysema are 400 per cent. of the national average. Four times the number of people who would be expected to die from those diseases are dying from them: that is twice the average of 200 per cent. in what is described as the coalfield cluster. Why should women be dying from asthma at 253 per cent. of the national average rate? Women did not work on the ground; they were not exposed to coal dust as the men were.

No doubt the Minister will want to make some general comments, but I look forward to further correspondence on the specific issues of cervical cancer, suicide rates among young men, the alarmingly high rates of death from chronic bronchitis and emphysema, and female deaths from asthma. I feel that they require some analysis and some understanding.

It is possible to argue that some of the statistics—which I think will alarm anyone who looks at them—are part of the heritage of the mining industry, and also of the way in which that industry collapsed overnight and the immense social deprivation that followed. I believe that some things at least are beginning to change, and that some hope is being offered. The money that the Chancellor is investing in the health service is starting to feed through, which is welcome.

The modernisation of the health service is, of course, to be generally welcomed, although I should sound a note of caution. The population that I represent is very sparsely distributed, and not many people have access to cars. In the minds of some, modernisation might mean centralising services so that they are further away. I ask health service managers in my constituency, which is suffering from these particularly acute and chronic problems, not to do that. I fear that there is a sense of drift towards the centre in respect of specialisms, which I would deplore.

At the same time, the health authority in Wakefield did leave substantial deficits. My noble Friend Lord Lofthouse, who is chairman of the acute trust, and his colleagues are doing everything that they can to reduce that deficit, but I implore the Minister to look carefully at the perhaps overly draconian way in which certain servants of the health service, and of Ministers, are pressing for reductions in the budget. They will be difficult to achieve in the short term, although I am assured that we can achieve them in the long term. The question of whether, given the problems that we face, Wakefield is badly underfunded by the formula is another issue, which I should like the Minister to reflect on in due course.

There are signs of new hope in the coalfield communities, given the beginnings of economic regeneration—fragile though that still is, I am sorry to say. The money that the Government have made available through the single regeneration budget and other special exercises is beginning to feed through into the coalfield communities. The Government's intention to tackle child poverty is a major step forward, as is the statutory minimum wage. All of those measures—which attempt to tackle inequalities, and in particular the most acute deprivation—are beginning to feed through and to bring some hope to our communities. However, those who, like me, live among mining communities that continue to collapse—in fact, they are imploding—would have to say that in some areas the hope of regeneration remains extremely fragile. I encourage the Government to do everything that they can to help with the regeneration of coalfield communities.

I know that the Deputy Prime Minister secured from the Chancellor a very large sum of money to help coalfield communities, which was made available to the Coalfields Regeneration Trust. The CRT understands the extent of the health problems in constituencies formerly based on coal mining, and I have discussed with its chief executive and officials on many occasions the problems that we face. The chief executive has said that, on the CRT's behalf, he would like to make a strategic intervention in the health of the Hemsworth constituency, which he acknowledges constitutes a particularly serious problem. In fact, he has described Hemsworth as a black hole that funding has yet to penetrate. The CRT has accepted that health should be one of its key ways of alleviating the problems in coalfield communities, but it has yet to find the possible solutions to some of the health problems that I briefly described.

On re-reading the Wanless report, it becomes clear that many of the factors that produce acute ill health, especially among manual workers and deprived communities, are susceptible to changes in behaviour. Smoking, obesity and lack of exercise are all factors that can be found in the communities that I represent. However, Wanless also says that a public health agenda always seems to come down to what we might loosely describe as the middle class. Often, it is the most deprived communities that are more resistant to the public health message and to changes in behaviour that might bring about some improvement in health conditions in the medium term. The Government need to be more imaginative in ensuring that their message is understood so that change can come about in deprived communities such as those that I described.

I want to suggest a partial solution. Many of the people whom I represent have a particular interest in sport and exercise so, rather than trying to reach people through television advertisements or literature that they may not notice, we should use things in which they are interested as motivating factors. I am fascinated by the Department of Health's physical activity pilots. We are putting together an exciting and innovative pilot that will involve local general practitioners and the primary care trust. There will probably be between £60,000 and £70,000 from the private sector and a large amount has been promised by the Coalfields Regeneration Trust, as a strategic intervention.

We are still at the bidding stage. I realise that my hon. Friend the Minister has to treat all applications equally, but I hope that she will consider our application, which has several innovative features, and respond to it. Some of the best private sector practitioners are involved, spearheaded by the Fitness Industry Association, which has indicated that it will make available equipment and specialised coaching.

My vision is to create the partial regeneration of the health of the community by latching on to people's interest in sport and exercise. We already have some facilities, provided from lottery funding and supported by mainstream Government funding. They will be well used. We have some innovative general practitioners who are more than keen to work on physical activity pilots and the GP referral schemes, with which my hon. Friend is probably more familiar than I am. I encourage her to look into those schemes.

I wanted to draw the attention of the House to communities that were formerly powerful and strong and which created the wealth of this country through the coal mining industry. The country depended on such communities but they have been left derelict. I shall not go into the partisan reasons for that. Villages continue to die. People are still dying from the effects of the coal industry and from the deprivation in their communities. On average, people born in the UK may live for a shorter time than people in comparator countries, but the life expectancy of people born in Hemsworth is substantially less than average. As the MP for the area, I am sorry to have to say that.

We need to tackle the problems intelligently, rationally and urgently. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister understands our problems and the depth of the health crisis that faces my constituency. I realise that she has a full diary, but I invite her to visit my constituency to look at our physical activity pilot and to tell us what she can do to help to alleviate the problems. Although it may be beyond her brief, will she ask her ministerial colleagues to consider the funding for Wakefield health authority? We are doing everything possible to correct the financial crisis; much effort and time is being devoted to solve that problem. However, I want the health services to be fully engaged in alleviating the health problems from which my communities suffer so badly.

9.4 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Ms Hazel Blears): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Jon Trickett) on securing the debate, and welcome the opportunity to respond to the points that he has made. He painted a graphic picture of the problems that his constituents face, and he is right to make us aware of them.

[Ms Hazel Blears]

Health inequalities are avoidable; they are fundamentally unfair and the whole Government are committed to tackling them. This matter is not just for the Department of Health; it involves everyone in the Government. It involves housing, transport, the environment, employment and all the issues that my hon. Friend highlighted. There are good personal, social and economic arguments for improving the nation's health. Good health is fundamental to communities. It is good that people in general are living longer since the advent of the national health service, but progress is not the same for everyone and there are still too many dramatic inequalities. The blunt truth is that in the Wakefield local authority area, life expectancy at birth is 74.6 years for men and 79.4 years for women—which does not compare well with Chelsea and Kensington and Dorset, where people enjoy much better life expectancies. Men and women in my hon. Friend's area live within the 20 per cent. of local authority areas where life expectancy is shortest.

Reducing health inequalities is a big challenge for any Government. We have not just described health inequalities; we have taken action and are determined to make a difference. Almost one of the first things that we did in government was to institute the Acheson inquiry into the extent of health inequalities and to gather evidence about their causes and the effectiveness of possible solutions and remedies in trying to close the enormous health inequalities gap.

Sir Donald found that inequalities in health status ranged across geographical areas, social class, gender and ethnicity—and that many of those differences had widened over the previous 20 years. Such a picture, he said, highlighted the need for the Government to act on a very broad front.

The findings of that inquiry have helped drive our work within the NHS and across government. Action on inequalities featured strongly in the NHS plan. In February 2001, we announced the first-ever national targets to reduce the health gap in life expectancy and infant mortality. We have tried to approach the problem right across government, looking at action on poverty, education, employment, housing, environment and transport.

My hon. Friend was right to highlight the biggest killers. There are inequalities in relation to cancer and coronary heart disease in terms of excess deaths and inequity of access to basic health services. We are trying to target specific help for key risk factors, launching the most ambitious programme ever to tackle smoking in the UK. Every primary care trust now offers world-class smoking cessation services. Since April 2001, nicotine replacement therapy has been available on prescription to help people to stop smoking. The cancer plan has ambitious targets to reduce smoking among manual groups from 32 to 26 per cent. by 2010, which will have a significant impact on excess deaths from cancer and coronary heart disease.

Diet is also important. The national school fruit scheme represents the most ambitious and dramatic programme to improve child nutrition since the second world war. By the end of July, 1 million children will receive a free piece of fruit each school day. The new opportunities fund will provide £42 million to scale up that scheme over the next two years, and from 2004 every four to six-year-old will be eligible for a free piece of fruit each school day. We are also beginning to trial free carrots and tomatoes, which I understand are going down extremely well in pilot areas. The five-a-day community pilot initiatives will try to improve affordability and access to fruit and vegetables, particularly in disadvantaged communities. That scheme will be supported by £10 million from the new opportunities fund over the next two years.

I know from a previous Adjournment debate and my hon. Friend's comments tonight that he has a real interest in exercise referral schemes. There is substantial evidence to support the role of physical activity in promoting good health. The LEAP programme, jointly funded by the Department of Health and national partners, aims at testing different evidence-based community approaches to increasing the numbers of adults and children in deprived areas who take regular, moderate-intensity physical activity. Some 36 primary care trusts have submitted formal bids to nine regional panels. My hon. Friend highlighted the bid from his area with the support of the Coalfields Regeneration Trust and other partners. Those bids are being examined and the nine successful pilots—one in each public health region—will be announced in early March. I certainly undertake to consider all the submissions carefully, including the scheme in my hon. Friend's area.

We must try to act nationally as well as locally when tackling health inequalities. The Government are doing a great deal, through the national minimum wage and the various tax credits, to increase family incomes and improve education. For example, the sure start programme gives children and young families a decent start in life, and the national strategy for neighbourhood renewal has regeneration programmes through single regeneration budgets. We also have the new deal for communities.

We have now had the cross-cutting spending review on health inequalities, with every Department lined up to tackle the problems together. Indeed, the spending review settlements are partly predicated on Departments' contribution to combating health inequalities. It will be interesting to see what each Department can do.

My hon. Friend will be aware that over the next three years the allocation made to Eastern Wakefield PCT will grow by more than 32 per cent. That is a significant level of investment and it should deliver real benefits and results. I know that the allocation still falls short of the target, but the significant investment will help to tackle the health inequalities that he mentioned.

The NHS in the Hemsworth area is part of a regional initiative to ensure that both the capital investment and revenue spending by the NHS achieves maximum value. That includes employing local people and procuring goods locally to regenerate the local economy at the same time as providing health services. That work is supported by the regional development agency, Yorkshire Forward. That innovative approach to spending NHS money will improve not only people's health but their chances of employment to bring hope back to the coalfield communities about which my hon. Friend spoke so eloquently.

Through "Shifting the Balance of Power", we are trying to put the vast majority of the NHS's budget into the PCTs on the front line, so that they can do what is important to local communities. The Eastern Wakefield PCT, which covers my hon. Friend's constituency, has been very proactive in the area of public health and has a very good record. It works closely with the local strategic partnership. The Hemsworth Partnership has a range of initiatives, including a public health road show in November, which was attended by more than 1,000 people. The event focused on issues such as diet and exercise, smoking, sexual health, teenage pregnancy and domestic violence. Those issues are important to all my hon. Friend's constituents, and a similar road show is planned for this year to heighten awareness further.

The West End Project is involved in the regeneration of former pit houses and an environmental clean up of the area. My hon. Friend mentioned the problem of substance misuse in the area. I know that the Wakefield Accord is a mentoring, advice and employment service for people affected by substance misuse. The area also has GASPED, a support service for the parents of drug misusers—something that is not always at the forefront of provision. The outreach service known as the Hemsworth van goes out into communities to try to support people there. The health action zone has provided a good foundation for the whole prevention agenda, including the Hemsworth parenting project, the integrated family centre in South Elmsall, and the promoting positive health project, which is also based in Hemsworth.

Much is being done, but it is clear that there is much more to do. My hon. Friend highlighted some deeply troubling statistics on coronary heart disease, cancer, mental health and suicide. I am happy to enter into further discussion with him to see how we can discover the underlying causes for those problems in his community. I am also more than happy to continue to work with him to support local people as they start to take control of the agenda and begin to feel more empowered in looking after their own health.

My hon. Friend mentioned the important issue of long-term chronic diseases in his area and the difference between the social classes. He will be interested in the expert patients programme, which helps people with chronic diseases to become experts in their own care and partners in improving their health. Ensuring that local people are in charge of that agenda is key to its success.

We are also pressing on with the improvement of primary care facilities, with the local improvement finance trust—or LIFT—project starting to refurbish primary care in areas such as Hemsworth. The personal medical service pilot scheme will also provide better GP services.

Tackling health inequalities is a long-term programme that is a top priority across government. Poorer people get sick more often and die sooner than the better off. It is as simple as that. We are determined to close the gap so that everyone, whatever their background or class, has the chance to live a longer and healthier life in the future.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at fifteen minutes past Nine o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

The Secretary of State was asked—

Rural Post Offices

1. Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle): What recent representations she has received regarding the future of the rural post office network. [97616]

The Minister for E-Commerce and Competitiveness (Mr. Stephen Timms): We regularly receive representations about postal services and the network, and the recent announcement of additional funding for rural post offices has been particularly warmly welcomed.

Gregory Barker: Does the Minister understand the huge damage that the Government's imposed changes to the way in which benefits and pensions are paid at post offices will do to the rural post office network? Only this morning, I spoke to the postmaster in Robertsbridge, who told me, "I can't see us surviving—we will die on our feet." What is adding insult to injury and making matters even worse is the fact that the Government have delayed the marketing of the new Post Office card account until 24 March, just one week before the new system is launched on April fool's day. Will the Minister instruct those responsible to bring forward the marketing scheme to help at least to mitigate some of the damage that their proposals will do?

Mr. Timms: The hon. Gentleman might take the view that it would be a good idea to maintain ration book technology for benefit payment, but if so he is in a very small minority. Our view is that up-to-date technology is the way in which to assure the Post Office of a successful future. The Post Office card account is on track to be in use from April, as was always intended. It will be phased in over a two-year period, as we always said that it would be, and we will manage the migration carefully to ensure that the new arrangements do not inconvenience benefit recipients. The availability of that technology will mean that rural post offices, as well as post offices in urban areas, will be able to offer modern services in a way that meets the needs of today's customers. That is very good news for the Post Office.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): I accept what my hon. Friend says, but there is clearly something of a shortfall in terms of the information that is going out, and we need to communicate how the new system will work. One of the ways in which we could set about that is to work through the parish and town council network to ensure that those bodies are fully informed about the Post Office account and encourage their constituents to consider its opportunities and, more particularly, that they work closely with sub-postmasters and sub-postmistresses to ensure that those services are in place not only now, but in the future.

Mr. Timms: I agree with my hon. Friend that it is important to do everything that we can to communicate accurate information about how the new arrangements will work. I believe that new information will be in post offices from next week, and that once it is widely available people will recognise the benefits of the new arrangements.

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk): Millions of vulnerable people will have heard with dismay the Minister's contemptuous reference to ration book technology. It comes ill from a Minister who has pretended to be concerned about the way in which benefits are paid to dismiss the anxieties felt by people in constituencies all over the country. Is it not the case that the best way to help rural post offices and their customers, including benefit claimants is, first, to make it clear that anyone who wishes to continue to receive their benefit in cash can do so and, secondly, to reverse the ridiculous policy of effectively preventing those Post Office customers who wish to open a card account from doing so? Only a Government who know nothing about business and care nothing about vulnerable people or rural communities would behave in such a disgraceful manner.

Mr. Timms: The requirement that people who wish to obtain their benefit in cash at the Post Office without charge should continue to be able to do so has been central to all the arrangements that we have put in place, and that will be the position once the change to automated credit transfer—ACT—happens from April.

As to the difficulty of obtaining a Post Office card account, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will take some comfort from the fact that, on the latest figures, almost 40 per cent. of Veterans Agency benefit recipients have chosen to opt for a card account, so it is not impossible, as he suggests. We are ensuring that everybody can make the choice that is right for them.

On rural post offices, in the last quarter of last year, the most recent period for which we have data, there was no net reduction in the number of rural post offices. It is probably the first time that that has been the case for at least 30 years, and it shows that the steps that the Government are taking are working.

Women Entrepreneurs

2. Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly): What recent measures have been taken to encourage women entrepreneurs. [97617]

The Minister for Employment Relations, Industry and the Regions (Alan Johnson): A national strategic framework on women's enterprise is currently being developed by the Small Business Service, in conjunction with Prowess—Promoting Women's Enterprise Support—and a cross-Government policy group. That strategy will provide a cohesive, co-ordinated and long-term approach to women's enterprise in the UK.

Mr. David: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is an urgent need to tackle sexist bias in the media? The Western Mail yesterday included a feature on Welsh entrepreneurs. It stated that Welsh business "men" were more positive and looking to build on their current success. It contained seven photographs of men but none of women.

Alan Johnson: I agree that treatment by the media is a barrier that women have to surmount. However, the media probably take their lead from other political parties, which have a small representation of women. Perhaps they could do their bit to help the media enter the 21st century.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): To prevent bias such as that displayed by The Western Mail and in the spirit of equal opportunity, will the Minister confirm that the same measures will be made available to male entrepreneurs?

Alan Johnson: I can confirm two things. The Government introduced maternity allowance for self-employed women for the first time. Many women entrepreneurs experience difficulty because their partners work and cannot find time to help with child care. From April, the Government will introduce measures to ensure that people's right to apply for flexible working allows the man in the relationship to help the woman entrepreneur better to fulfil her objectives and ambitions.

Credit Card Regulation

3. Norman Lamb (North Norfolk): If she will make a statement on credit card regulation. [97620]

The Minister for Energy and Construction (Mr. Brian Wilson): Credit cards are regulated under the Consumer Credit Act 1974, which provides protection for consumers taking out an agreement. A review of the Act was announced in July 2001. As part of it, we will publish a consultation on the simplification of the credit advertising regulations in the summer.

Norman Lamb: I thank the Minister for that reply. Earlier this week, MasterCard was exposed for ripping off retailers to the tune of hundreds and millions of pounds, and especially for discriminating against small retailers. The consumer ultimately bears the cost.

The spotlight now turns on the misleading annual percentage rate figures, which make it impossible for consumers to calculate the cost of credit. I appreciate that a review is being conducted, but what is the time scale for it? It has dragged on endlessly. When will the Government act to give consumers the protection that they need?

Mr. Wilson: This is not normally my territory, but I have a great deal of sympathy with the hon. Gentleman's comments. The best way in which to deal with the unsolicited conflicting and confusing offers that come through our letterboxes is to file them in the bin.

The outcome of the review will be published in the summer. I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman's point that consumers must be protected and that having no consistent base of information confuses rather than protects. The industry is good at exploiting that trick.

Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith): Can my hon. Friend do something in the review about the outrageously high rates of interest that many leading stores charge for their in-store credit cards? Some charge interest of 30 per cent. APR, which is absurdly high at a time of historically low interest rates.

Mr. Wilson: Again, I have great sympathy with those comments. If consistent information were published, people would be better able to read across. Every trick in the book is used to inveigle people into costly agreements. There is a fine line between the nanny-state approach and providing decent protection from such misinformation or, at best, confusing information. That is the purpose of the review, and I shall convey hon. Members' views and their desire for urgency to my colleague, my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Miss Melanie Johnson), who normally deals with those issues.

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster): Does the Minister agree that the individual must take some responsibility for personal credit card debt?

Mr. Wilson: That is precisely why I tried to establish a balance. We cannot offer individual protection to everyone who should understand the information but chooses not to. Many people are the authors of their misfortune. We are trying to strike a balance. People should be able to get information that allows them to compare different offers, see the interest rates that will be charged, and work out what they will end up paying. However, at the point where the state intervenes to ensure that that information is available, I would agree with the hon. Gentleman that we cannot protect people from their own misjudgments.

Manufacturing Advisory Service

4. Mr. Michael Foster (Worcester): What assessment she has made of the effectiveness of the Manufacturing Advisory Service. [97621]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Ms Patricia Hewitt): The Manufacturing Advisory Service is now up and running in England and Wales. It has been enthusiastically received by industry. Early progress reports are encouraging, and I shall publish details of that progress shortly.

Mr. Foster: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State knows that the west midlands has for years been the engine driving the UK manufacturing industry. Will she give the House more details on how the Manufacturing Advisory Service has benefited the west midlands and, in particular, on the 100 companies that have used the service in the past seven months?

Ms Hewitt: More than 100 companies have received full-scale visits from the Manufacturing Advisory Service, and many others have received briefer advice. As a result, most of those companies have gained substantial direct improvements to their bottom line. I shall publish fuller details in the report. I agree with my hon. Friend that all MPs with manufacturing constituencies can help their manufacturing companies enormously by encouraging them to use this new, effective and practical service.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds): On the subject of effectiveness, the Secretary of State will be aware of the new target announced by Mr. Prodi last week—that of reducing the European Union law rule book by 25,000 pages from its present 90,000 pages by 2005. What useless and moronic EU red tape would she cut to achieve that target?

Ms Hewitt: As the hon. Gentleman knows, we have been at the forefront of encouraging the EU to commit itself to the better regulation discipline that we have in our country—

Mr. Ruffley: What cuts?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let the Secretary of State answer.

Ms Hewitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I intend to take advantage of President Prodi's initiative, but I shall continue to work with as many member states as possible to ensure that we get a sensible and satisfactory conclusion to the current discussions on the agency workers directive. In addition, I shall continue to ensure—through the new Competitiveness Council—that the new framework for the chemicals industry does not damage the competitiveness of our world-class chemicals industry.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): Does my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State accept that many businesses and industries still do not know where they can get help and advice? The new advisory service will clearly do a welcome job, but many people do not know of its existence. What can we do to publicise it better, to make people aware of where they can get help and advice before it is too late and they go out of business?

Ms Hewitt: The Minister for Employment Relations, Industry and the Regions, my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, West and Hessle (Alan Johnson), has already written to all hon. Members to inform them of the work of the Manufacturing Advisory Service. The manufacturing centres and the regional development agencies are all sending out mail and advertising the new service in their own regions. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will help by contacting manufacturing firms in his constituency to draw their attention to this new and excellent service.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham): Perhaps out of a naive belief that the Secretary of State's Department could offer an advisory service to manufacturing, I wrote an urgent letter to her three months ago on behalf of a delegation of trade unionists from Northern Ireland whose fertiliser factory had closed down. I asked her to work with her Cabinet colleagues and to approach the principal shareholders—the Irish Government and ICI. Is the Secretary of State aware that people from her office wrote to me this week to say that, after three months' careful consideration, they had decided to transfer the matter to another Government Department? If that is a measure of the quality of service on offer, the service should be closed down. What has happened leads me to question the effectiveness not only of the service, but of her whole Department.

Ms Hewitt: I am extremely sorry if we have not acted as promptly as we should have done on that particular matter. I shall check exactly what has happened, and shall write to the hon. Gentleman.

Let me make it absolutely clear that that case has nothing to do with the new Manufacturing Advisory Service and the regional centres for manufacturing excellence, which, as I said, are operating throughout England and Wales and which we know from the earlier reports are delivering an excellent service. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will support them.

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk): Will the Secretary of State confirm that more than 600,000 manufacturing jobs have been lost since May 1997? That is an average of more than 2,000 for every week since Labour came to power. Has she discussed with the Manufacturing Advisory Service the need to improve Britain's deficit in traded goods, which is now at its worst level for 305 years? Has she discussed with the service how to improve business investment, which fell last year by more than any amount since records were first kept in 1966? Has she discussed with the service the slowdown in productivity? Productivity is now rising at only half the speed it was under the last Government. Does she recognise that, whatever the Manufacturing Advisory Service does, it cannot rectify the damage to Britain's manufacturers that Labour's policy of high tax and over-regulation is still inflicting?

Ms Hewitt: I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman is concerned about job losses and closures in the manufacturing sector. I do not remember any such concern when manufacturing was being destroyed under the Conservative Governments in two disastrous recessions.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the trade gap, but it is absurd to compare today's gap with the state of the economy under William of Orange, when it was about 100th the size of today's economy. I notice that the hon. Gentleman does not refer to the fact that world trade has been falling very fast because of the downturn across the world. He does not refer to the fact that the United Kingdom economy—both this year and forecast for next year—is growing faster than almost any other major economy. Instead of talking the British economy down, it is high time that he supported British business and British workers. If he is so concerned about them, perhaps he would like to explain to the House how his proposals for scrapping the regional development agencies—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State should not do that.

Fair Trade

5. Vera Baird (Redcar): What steps the DTI is taking to promote the take-up of fair trade products by UK businesses. [97622]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Ms Patricia Hewitt): I strongly support the aims of the fair trade movement. The Government have provided £500,000 to help the Fairtrade Foundation with its marketing campaigns. My hon. Friend the Minister for E-Commerce and Competitiveness recently held a meeting with business leaders to encourage greater take-up of fair trade goods. I have ensured that fair trade tea and coffee are available throughout the DTI, and I have encouraged my other Cabinet colleagues to do the same.

Vera Baird: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that reply. Does she agree that the major advantage of fair trade is to give a steady income to producers who would otherwise be totally hostage to the volatility of the commodity market? It will be fair trade fortnight from 3 to 18 March, which is why I am asking whether she intends to introduce any further steps to mark that occasion and further to stimulate and galvanise British business, which does not now immensely support fair trade throughout the world.

Ms Hewitt: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for those remarks. I entirely agree with her about the small but none the less significant part that fair trade can play in stabilising the incomes of some of the poorest farmers around the world. Just a few months ago, I brought together industry, other Departments, voluntary organisations and international institutions to consider how we could act more effectively on the underlying problem of low and volatile commodity prices. A working group between Government and industry is considering how we can do more on that.

The other crucial action that we shall take, not only during fair trade fortnight but throughout the year, is to step up our efforts, as part of the Doha negotiations, to persuade our colleagues in the European Union to cut the tariffs that we put up against imports from developing countries. Those tariffs apply not only to raw materials but, crucially, to the value-added materials into which those countries now need to diversify.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton): Can the right hon. Lady explain why the Mediterranean partners of the Euro-Mediterranean trade partnership do not enjoy the principle of regional cumulation that the European members enjoy? Surely that is a fair way to promote trade and, therefore, peace in a difficult part of the world.

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. He will be aware that in a recent speech in Brussels I set out—I hope clearly—the case for reform within the European Union, both of the common agricultural policy and, more broadly, of our tariff barriers. There is a great deal more that the European Union, and also the United States and other parts of the developed world, can do to ensure that very poor countries enjoy greater prosperity. That is, of course, good for them, but it also happens to be good for us.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate): The House should find the Secretary of State's complacency on trade in her answers to my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) alarming. The United Kingdom trade deficit is widening. The overall value of trade is falling. In the fourth quarter of 2002, the deficit in goods reached £10.7 billion. Given that desperate situation—[HON. MEMBERS: "The question is on fair trade."] How can it possibly be right, given that desperate situation for British exporters and British businesses that want to take up fair trade products, for the Government to increase employers' national insurance?

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman seems to jump from one subject to another.

On the trade gap, the current account deficit in the United Kingdom in 2001 was 1.7 per cent. of gross domestic product. In 1989, under the hon. Gentleman's Government, it was more than 5 per cent. We will take no lectures on trade from the Conservatives, who did very little to promote fair trade.

On national insurance contributions, there is widespread support among the business community and the public for the sustained increase in national health service spending that we propose and the Conservative party would cut. The issue for the hon. Gentleman is which hospitals he would shut, and how many doctors and nurses he would sack, with his refusal to match our investment in the NHS.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Minister aware that the fairest trade I can think of at this time, with a balance of payments of about £34 billion, is to increase the amount of coal produced in this country so that it offsets coal imports? Will she accept that that fair announcement for coal yesterday was sound as far as it went, and will she take another look to see whether we can save that wonderful fair place of Selby to ensure that we keep those three pits open? If we do that, it will be in sharp contrast to the lousy trade that resulted in every single pit in Derbyshire closing when the Tories were in power.

Ms Hewitt: I absolutely understand and share my hon. Friend's anger about the brutality of what was done to the coalfield communities during the Conservative years. He knows from statements that I made to the House that last year we secured within the European Union framework the possibility of investment aid to the coal industry, which has always been excluded from regional selective assistance. I can confirm that we are making good progress on that and will make an announcement in due course.

Public and Employee Liability Insurance

6. Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan): What representations she has received on the impact of increased premiums for public and employee liability insurance on small businesses. [97623]

The Minister for Energy and Construction (Mr. Brian Wilson): The Department has received a number of representations from companies and their representative bodies concerning increased premiums for liability insurance. In response to the concerns raised, we have set up a review of the employers' liability insurance system, and the Office of Fair Trading is conducting a study of the liability insurance market.

Mr. Smith: I warmly welcome that reply. The Minister will be aware of the letter that I received from Mr. Marco Camilleri of Camilleri Roofing, a highly respected and very successful family business in my constituency. Despite having an unblemished safety record and investing substantial sums in health and safety training, it faces massive increases in its liability insurance. Given the lack of any correlation between the risk posed by the company and the amount of insurance it has to pay, I am delighted to hear that the matter is to be referred to the Office of Fair Trading—especially in the light of public concern over the possibility that insurance companies are exploiting the current security environment.

Mr. Wilson: My hon. Friend is right to raise that case study. Many companies are in the same position.

There are clearly genuine reasons for increases in insurance costs. They are probably part of the price we pay for the litigation culture into which we are increasingly moving, and there have been substantial extraneous factors as well. Nevertheless, we should try to help businesses overcome the problem, and make sure that the insurance industry distinguishes between companies with the unblemished record described by my hon. Friend and those with no such record.

The construction industry can help itself. Part of the problem is that the industry does not have a good health and safety record. We must reward companies that do well. I hope that the various inquiries that are taking place will prove helpful; in the meantime, the company mentioned by my hon. Friend can consult a reputable trade association or the British Insurance Brokers Association.

Mr. Michael Weir (Angus): A review is all very well, but what assurance can the Minister give Mackay Boatbuilders of Arbroath, in my constituency? Seeing what was happening in the fishing industry, the company sensibly diversified into maintenance of vessels such as oil supply ships. Despite having made no claims for 12 years, it has incurred a 400 per cent. increase in liability premiums. It has managed to pay this year, but is fearful of what will happen when the insurance must be renewed at the end of the year. Will the Minister undertake to meet the insurance companies immediately, and impress on them that increases of such magnitude are unacceptable in the case of small businesses?

Mr. Wilson: I assure the hon. Gentleman that we have been doing exactly that for months. I am pleased that he has discovered this issue from a letter from a firm in his constituency.

As I have said, it is often possible for companies to obtain satisfactory terms through trade associations and the British Insurance Brokers Association, especially if they can demonstrate that they have a good health and safety record. There is, indeed, a potential advantage if the problem makes companies aware that such a record will secure beneficial premiums. It is necessary to separate the sheep from the goats, particularly in the construction industry, which can unfortunately be stigmatised by the existence of some very bad companies.

Mrs. Betty Williams (Conwy): My hon. Friend mentioned the investigation being conducted by the Department for Work and Pensions and the Office of Fair Trading. Bearing in mind the problems faced by British manufacturing companies—including some in my constituency—in obtaining liability insurance, will he use his good offices when discussing the matter with other Departments to ensure that the study is completed without delay?

Mr. Wilson: I take my hon. Friend's point. The issue is urgent for many very good companies, which is why the Government as a whole have responded in the way I have described, and why it is particularly important to involve the OFT. I am acutely aware from the sectors with which I deal—I think construction has been the worst hit—of the need to secure answers. As has been said, many companies have managed to deal with the hike in employers' liability insurance this year, but would be in difficulty if the same happened next year. I hope that through their good offices the Government can help to establish stability in a market that is normally extremely competitive. We would not normally intervene, but we recognise the problems and are trying to find solutions.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Is the Minister aware of the case, highlighted on 31 January this year by my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham), of the specialist small construction firm on the south coast that last year obtained £10 million-worth of insurance cover for £12,000? This year, it requires a minimum of £5 million-worth of cover simply to secure contracts from its regular customers, but can secure only £1 million-worth—a tenth of that which it previously enjoyed—for £8,000, two thirds of the previous cost. Given that 99.6 per cent. of businesses in this country employ fewer than 100 people, but employ a large number of people central to our economy and generate two fifths of our national output, does the Minister accept that on a cross-party basis—this is not a partisan matter—action is urgently required?

Mr. Wilson: If the hon. Gentleman keeps making speeches like that, I might invite him to come and join us—but perhaps not.

I do not think that the issue is party political, and I accept the validity of what the hon. Gentleman says. I assure him that, through the measures that I mentioned, we will continue to work with industry to facilitate a solution. For smaller companies in particular, the issue is extremely significant. Fortunately, the construction industry is experiencing a boom phase in most parts of the country, but that will not always be the case. We have to sort out the problem while conditions are good, so that it will not become an additional burden when conditions are more challenging.

EU Enlargement

7. Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West): What analysis her Department has conducted of the opportunities for UK businesses from EU enlargement. [97624]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Ms Patricia Hewitt): British business has already benefited from the removal of trade barriers with the fast-growing economies of central and eastern Europe, and we expect that to continue with the expansion of the EU to create the largest single market in the world. My officials are completing a more detailed analysis of the opportunities and impact, and I intend to publish it as soon as possible.

Dr. Starkey: Given the current benefits of markets in eastern and central Europe, as well as the potential increased benefits and the fact that many of our European Union competitors are aggressively expanding into those markets, will the Secretary of State detail the specific ways in which she is trying to encourage British businesses to take advantage of those opportunities?

Ms Hewitt: About 14,000 British firms—mainly, I am glad to say, manufacturers—are already exporting goods to central and eastern Europe, and those opportunities are clearly growing. I have asked British Trade International, in its work in the regions, to ensure that when supporting more of our small and medium-sized enterprises to become exporters it draws their attention to those growing markets.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney): Enlargement of the EU is wholly welcome, but does the Secretary of State agree that it should not be accompanied by further enlargement of her Department? Will she explain why, when the Government do not own a coal, steel or car industry, it is still necessary to have eight DTI Ministers, a few of whom have joined us today? Is it a make-work scheme for Government drivers and private secretaries, or is there some nobler purpose?

Ms Hewitt: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that extremely serious question. I can assure him that all my Ministers are enormously busy. Indeed, the Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Miss Johnson), who has ministerial responsibility for competition and consumer affairs, is currently in central and eastern Europe exploring with Government and business there the opportunities for closer investment and trade. I will continue to ensure that my Department operates as efficiently as possible, and delivers an even better service to business and consumers.

Broadband

8. Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East): What steps her Department is taking to increase the take-up of broadband services. [97625]

The Minister for E-Commerce and Competitiveness (Mr. Stephen Timms): Competition is proving an effective driver for the broadband market, as the UK now has the second largest number of broadband connections in Europe after Germany. In addition to providing for a competitive market environment, the Government's contributions include the new UK broadband taskforce, support for the broadband stakeholder group and the UK online for business advice programme, and the £30 million UK broadband fund.

Brian White: I am sure that the House will welcome the work of the broadband stakeholders group, and I am sure the Minister will endorse its recommendations. He knows, however, that there are areas such as mine, where every exchange is enabled but technical difficulties prevent take-up. There are other areas with other problems. Will my hon. Friend assure the House that Government Departments, agencies such as English Partnerships and regional development agencies, and the regulator will use innovative ways forward and not be hidebound by bureaucratic rules that prevent the take-up of broadband by various groups?

Mr. Timms: My hon. Friend is right. It is important that we encourage imaginative public-private partnerships and do not impede them. The changes introduced by the Communications Bill, with which my hon. Friend has been helping in Committee, will contribute. A growing number of initiatives are being taken forward, especially by the regional development agencies. The South East England Development Agency, for example, is giving grants to help small businesses in Hastings access satellite broadband and plans to extend those arrangements throughout the region. It is important that such initiatives be supported.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet): What assessment has the Minister made of the number of small businesses, potential domestic users and others who are denied access to broadband cable in areas such as Birchington and Westgate in my constituency, simply because of the roll-out thresholds? Does he regard that as acceptable?

Mr. Timms: The hon. Gentleman has also played an important part in the Committee considering the Communications Bill, as its Chairman. We estimate that about 30 per cent. of UK households are currently not within reach of a terrestrial broadband service. Satellite broadband is available almost everywhere, which is why SEEDA's arrangements to help businesses access satellite broadband, which is more expensive, are potentially very important. As SEEDA rolls out those arrangements throughout the south-east region, the hon. Gentleman's constituents and businesses in his constituency may well be among the beneficiaries.

Mr. Ian Cawsey (Brigg and Goole): In any discussions that my hon. Friend has with broadband providers, will he champion the cause of rural areas, where modern communications are so important? Broadband roll-out appears to be based on a set target of the number of people who register. That is inevitably more difficult to reach in a sparsely populated area such as the Isle of Axholme in my constituency.

Mr. Timms: My hon. Friend is right. It is important that we extend broadband to rural areas as fast as possible. BT has been reducing some of its thresholds recently. That is good news, but we also need to look at some of the more imaginative ways of extending broadband into rural areas. I was in Canada a couple of weeks ago, and heard about the way in which social enterprises are helping to deliver wireless-based broadband services to rural areas. Of course, in Canada the geographical challenges are much greater. It is important that we make progress in that respect.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): Given the Government's welcome stated aspiration to make the United Kingdom the most competitive and dynamic communications market in the world, and the role that Government Departments have to play in that by encouraging broadband connection, what target have the Government have set for broadband connection for schools? How many schools currently have broadband access, and when does he expect 100 per cent. of schools to have broadband access?

Mr. Timms: The Prime Minister announced last November that we expect every school to have broadband access by 2006. I believe that the current proportion is about 25 per cent. In all, we expect the public sector to spend about £1 billion on broadband over the next three years. Once the school in a rural community has broadband, at least in principle there is the possibility of spreading access to other users, so the public sector contribution will be important.

Aerospace Industry

9. Helen Jackson (Sheffield, Hillsborough): To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on the prospects for the aerospace industry. [97626]

The Minister for Employment Relations, Industry and the Regions (Alan Johnson): The UK aerospace sector's prospects are good, despite the many challenges that the industry faces. The aerospace innovation and growth team published its interim report recently, which suggested that there are real opportunities for future growth.

Helen Jackson: My hon. Friend will know that the high-grade steel produced by the Corus plant at Stocksbridge in my constituency is significantly dependent on the health and well-being of the aerospace industry for its markets. Its orders dropped by about a third following 11 September, and the effect is still working its way through the steel capacity of the plant. What further action will my hon. Friend take, especially in the South Yorkshire region, to promote aerospace and the markets in order to restore the health of that core manufacturing sector?

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend is absolutely right about the importance of the very specialised steel production in her constituency. I am advised that, although there is cause for concern, the sector is not suggesting that major difficulties will be caused, partly because there has been huge investment on the defence side. In particular, the joint strike fighter is a huge investment made jointly with the USA.

My hon. Friend will know about the development of the advanced manufacturing park, as the site is very close to her area. Significantly, Boeing is making a major investment to encourage and develop innovation in aerospace manufacturing. That is one of the most important developments that we have seen in this country for many years.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury): The Minister may be aware that the aerospace industry is very important in my constituency, although a number of jobs have been lost in it over the years. The industry tells me that the best thing that the Government can do is ensure that it can compete on a level playing field. Fair trade was mentioned earlier, and it is extremely important that companies in Europe do not get help from their Governments in meeting start-up costs and winning orders when such help is not available to companies in this country. Will he ensure that we can compete on a level playing field? Will he also make sure that companies involved in joint projects get paid on time when they do the work?

Alan Johnson: I agree that aerospace, of all industries, needs a level playing field. That is fairly obvious. In terms of the issues that the sector faces, the innovation and growth team is very important. I stress that that is a body not of politicians but of the industry itself, and it is considering all the problems that it faces with a view to the future 20 years hence.

On the issues that the hon. Gentleman mentions with regard to assisting our aerospace industry, Governments of all persuasions have seen the need to support aerospace because of the particular problems that it faces. The innovation and growth team has a very important role in that respect and its report will be published in May. Since 1997, £1 billion of launch investment has been put into Rolls-Royce and Airbus. From talking to aerospace companies, I find that they are very appreciative of the efforts that we have made in this country—this is not merely a party political point because they have made our aerospace sector second only to the US in the world. While we should look at our difficulties and consider how to resolve them, we should not downgrade the successes that we have had in this country.

Social Enterprise

10. Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside): What support she is giving to social enterprise. [97628]

The Minister for E-Commerce and Competitiveness (Mr. Stephen Timms): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I launched a three-year strategy for social enterprise in July. We are now working on the delivery of that strategy and the co-ordination of its delivery across government.

Mrs. Ellman: Will my hon. Friend ensure that the support given to social enterprise by his Department, including the Phoenix fund, works together with support from other sources, including the Merseyside special investment fund, which has recently set up a special section devoted to community businesses? Will he support the Co-operatives and Community Benefit Societies Bill, which is currently being promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd), as a very important way of supporting social enterprises?

Mr. Timms: I agree that the Bill is important. Social enterprises are making very good use of the support provided from the Phoenix fund. That includes a number of enterprises in my hon. Friend's constituency; I have noticed the Cats Pyjamas and Train 2000 projects in particular. She is absolutely right that that support needs to be allied to support from other sources. Let me also draw her attention to the community investment tax relief, which was introduced a few weeks ago and which I think will be significant in tilting the playing field in favour of commercial viability for investments in some social enterprise projects that would not otherwise be viable.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch): Does the Minister accept that socialism and enterprise are mutually incompatible? If the terms being used are new Labour speak for not-for-profit bodies and charities, why is his Secretary of State not campaigning for the removal of the evil congestion charge, which is undermining the work of charities in central London?

Mr. Timms: The hon. Gentleman is wrong about that. The great attraction of social enterprise is that it combines the creativity and energy that characterise the entrepreneurial private sector at its best with a strong commitment to public service. Bringing those two together creates a powerful combination from which the whole country can gain.

MINISTER FOR WOMEN

The Minister for Women was asked

Social Enterprises

18. Tony Cunningham (Workington): What steps she is taking to support women in setting up social enterprises. [97608]

The Minister for Women (Ms Patricia Hewitt): We are already supporting women as well as men to set up and run social enterprises through a variety of activities. This will be strengthened through the implementation of the social enterprise strategy, to which my hon. Friend the Minister for E-Commerce and Competitiveness referred a moment ago.

Tony Cunningham: I thank the Minister for that reply. I have some very successful social enterprises in my constituency, which are fully supported by my local council, Allerdale borough council. What additional support can be given to women establishing social enterprises in rural areas? These women suffer not only from the normal problems of access to finance but from peripherality, rural isolation and general access to support mechanisms.

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I am glad to say that there are already successful social enterprises in rural areas, such as Rascals, the after-school care club in Northumberland that was set up by a group of mothers to provide child care in that rural area. More generally, the Small Business Service is already delivering—through the business links network—the farm business advisory service, which is funded by the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and the Countryside Agency. This is helping women and men in rural areas to move into new enterprises—both social enterprises and for profit.

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden): The fact that we have just dealt with the subject of social enterprise during Trade and Industry questions and that we are now dealing with it again underlines the point that having the important cross-cutting role of Minister for Women shackled to departmental questions is not working. It allows me, however, to comb through the Government's document, "Social Enterprise: a Strategy for Success", which states that social enterprise can contribute to "socially inclusive wealth creation". Women are not mentioned once in this document. Nor are they mentioned in the social enterprise strategy work plan for July 2002 to October 2003—very inclusive, that! Will the Minister admit that women and social enterprise were just an afterthought?

Ms Hewitt: No, of course not. I am disappointed that the hon. Lady seems to be suggesting that she does not think that Women's questions are useful. Perhaps she would like to join me in discussions with the House authorities to create a longer Question Time on women's matters. I would be delighted to do that. Our business support strategies and our social enterprise strategy are, of course, designed to support women as well as men. The variety of examples in the social enterprise strategy includes a number of companies—I have just referred to one that provides child care services—developed and run by women.

Mr. Chris Mole (Ipswich): Given the important role that women can play in social enterprises, will my right hon. Friend explain how the business support services for which the Department of Trade and Industry is responsible can provide support to ensure that social enterprises have the management and financial skills and other capabilities of mainstream businesses?

Ms Hewitt: We have looked particularly at the needs of social enterprises. In some respects—access to finance, for instance—they are pretty much the same as for any other business. In other respects, such as the legal framework in which they operate, they have quite different needs. Through the regional development agencies and through business links we are ensuring that business advisers have the necessary specialist knowledge to support entrepreneurs who want to set up a social enterprise. I am glad to say that a number of the regional development agencies are already creating support networks designed to encourage social enterprise.

Sandra Gidley (Romsey): Social enterprise, according to the Minister,

"can free people to become enthusiastic participants and owners of public services."

I totally support that sentiment. The latest figures clearly show, however, that women are not becoming enthusiastic participants in managing public services. The number of public appointments of women has remained disappointingly static, at 34 per cent. over the last year, which shows a failure on the part of the Government. Will the Government give their full attention to this issue, or shall we continue to see part-time results from a part-time Minister?

Ms Hewitt: Oh dear. I am sure that the hon. Lady is aware that in 1991 only 23 per cent. of public appointments were held by women. We succeeded in increasing that to one in three by March last year, but change takes time. Unless we take positive action, it will not happen fast enough. That is why, last year, my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Exclusion and Deputy Minister for Women and I launched a series of seminars and programmes to encourage thousands of women to put themselves forward for public appointments. The hon. Lady will understand that only about 15 per cent. of public appointments fall vacant each year, but I have no doubt, given the hugely enthusiastic reception we received at those events, that many more women will come forward and be appointed.

Women Entrepreneurs

19. Ms Meg Munn (Sheffield, Heeley): What progress has been made towards creating a strategy for increasing the number of women entrepreneurs. [97610]

The Minister for Women (Ms Patricia Hewitt): As my hon. Friend the Minister for E-Commerce and Competitiveness said a few minutes ago, a national strategic framework on women's enterprise has been produced by the Small Business Service and is currently out for consultation. This strategy, which will be launched in April, will strengthen business support for women who want to start and grow a business.

Ms Munn: I thank my right hon. Friend for her answer. Will she take this opportunity to congratulate Yorkshire women, who are not only the most entrepreneurial women in the country but are more entrepreneurial than Yorkshire men? Are there lessons to be learned from Yorkshire women's businesses, such as the Sheffield-based public relations company, diva, which recently won three awards, that could be included in the Government's strategy?

Ms Hewitt: I readily congratulate Yorkshire women generally, and diva in particular, which is a business that I know, on their great entrepreneurial success. I also congratulate my colleagues in business links, in south and west Yorkshire, who are developing successful networks of women entrepreneurs. The fact remains that if we could get women in the rest of the country to set up new businesses at the same rate as men, we would have an extra 100,000 new businesses in Britain every year.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster): Does the Minister agree that entrepreneurs—whether men or women—are, by their very nature, highly self-motivated, imaginative and problem solving, and that those traits cannot be created by a Government strategy?

Ms Hewitt: I am afraid that it is typical of Conservative Members to imagine that Government can have no effect on that. We find from the entrepreneurs and small businesses that we help that—as with the Manufacturing Advisory Service we discussed earlier—they welcome that support and want more of it. We are delivering it.

UK Companies (Women Employees)

20. Mr. Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell): What recent discussions she has had with UK companies who employ women in developing countries. [97612]

The Minister for Women (Ms Patricia Hewitt): I have regular meetings with British companies that have operations overseas. Promoting corporate social responsibility both at home and abroad, including ethical employment practices, is a high priority for this Government.

Mr. Challen: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that reply. I am sure that she would agree that an expansion in free trade should not lead to an expansion in sweatshops and the exploitation of women in developing countries. Sadly, in many cases, the reality does not match the rhetoric. One example is the Gina Form Bra Company, which operates in Thailand and has been condemned by that country's National Human Rights Commission. The company oppresses trade unions, but it employs 1,100 women. It also supplies a major, well known British high street retailer, as do many other such companies. Will she have a talk with British retailers about where they source their materials from and about eradicating the practices that I have mentioned?

Ms Hewitt: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his question. I am aware of the situation that developed at Gina Form Bra Company in Thailand and I know that the Labour Minister in the Thai Government has already taken action on it. Once I have received more information, I will certainly discuss it with the British retail companies concerned and with my opposite number, Dr. Adisai, the Minister for Commerce in Thailand, whom I had the opportunity to meet recently, and agree with him on the need for free and fair trade across the world.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): The right hon. Lady said earlier that she has introduced Fair Trade tea and coffee in the Department of Trade and Industry, on which I congratulate her. Is she aware of the John Lewis Partnership initiative of encouraging trade in Fair Trade wine, and will she undertake to meet Steve Esom, managing director of Waitrose, and Sir Stuart Hampson, chairman of John Lewis Partnership, who have done so much to encourage Fair Trade retailing in the UK, and the fair employment of people overseas?

Ms Hewitt: I am delighted to congratulate John Lewis and Waitrose on that initiative. I have great admiration for those companies, which are, of course, owned by their employees. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Minister for E-Commerce and Competitiveness recently met the organisation to discuss corporate social responsibility.

Airport Security

12.30 pm

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset) (Urgent Question): I hope that the Home Secretary might be willing to make a statement to describe his assessment of the current situation at Heathrow, and the Government's response to it.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Blunkett): Since Tuesday, there has been an enhanced level of security throughout the capital. As the Metropolitan police said in its statement, which was made on behalf of all those engaged in the operation, this was likely to be most visible at Heathrow airport. At the request of the operational services, it was agreed that, as in the past, the armed services could be called on for preventive and protective measures.

It may help the House if I set the events of this week in the context of what was said in my statement of 7 November, and if I recall key points. As I made clear, we face a real and serious threat. We know that al-Qaeda will try to inflict loss of human life and damage upon the United Kingdom. That is why we have explicitly pointed to some of the most obvious risks, such as to transport infrastructure, and why the Government have taken a range of measures to improve public protection. In doing so, we have been mindful of the importance both of keeping the House informed, and of keeping continuity of operational policing and security measures.

The House will forgive me if I quote the most relevant passages of the statement of 7 November. I said:

"Aviation security measures remain at an enhanced level following the attacks on September 11th and the government keeps these measures under constant review. From time to time additional protective steps are being taken, and will continue to be taken as the situation demands."

"Where threats are specific, we seek to thwart them. Where they are general, we seek to analyse them, and take whatever responses we believe to be necessary to ensure the protection of the public."

This is precisely what we have done this week, and will need to do from time to time in the future. If the situation were to change, I would inform the House. If there are specific incidents—as tragically occurred in January, with the death of Detective Constable Oake—I will come back to the House. However, I do not believe that it is responsible to provide a running public commentary from the Dispatch Box on every end and turn—any more than previous Governments did during the past 30 years, when facing the threat from Irish terrorism.

As with those Governments, our view is that we must do nothing to undermine the work of the police and the security services. We have to make fine judgments, which must ensure the safety of sources of information. The terrorists must not be able to assess what we know and how we know it.

We must give the public the information that they need to protect themselves and others. We did precisely that with the statement last Tuesday morning. However, we must also avoid frightening people unnecessarily or causing the sort of economic and social damage that does the work of the terrorists for them. The public must be alert but not alarmed. That is why I have consistently—and again this week—facilitated confidential briefings for the shadow Home Secretary and the Liberal Democrat spokesman.

Finally, I again pay tribute to the work of our police, security and armed services. We owe them our deepest gratitude for the continuing vigilance, courage and professionalism that they have shown.

Mr. Letwin: I am grateful to the Home Secretary for coming to the House and making a statement. I join him in the tribute that he pays to those who put themselves at risk to protect us.

In his statement, the Home Secretary repeated the sentiment expressed in the letter that he sent me this morning. The right hon. Gentleman wrote:

"I do not believe that it is responsible to provide a running public commentary from the despatch box on every turn and development in the operational measures taken to protect the country's security."

I put it to the right hon. Gentleman that it is far better to set the precedent of measured and comprehensive statements in the House than to allow a "running public commentary"—to use his words—to be provided by confused and conflicting signals given by other Ministers, on the airwaves and in press briefings.

As far as the substance of the Home Secretary's statement is concerned, the right hon. Gentleman has, as he knows, the full backing of the Opposition. On the basis of what he has said today, and of other information that has been vouchsafed to us, we believe that the actions taken by the Government, the security agencies, the military and the police are justified, responsible, appropriate and proportionate. However, I remain concerned, as I have been over the past nine months, that the level of general preparedness to deal with and contain the effects of any major terrorist attack is not yet fully adequate to the task.

There is worrying evidence, whether we look at the protocols governing inter-service co-ordination at local level or at the level of equipment and training of personnel in key positions, that, although preparations are being made, the pace of action is too slow. When those signs of lack of preparedness are allied to insufficient levels of prevention—for example, in relation to the security of ports and nuclear power stations—one begins to have the uncomfortable feeling that there is a degree of inertia in Whitehall. [Interruption.]

Labour Members may tut; they are ill advised so to do. It is the Opposition's duty to ensure that pressure is applied to the Government to ensure that the Government do everything necessary to protect the British public. I fear that we may still be at the stage where no one wants to upset the Whitehall apple cart, and where no one in Whitehall wants to offend anyone in the nine Government Departments with responsibility for the various aspects of civil protection.

I ask again, as I have asked for months, whether it can possibly be right for there not to be a senior Cabinet Minister who attends to these matters from early in the morning till late at night and whose remit is to galvanise Whitehall into action. Would not the existence of such a Minister also ensure that the Government were able, in the proper way and through the House of Commons, to speak with one clear and unwavering voice about matters that affect us all?

Despite Labour Members, we in the House today are ultimately all on the same side of the same barricades. We all share the desire to protect the public and ourselves properly. We look to the Government, in what may be troubled weeks and months ahead, both to instil an appropriate sense of urgency in the official machine and to ensure that public trust and public confidence are engendered by a flow of accurate and timely information.

Mr. Blunkett: It is clearly the right of the Opposition to question the Government when the Government are clearly at fault. It is clearly the job of the Opposition to raise immediate issues, as they have today, briefly, as part of the shadow Home Secretary's statement. I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman has chosen this private notice question to raise issues that are not relevant to the immediate situation and that were not put to you, Mr. Speaker, in the terms of the question.

I am happy to answer to the House on the wider issues of preparedness, general security and resilience. As I indicated, we have regularly made statements to the House on those issues, as we will again in a few weeks' time, when we debate the renewal of part 4 of the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001.

This afternoon, I want to rebut those critical elements that have divided the House in a way that was never the case during 30 years of Irish terrorism—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I did not grant this urgent question to give hon. Members the opportunity to shout across the Chamber. This is a very, very serious matter and I will not tolerate shouting. If the shouting continues, the urgent question session will cease. I say to hon. Members: do not shout across the Chamber at a time like this.

Mr. Blunkett: I seek entirely to refute the allegation that our security and policing services are not prepared, or are not in a position, to secure our well-being, and are not securing our well-being, because patently they are. The exercise being undertaken this week is precisely to achieve that goal. It is to ensure that evidence provided is acted upon, that measures are proportionate and that the work being done secures the population against the danger of threat at this particular moment. The security services for which I am responsible and the policing and anti-terrorist branch for which I am responsible are not only acting in a responsible and accountable way but, as I indicated at the end of my statement, are doing their job with great professionalism and courage.

I shall deal with two of the issues raised by the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin). First, I believe that it is right to report to the House on what is correctly the role of politicians. I am aware that, in opposition, it is sometimes difficult to get one's case across, so constant reiteration of a requirement that someone should come to the Dispatch Box is an understandable tactic. We had 18 years in opposition so we are aware of the frustrations. However, for a Cabinet Minister—me or anyone else—to come day by day to the Dispatch Box to answer for the operational activity of our security and policing services would be unnecessary and dangerous, in terms both of the alarm that it would cause and of the unnecessary hype that it would inevitably involve.

Secondly, to detach the responsibilities of a Minister from the security services and policing, including the anti-terrorism branch, would clearly be responsibility without power. It would mean someone having to answer on areas for which they were not responsible and would detract from the accountability that we all carry as Ministers, including my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Transport and for Health, who are on the Treasury Bench today.

The allegation of confusion or mixed messages is entirely due to the misreporting—[Interruption.] I hear calls in relation to my right hon. Friend the Labour party chairman, who was entirely misquoted, and who said absolutely nothing that has not been said before in terms of the raising of consciousness of danger consequent on what happened on 11 September 2001. It is precisely because of what happened then that the measures we have taken have been put in place, and the operations, which will have to continue when necessary and will have to be repeated from time to time, will be put in place.

If every time we take measures to protect the public, enhance our level of preparedness and engage our security police and where necessary our armed services, there are calls for debates in the House or statements at the Dispatch Box, we shall damage rather than enhance the chances of catching those who threaten our lives and those who would put our nation in danger.

I appeal to the official Opposition, who have done nothing but shout throughout this statement, to act with a degree of responsibility and to continue the consensus that we have had—until their party leadership has clearly instructed their spokesmen to do otherwise.

Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey): We are very grateful that the Home Secretary has made his statement, and I am very grateful for the briefings I have periodically received, which I respect, and whose confidentiality I respect.

I entirely agree that it is not the Home Secretary's job to provide a running commentary on such important matters, and that it is of course of paramount importance that nothing be said that compromises the intelligence and other activities we need to carry out as a nation. I do not doubt the right hon. Gentleman's judgement or his integrity in the decisions he takes. I hope that that shows that there is a common basis on which we are willing to proceed.

Given that it was exceptional to see troops deployed on the mainland of the United Kingdom, does the right hon. Gentleman accept that it was appropriate—exceptionally—to describe such exceptional measures by coming to Parliament, because that gives him the opportunity to make the authoritative statement that is proper to his office on behalf of the Government, both to avoid confusion and to allow any appropriate questions to be answered?

Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that any decision as to what military provision is made is a matter operationally under the control of the military rather than the Government, that the military will respond as it thinks appropriate, and that it is a matter on which it does not take direction from politicians?

Can the right hon. Gentleman also confirm that the Government—he and his colleague the Secretary of State for Transport, in this instance—are taking in hand the recommendations of the Lord Carlile report about increasing security at all our ports, our airports and seaports, and are taking on board suggestions, including that made by my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake), about improving airport security, which everyone agrees is of paramount importance?

Lastly, could the right hon. Gentleman have urgent discussions with his colleagues in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, so that arrangements can be made—arrangements which I know they are thinking about—both to give the public in written form in the next few weeks clear information about how they should respond, or where they should seek further information, and to assure us that at local government level the necessary resources and finances are in place for any necessary civil response to the exceptional situation which is, sadly, threatening our country at present?

Mr. Blunkett: I thank the hon. Gentleman for the measured way in which he presented his questions and his case.

I can confirm that the operational responsibility for calling upon the armed services rests primarily in this case with the police. It is for them to determine whether they think that would be appropriate, and that will be the case in the future.

The armed services have been brought in from time to time on the British mainland when requested operationally. It is precisely because of the split between political and operational responsibility that I made my earlier remarks about appearances at the Dispatch Box or anywhere else. That must be understood unless we are to change the relationship with the police and armed services in such circumstances. Not all those in the House, because of the time they have been here or the responsibility they have held here, will understand that, but I am sure that the hon. Gentleman does.

Yes, we do believe that it is necessary—and it will be from time to time—to repeat the kind of exercise that has taken place this week, including exercises to establish precisely the preparedness to which the shadow Home Secretary referred. That will occur over the months and weeks ahead, and I think that people will welcome it and treat it with responsibility.

Yes, we do need to ensure that there are means to inform the public well and for them to be able to make contact, and we will put that in place. Yes, we are taking seriously what Lord Carlile has suggested. As with the Wheeler report on airports—we referred to this in the House not so long ago—we are taking additional measures to ensure security, as we are doing this week.

Yes, we will need to enhance and work with local government on its civil contingency roles, and we will return to that in debates in the House. We readjusted the funding to £90 million, as the hon. Gentleman will know, precisely to ensure that we reflected the concerns that he has raised.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I point out to hon. Members that I require questions, not statements, and those whom I call should ask one question.

Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North): May I tell my right hon. Friend that, when my constituents awoke earlier this week to find 2,000 police officers and military around the site of their biggest employer, they would have been as disgusted as I am today to see that this matter has been dragged into party political point scoring? May I ask him, please, bearing in mind the exigencies of the circumstances that he describes, to realise that the rumour mill has started to grind and in the vacuum, without information, rumours will spread? Will he please assure the House that when he is able to give us the information he will do so?

Mr. Blunkett: Statements are put out by the operational commanders. That has always been the case is incidents of this sort, precisely to avoid politicians getting embroiled in second-guessing or directing the operational activity. The information will be, and always has been, put out. At 6 o'clock on Tuesday morning, an agreed statement was put out by the Metropolitan police, and that statement stands. Of course, when there is further information, they will release it, as they always do, including when any measure is taken that involves arrests. I have always reported to the House when those arrests have involved the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): My constituents who live adjacent to Manchester airport, or those who work there, are already concerned not because of anything said in the House, but because of the pictures of a military presence at Heathrow airport that they saw on their television screens. What they want from the Home Secretary is reassurance that appropriate security measures are being taken at and near Manchester airport and other regional airports, and that the concentration is not just on the highest profile target, particularly given that, by increasing security at Heathrow, it must surely be possible that softer targets elsewhere might be sought.

Mr. Blunkett: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport has ensured that there is enhanced security and continues to keep that under surveillance. May I lighten things a little? I do not want to do what might be described as a Suffolk, Coastal—a Gummer—but one of my sons flew from Manchester airport at breakfast time this morning. So I would certainly assure everyone that it is safe to use our airports—that was the thrust of the question—and that they should not be fearful of doing so, precisely because the measures have been put in place and the security has been provided to ensure that they can go about their business free from fear.

David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is it not absolutely essential for the Government, the Opposition and, indeed, all Members of Parliament to get across the point that mainstream Islam—no less legitimate than any other religion—is in no way involved with those fanatics, and that those fanatics are far removed from Islam and the teachings of Islam; and to recognise that, post 11 September, the war against democracy is more likely to be a long one than a short one?

Mr. Blunkett: I welcome what my hon. Friend says. Not only have the Muslim Council of Britain and the overwhelming majority of Muslims, as citizens, provided us with the backing that we need to do the job and the intelligence needed to ensure that they are protected alongside all who live beside them, but they have also been horrified that any of their communities should be engaged at all with terrorist acts.

I want to make it clear this afternoon that those who provided information on the potential for danger used the term "end of Eid" in a way to describe the timing with which they believed action would be taken. All of us deplore the fact that anyone would have chosen the end of any festival—whether Eid, Christmas or any other—to have engaged in threats of that sort.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): Will the Home Secretary tell the House whether and, if so, when it was necessary to invoke the formal arrangements for military aid to the civil power? Does he agree that, when military aid to the civil power is invoked, it is entirely appropriate to make a formal statement to the House?

Mr. Blunkett: I made it absolutely clear that the police requested the support of the military.

Mr. Michael Portillo (Kensington and Chelsea): Requested?

Mr. Blunkett: I am being queried. Yes, requested—and that request was responded to. That is normally the case, with the consent of the Prime Minister, me and the Secretary of State for Defence to agree to that request. When that request is made again and there is sufficient concern that such measures are required, of course it will be granted. This was undertaken at the beginning of the week. I am sure that the House would respect and understand the fact that chapter and verse are not helpful in these circumstances, nor is it necessary for holding the politicians or the operational commanders to account.

Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is the height of irresponsibility to use an urgent question on the specific subject of airport security to identify alleged gaps in the security of this country in a number of areas?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question is out of order. I have granted the request for the urgent question, and that should be enough.

Mr. Francis Maude (Horsham): My right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) is the least partisan of politicians. This should not be, and is not, a matter of party politics, but it is the duty of hon. Members to question Ministers not just when they are at fault but sometimes to find out whether they are at fault. Although the emphasis is perfectly properly on Heathrow airport, will the Home Secretary give an indication of what steps are being taken at other airports—such as Gatwick, close to which many of my constituents live—to ensure that, as was suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady), the attention of any possible terrorist is not diverted to softer targets?

Mr. Blunkett: I agree with the first part of the right hon. Gentleman's question; his right hon. Friend normally is the height of consensuality. That is why this afternoon has been so remarkable. In the second part of his question, the right hon. Gentleman asks me to specify what steps have been taken at Gatwick. I am sure that, having been in government, he will, on reflection, ask himself one question: if I answered specifically, would it help or hinder those who are intent on carrying out terrorist acts there or anywhere else across our country?

Mr. Tony Banks (West Ham): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his statement and, indeed, on the Government's actions, which, by all accounts, have broad public support. Will he tell the House whether any consideration has been given to using military personnel to assist the civilian authorities on the London public transport system?

Mr. Blunkett: It is the same answer: if those operationally responsible put in requests for assistance from our armed services, they will be considered in precisely the way we have responded this week.

Mr. Portillo: May I ask the Secretary of State to accept that the House would like to stand shoulder to shoulder with the Government at this time of intense national danger, but may I ask him and his fellow Ministers to work harder to win the confidence and trust of the House and the British people? The Secretary of State will perhaps accept that the dodgy dossier has done great damage. May I ask him to accept that there should be no further attempts to spin where national security is involved? May I ask him, on reflection, to agree that when a Minister makes a decision such as that made this week on invoking military power a clear statement should be made, at the earliest opportunity, by the Minister responsible to the House of Commons, not by anybody else and not in any other place?

Finally, can I ask him why he believes that it is right for the United States to have a single Minister responsible for the fight against terrorism, but absolutely wrong for the United Kingdom to do the same?

Mr. Blunkett: As the right hon. Gentleman is a former Secretary of State for Defence I am slightly taken aback by his request that there should be a Dispatch Box statement every time there is a request for, or engagement of, the services.

I think that the right hon. Gentleman, who travels a lot, will understand the federal nature of the United States. As Tom Ridge has told me, there is no equivalent of the internal security service in the United States, there is no direct responsibility for the connection of any such security service to policing—because policing is both federal and local—and the connection that they are now seeking to make precisely replicates the responsibilities that I carry, for the reason that the security services and the police are under one jurisdiction. To separate them out so that they are under separate jurisdictions would achieve exactly the opposite of what the Americans are seeking to achieve. I am absolutely amazed that the right hon. Gentleman, for whom I have the most enormous respect—and, at the danger of upsetting my Back Benchers, long-standing liking—should have got it so appallingly wrong.

David Cairns (Greenock and Inverclyde): As responsibility for policing and civil defence issues are largely devolved to the Scottish Parliament, whereas matters of troop deployment and intelligence remain reserved to this House, can my right hon. Friend assure me that close liaison is taking place at the highest levels between Ministers at the UK level and Ministers in the Scottish Executive to ensure that constituents of mine flying from Scottish airports enjoy, where appropriate, the same levels of security as those flying from airports throughout the rest of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Blunkett: Yes, I can give such an assurance. Indeed, some of us will be flying into those airports over the next few days. I assure my hon. Friend that in these circumstances the reserve power on security and on security at airports remains with Ministers in this House.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): In wishing the Home Secretary well in the difficult and complex task that he faces, may I ask him to indicate, in view of the experience of al-Qaeda in the use of chemicals and gas, whether there are stocks of protective clothing in different parts of the country that could be made available if required?

If there is a devastating decline in the numbers of people using aeroplanes for travel, will the Government do what they can to ensure that assistance is given to the appropriate companies?

Mr. Blunkett: I am very pleased that the travelling public have responded so well and that there have been no discernible reductions in those using aircraft.

On the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question, I, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State with responsibility for CBRN—chemical, biological, radiological and nuclear weapons—and Departments, including the Department of Health and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, are mindful that facilities are and will be made available.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell): Will the Home Secretary accept that my constituents who live immediately to the west of Heathrow under the flight path, many of whom work at Heathrow or for the airlines that service it, are deeply concerned about the current security situation? Will he also accept that that was made considerably worse yesterday by the conflicting statements from the chairman of the Labour party? Can the Home Secretary give us an absolute assurance that we will not have further conflicting statements, which only add to the panic?

Mr. Blunkett: I have made the position absolutely clear in relation to the statements that were made and the responsibility that is carried. I say to the right hon. Gentleman's constituents that had we not taken action—had the operational services not taken the steps that were required—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Blunkett: Had we not authorised the steps to be taken, and had the operational services not acted as they did, the right hon. Gentleman's constituents would have had a great deal more to fear than if we had not taken steps to reassure people that the necessary action had been taken. I really do not understand, given that we have sought to protect the public—so far, thank goodness, successfully—why the nature of this afternoon's questioning has been so antagonistic.

Angus Robertson (Moray): While we accept the seriousness of security announcements, does the Home Secretary accept there is still a breakdown of trust between the public and the Government following the comments of the Labour Party chairman and the publication of the dodgy dossier? What does he think will help to restore the public's trust in accurate security assessments, which are of critical importance?

Following the precedent of the confidential briefings that were made to the main opposition parties in Scotland and Wales on the situation in Afghanistan, will he do the same on this important matter, and include the parties in Northern Ireland, so that all of us in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland are fully informed on domestic security arrangements?

Mr. Blunkett: Where appropriate, those with responsibility who represent political interests and parties in this House will of course be updated. The one thing that would really restore confidence, however, would be if people did not mislead the public, inadvertently or deliberately, about what has or has not been said, what has or has not been inaccurately reported or, above all, which particular aspect relates to which particular threat. The idea that any reference to a document provided for background on Iraq should be made in this statement on the threat that is now being dealt with by the operational services in relation to domestic security would actually damage that trust and security. So my answer is, "Look at your own responsibility before you ask me about the responsibility of others."

Business of the House

1.7 pm

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): May I ask the Leader of the House if he will please give us the business for next week?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Robin Cook): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 24 FEBRUARY—Second Reading of the Industrial Development (Financial Assistance) Bill.

TUESDAY 25 FEBRUARY—Progress on remaining stages of the Communications Bill.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): Hear, hear.

Mr. Cook: I am glad that that measure is so consensual.

WEDNESDAY 26 FEBRUARY—Debate on Welsh Affairs on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

THURSDAY 27 FEBRUARY—Motions relating to the Draft Social Security Benefits Up-Rating Order 2003 and the Draft Guaranteed Minimum Pensions Increase Order 2003, followed by debate on flood and coastal defence policy on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 28 FEBRUARY—Private Members Bills.

The provisional business for the following week will include:

MONDAY 3 MARCH—Motion to approve the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 (Continuance in Force of Sections 21 to 23) Order 2003, followed by debate on the Intelligence and Security Committee report on the terrorist bombings in Bali on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to the Leader of the House for giving us the business.

Is the right hon. Gentleman yet able to give any indication when Budget day will be? There is a growing mystery about that. I do not know why the Government are so coy about it, although I think that I can guess, but surely it is now way past the time by which the House should, in all decency, have been told the date of Budget day, to give not only us, but all those with a genuine interest—which, I suppose, includes everybody in the nation—proper notice. I would appreciate that, as, I think, would the House.

The newly established Select Committee on the Lord Chancellor's Department has just announced that it is to investigate the role of the Lord Chancellor. I suppose that it will particularly consider his hybridity, because, as we know, he occupies a unique position straddling the Executive, the legislature and the judiciary.

Michael Fabricant: Like a colossus.

Mr. Forth: I will get my hon. Friend into Hansard by saying that he just said, "Like a colossus." I do not think that we should speculate on the exact stature of the Lord Chancellor at this stage—let us leave that to the Select Committee.

When the Select Committee has deliberated on the matter and presented its conclusions and recommendations, will we have the opportunity for a full debate on the Lord Chancellor's role and the Select Committee's views? That would be helpful.

Given the quickening pace of events at the United Nations, NATO and domestically, will the Leader of the House assure us that, were it necessary to recall the House next week during our short recess, arrangements are in place to do that at short notice and keep hon. Members kept fully informed?

Mr. Cook: Let me respond immediately to the last point. I do not envisage that it will be necessary to recall the House, but should such an eventuality arise, the option remains open. We have shown ourselves willing to recall the House on previous occasions. However, I would not wish people above us to take that response out of context as implying that there is any reason for believing that it will happen.

It is to the Government's and the House's credit that we have created a new Select Committee to cover the Lord Chancellor's Department. The right hon. Gentleman drew attention to the Department's many functions, which fully merit monitoring by a Select Committee. I welcome the increase in the ability and the capacity of the House to undertake its task of scrutiny. Of course, we will await the Committee's decisions with interest. It is premature to give an indication of the Government's response before an inquiry has begun, but we are co-operating with the Liaison Committee in determining the Select Committee reports that it would most like debated in Westminster Hall or the Chamber.

I assure the right hon. Gentleman that I take careful note of the fact that the Opposition have again demonstrated their enthusiasm for the Budget and an opportunity to rehearse the Government's success in securing the lowest inflation for a generation, the fastest growth in the G7 and—as announced in the past week—a further decline in unemployment. I shall ensure that the Chancellor is aware of the Opposition's keen interest in debating such matters.

I read yesterday's debate with interest. The shadow Chief Secretary got into difficulties in his interventions on the Chancellor. He appeared to experience problems in describing the way in which the Conservatives would achieve the 20 per cent. cut in public spending without affecting health and education. I am grateful that the shadow Chief Secretary at least agreed that the Government could share in the report when he writes it. It is surely in the interests of the Opposition as well as everyone else that he has adequate time to finish it before the Budget.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): I remind the Leader of House that it is important not only to keep hon. Members informed of dramatic developments in Iraq, but to give the House an opportunity to express a view. Does he recall that, last Thursday, I pointed out that the combination of tomorrow's inspectors' report to the Security Council and our absence from this place next week might mean that matters move quickly? I ask him again to consider carefully the timing, in Government time, of a full debate and vote on a sensitive, developing situation, especially the possibility of extending the time for further inspection or of a pre-emptive strike, with or without United Nations support in the form of another resolution.

Last week, the right hon. Gentleman said:

"there will be an opportunity for the House to consider the matter when we return on the week beginning 24 February if that is necessary."—[Official Report, 6 February 2003; Vol. 399, c. 440.]

Many hon. Members found that reassuring. However, the Secretary of State for Defence said in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch),

"I caution him against the insistence on requiring a substantive vote of the House before any military operations are conducted . . . If I may explain: it is obviously vital to retain the element of surprise if military operations become necessary."—[Official Report, 6 February 2003; Vol. 399, c. 459.]

Will the Leader of the House give us a cast-iron guarantee that if there is any question of the UK Government supporting a second resolution, making an input into it or taking a different view, supporting American action and putting British troops into the area of hostility, the House will not only be informed but have an opportunity of making a decision? Surely that is the least that a United Kingdom Parliament should ask.

Mr. Cook: The hon. Gentleman is fair minded and I would not wish anyone to read into my use of the word "informed" anything that suggests that I do not fully understand the importance of the House expressing a view. Any comments that I made in response to the possibility of the House needing to debate the matter in the near future embraces the opportunity and right to express a view. We have always made it plain that we want the House to give its approval, through a substantive motion and a vote, to any action. Should there be a second resolution, I anticipate that we would want to ensure that the House has the opportunity to support it as soon as possible. In return, I ask the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues to support any second resolution and its consequences.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): My right hon. Friend said that it would be inconceivable for British troops to be committed without a vote in the House of Commons. Let me press him on that. Does he accept that many Labour Members believe that going to war using prerogative powers and without a prior vote in the House of Commons to authorise action would be a betrayal and would split the Labour party and finish the Labour Government?

Mr. Cook: Of course, my hon. Friend is perfectly entitled to express his views as frankly and robustly as he wishes. However, he is not entitled to tamper with the views that I expressed. I said that it was inconceivable that any British Government could commit British troops without the support of the House of Commons. That remains the case. We have committed troops on many previous occasions without a substantive vote. I do not imply that we intend to proceed in that way on this occasion, because we do not. We want the full-hearted support of the House of Commons and we want that to be registered in the way that is open to it. I remind my hon. Friend that we held a debate on the previous Security Council resolution, which the House overwhelmingly endorsed. We continue to follow that approach. Should the inspectors' report require a second resolution, we will bring the matter to the House.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire): On Tuesday, the House of Commons Commission and the Standards and Privileges Committee published their response to the report by the Wicks committee on standards in public life about self-regulation in the House of Commons. I appreciate the many pressing issues that confront the Leader of the House, but will he find time before the Easter recess for a debate on the response?

Mr. Cook: Of course, I am well aware of the report from the Standards and Privileges Committee. I studied it with interest and I fully understand the importance of those matters. I welcome the fact that there was no great contention about our positive response to the Wicks report. Most of its recommendations are welcome and we can respond to all of them. Taken with the report of the House of Commons Commission on the parts that affect it, we have the basis for an important debate. I hope that we can arrange it before Easter and I want the House to make an early decision on those matters.

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly): The Leader of the House knows that, a few weeks ago, an excellent debate was held in Westminster Hall on the role of national Parliaments in the European Union decision-making process. Given that the Convention on the Future of Europe is nearing the end of its work, will my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on the Floor of the House on the role of national Parliaments in EU decision making?

Mr. Cook: My hon. Friend raises an issue about which we shall hear much more in the weeks ahead. It will be some time before the work of the Convention on the Future of Europe is complete and even longer—

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire): Good.

Mr. Cook: The right hon. Gentleman obviously wants the fullest possible period of reflection on the Convention's work. It will be some time before it is put before an intergovernmental conference for further decision. I am sure that the House will wish to discuss the matter and that there will be opportunities to do that. I welcome the fact that the Convention has provided us with a new innovation in our proceedings—

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): A new innovation?

Mr. Cook: I am grateful for the correction of my pleonasm. The Convention has provided an innovation that is welcomed by hon. Members of all parties. We now have a Committee to which our representative rather than a Minister reports. It may be desirable for it to meet again at some point.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): May we have an early debate on immigration procedures? I ask because my constituency has been devastated by the news that the Government are considering using the HMS Daedalus site in Lee-on-the-Solent as an accommodation centre for about 400 young male immigrants. We had been relying on the Minister for Citizenship and Immigration, the hon. Member for Stretford and Urmston (Beverley Hughes), who had said:

"We will be working closely with the local community as we develop our proposals and go through the planning process."

However, the Minister has this morning refused an invitation to attend a public meeting on Saturday or to send an official from the Home Office to explain the position. She is also on record as saying:

"I do believe that an accommodation centre is not a detriment to a local community."

In view of such matters, may we have an urgent debate? I would also suggest that the Minister be replaced by a speak-your-weight machine, because then we might get the truth.

Mr. Cook: I shall overlook that last remark, which was not worthy of an hon. Member of many years standing in this House.

Ministers who apply themselves diligently cannot necessarily be at any particular meeting on a specific date, especially at the short notice to which the hon. Gentleman referred. The Home Office and the Government will want to work closely with the elected representatives of the community and with the local authority to ensure that what is being proposed is fully understood.

We have debated this policy issue on a number of occasions, and there has been broad agreement on both sides of the House that there should be reception and induction centres for those who seek asylum in Britain. I understand that the Conservative party has a policy that all such people should be put in such centres, irrespective of where they have come from or the case that they make for entry. We cannot adopt such a policy—and the Conservatives would make it universal and compulsory—and at the same time object every time a site for a centre is identified.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): On 19 December, in the debate on the Christmas Adjournment, I raised a constituency case about a trading scheme. My hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw), the Parliamentary Secretary to the Privy Council Office, promised to ask the Department of Trade and Industry to respond to my concerns. I am sure that he has done that; however, nothing has emerged from the DTI. My constituent and I have put great pressure on the DTI on this issue, which has been going on for almost three years now. What we are now after is a small deputation to try to sort the matter out.

Mr. Cook: I regret to hear that my hon. Friend has not heard from the DTI. I know that my officials are diligent in pursuing issues that are raised with me during business questions. I assure my hon. Friend that they will pursue this issue as soon as the questions are over.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): May we have a debate on capacity of Britain's jails in relation to the Transport Act 2000? Congestion charges start on Monday and we are all supposed to be able to text our fees to the congestion charging agency. Are you aware, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I and 800,000 others are receiving error messages? The server has apparently collapsed. If I send my money via a text, I may well be liable to an £80 fine. I will not pay that £80 fine. I will not be present for future debates because I will probably be carted off to jail with another 800,000 people. When may we have a debate on this issue—before I am carted off to prison?

Mr. Cook: In a previous intervention, the hon. Gentleman invited me to visit Lichfield cathedral. It would give me even greater pleasure to visit him in prison.

On the question of electronic communications, I was entertained to see in this morning's press a report of an internal e-mail at the Conservative party, saying that Monday's introduction of the congestion charges would provide "a golden opportunity to get a few quotes in the papers."

I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on having anticipated that golden opportunity. However, I hope that one of the quotes in London's local papers will come from a Conservative Green Paper of 1996, which said, in relation to congestion charging,

"Much research . . . has confirmed the Government's view that price signals are a highly efficient way of influencing transport demand."

That Green Paper was introduced by a Conservative Government in which a Minister responsible for transport was the gentleman who is being put forward by the Conservative party as its candidate for mayor. Conservatives should stop playing politics with this and admit that they also contemplated congestion charges.

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon): Given the huge concerns in the country about possible military conflict in Iraq, could some of the business that the Leader of the House has announced for the week after recess be replaced by a debate on that possible conflict? If that is not possible, may we at least have an extended Question Time on the issue, so that some of the scenarios for which military conflict may be ruled in or ruled out would become clearer to the public?

Mr. Cook: We are fully aware of the immense interest in the House in Iraq and in the international events surrounding it. That is why, following business questions, we will hear a further statement on Iraq from my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary.

The business for the week after recess is important. For instance, at last week's business questions, there was demand for a debate on Wales and that is partly why we have included such a debate in that week's business. However, should matters change, and should there be a more pressing requirement for us to address Iraq that week, business is always flexible and that could be done. I do not expect that need to arise, but should it arise we would consider the need for the House to debate such matters.

Mrs. Patsy Calton (Cheadle): Will the Leader of the House explain the legal and historic basis for the royal prerogative so that my constituents may understand the powers of the Government to commit troops to war without a substantive vote in this House?

Mr. Cook: In British history, troops have repeatedly been committed without a substantive vote in the House of Commons. [Interruption.] If my hon. Friends will allow me, I was about to say that, on this occasion, we have already had one substantive vote and it is our intention to have a substantive motion, with a further vote, should the situation require it.

I would say to hon. Members on the Liberal Democrat Benches that, for the past two months, they have pursued the issue of process as the sole issue of concern in relation to Iraq. At some point, they will have to come clean on what they will do if there is a second resolution. They can perpetually ask us what we will do if there is no second resolution, but we are entitled to clarity from them on what they will do if there is.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North): The Government have announced their intention to publish within the next two to three weeks the long-awaited energy White Paper. In view of the increasing importance of diversity and security of energy supply—especially in the context of the deteriorating international situation—will my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House ensure that a statement is made on the White Paper and that there is an early opportunity to debate it?

Mr. Cook: I understand the considerable interest of the House in energy matters, which have been raised frequently during business questions. I believe that the White Paper will be of fundamental importance to our commitment to international environmental targets. These are matters of great importance and significance and the Government will ensure that they are treated accordingly.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest): Last week the Deputy Prime Minister announced his intention to allow plans for hundreds of thousands of new houses to be built in the south-east of England. My constituents, not surprisingly, are extremely alarmed. They would like their opinions to be heard in this place. Although I appreciate that this matter cannot take precedence over the security and international matters that have been discussed today, will the Leader of the House please make time—Government time—for a debate on this matter in the near future? A possible title would be "The Concreting of Essex".

Mr. Cook: I am sure that all the hon. Lady's constituents who are seeking a house will have noted that she is opposed to having any more houses in her constituency or locality.

We had a full statement on this issue, followed by lengthy exchanges involving the Deputy Prime Minister.

Mr. Bercow: But not enough.

Mr. Cook: I agree that one can never have too much of statements from the Deputy Prime Minister. I am sure that he will wish to return in future to keep the House further informed.

It is important that we address what I would have thought all hon. Members from the south-east would acknowledge to be an acute housing shortage that has resulted in sharp rises in house prices. There is a risk that those house prices in the south-east will be beyond the pocket of essential public service workers.

As to concreting over anywhere, I am proud that this Government—ahead of time, thanks to the efforts of the Deputy Prime Minister and others—have hit their target of ensuring that 60 per cent. of new housing is on brownfield sites. We will ensure that we keep a balance.

Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate): Given that the House adjourned before 5.45 pm on Tuesday, that it could have adjourned at least an hour earlier yesterday and that this afternoon's debate is on the Adjournment of the House, why does my right hon. Friend find it so difficult to find time for an urgent debate to make true the Prime Minister's statement that decisions whether—not when—to commit British troops are a matter for our Government, our House of Commons and our people?

Mr. Cook: Today's debate is not on the Adjournment, although that is the technical basis on which it will proceed. It will be a debate about education for 14 to 19-year-olds, and I do not think that my hon. Friend should trivialise its great importance to the future of the economy or to the future of our young people. I am very pleased that the Government have introduced new initiatives on the education of 14 to 19-year-olds. I would have thought that she would welcome them and would wish the House to have the opportunity to discuss them fully.

On Iraq, I have made it plain that we have debated the subject before, and we will debate it again. I shall certainly wish to make sure that the House has every opportunity to reach a decision.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): Does the Leader of the House recall the very large anti-nuclear protest marches of the early 1980s, some of which he may even have supported before he modernised himself? Does he recall that the largest of them, in October 1983, was shown by scientific aerial survey to be only a quarter of the strength of the 400,000 turnout claimed? On the return of the House, may we have a ministerial statement—if necessary a written one—as to what measures will have been adopted to ensure that Saturday's protest is accurately counted so that false claims cannot be made in the way that they are traditionally always claimed for such protest marches?

Mr. Cook: I really think that the time has come to draw the curtain on how many people attended the demonstration in 1983.

As to the forthcoming demonstration on Saturday, it is, of course, part of the tradition of such demonstrations that there should be a variance in the estimates coming from the police and those taking part. I do no not wish to interfere with that tradition.

Mr. Gwyn Prosser (Dover): Tomorrow marks the 15th anniversary of the start of the P&O seafarers' strike, which started in 1988 and went on until 1999.

[Mr. Gwyn Prosser]

The seafarers were striking in support of safer conditions on cross-channel ferries, and the result was that 2,000 people were sacked simply for taking legal, official industrial action. Will my right hon. Friend find time to debate the plight of the sacked Dover seafarers, who lost their livelihoods, received no compensation and who continue to be blackballed to this day?

Mr. Cook: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for recalling a very worrying period of industrial relations. He is right. Some people will still be suffering to this day because of what happened on that occasion. The Government have introduced legislation to try to make sure that we have fair play for the work force and we continue to make sure that we review it to see what further fresh legislation may be required. I am sure that the matter to which my hon. Friend referred will be of particular significance in his constituency and will, no doubt, be remembered during the anniversary.

Pete Wishart (North Tayside): May we have an early and urgent debate about the cause of free speech, especially because we learned this morning that it is the Labour party—and not the police—that is denying the use of microphones at the anti-war rally in Glasgow on Saturday? Does the Leader of the House not realise that this attempt to silence the views of the overwhelming majority of Scots people does nothing other than undermine the Prime Minister's case? The public see that decision as the worst type of anti-democratic control freakery. Will the Leader of the House now have urgent discussions with his colleagues north of the border and down here to ensure that free speech prevails in Glasgow on Saturday?

Mr. Cook: I am sure that free speech will prevail. The hon. Gentleman raises the question of the ability of megaphone speech to prevail, and the issue at stake is the right of those inside the exhibition centre to hear those who are speaking inside rather than to be drowned out by those speaking outside.

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead): Tomorrow's report by Hans Blix may have as its consequence that the Government and the United States Government think that there has been a material breach. The report would hence be an occasion for war. Does my right hon. Friend therefore agree that it might be sensible to make plans for an urgent recall of the House next Tuesday?

Mr. Cook: I have said to the House that I will continue to keep under review whether there is a requirement for the House to meet in the event of substantial developments. However, I think that my hon. Friend outlines a timetable that is getting a bit ahead of itself. There will, indeed, be a report from Hans Blix this Friday, but I do not know whether that will precipitate a second resolution. If it does, the nature of the Security Council is such that I am not sure that the resolution would necessarily be concluded in the single week that we are away. We can certainly return to the matter when we come back. As I have said, I will keep the matter under review, but I do not, at present, anticipate a compelling requirement for us to return.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): The Leader of House will be aware that, like my right hon. Friend the Member for Bracknell (Mr. Mackay), I have a huge number of constituents who work at Heathrow. I am therefore concerned on their behalf about what happened yesterday. A moment ago in the House, we heard the Home Secretary quite deliberately giving the impression that the questions of the shadow Home Secretary, my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), were improper. The Home Secretary also sought to give the impression that he had come to the House voluntarily to make a statement and had not been dragged here as a result of the Opposition's request for an urgent question that was granted by Mr. Speaker. The Home Secretary also deliberately ignored every question from any part of the House that made it clear that the mischief yesterday resulted from the fact that we all heard a party official—someone who sits in the Cabinet only because he is chairman of the Labour party—making misleading statements on television and panicking the public. Can we have an urgent debate about the contempt for the House and the misuse of television by Ministers who talk about security when they are not the Cabinet Minister responsible for security?

Mr. Cook: My almost obvious conclusion from that question is that the hon. Gentleman was not called in the previous exchanges.

Mr. Hawkins: I was present as shadow security Minister.

Mr. Cook: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for confirming what I have just said. He did not have an opportunity to make a point on the previous statement, so he has made it now.

I would not be living on the same planet as reality if I were to suggest to my right hon. Friends that, when they appear at a broad-ranging broadcast interview, they should refuse to answer certain questions. I doubt very much whether Jeremy Vine would be terribly impressed if they waved to him a letter from the Leader of the House instructing them not to answer questions on certain issues. Of course, it is in the nature of being a Minister in a Government, who are accountable to the public, that one is asked a range of questions that are not necessarily within one's brief. The comments of my right hon. Friend the Minister without Portfolio have been taken ludicrously out of context.

The evidence is that there was a real risk, and an appropriate response was made. The decisions about what the appropriate response should be were taken by those responsible for operational deployment and they were fully backed by the Home Secretary and others in the Government. That is entirely the right thing to do. However, I deprecate attempts by members of the Opposition to turn this into a party-political argument.

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North): In the light of the critical report of the rail regulator that was published today and in which he challenges the rail network's costs and the Strategic Rail Authority's plans to scale down rail investment—including indefinite deferral of the Thameslink 2000 scheme, the cuts in rail freight grants and other serious concerns—will my right hon. Friend make time for a serious debate about the future of the railways? In it, we could discuss, among other things, the desirability of bringing them back into full public ownership.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): That is a good idea. Shall we agree to it now?

Mr. Cook: I see that my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins) has at least one supporter in the House. However, I do not advise him to put the issue to a snap vote.

The rail regulator has repeatedly expressed his concern about the mounting costs of carrying through the important renewal of the railway structure. It is important that the rail industry should get costs under control. One of the reasons that we want costs to be brought under control is that there is more investment than at any time in the past decade going into the rail industry. That will continue for the decade of the 10-year plan, at the end of which we will have a better rail industry that is better able to cope with the demands on it. That will take time, but my hon. Friend should not seek to give comfort to the Opposition by suggesting anything other than that record sums are going into the industry, and rightly so.

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland): Could the Committee on Modernisation undertake an early assessment of the impact that the change of hours is having on the work of Committees? To illustrate that, may I point out what happened in the Scottish Grand Committee yesterday? As a result of the Government timetabling a statement—which was an exercise in reheating yesterday's dinner—and two Divisions, there was little time for Back-Bench contributions to the debate. Indeed, the entire Scottish Conservative group was left with only three minutes in which to put his case. Those who supported the Leader of the House—I am included in that—[HON. MEMBERS: "Ah."] Those of us who supported him did not do so on the basis that our views would be cast in stone for the next 200 years.

Mr. Cook: I admire the hon. Gentleman's confidence that his views will be held in stone, or any other form, for the next 200 years. Obviously we will be required to revisit matters that need detailed amendment and adjustment. One of those is the discovery, which I think surprised many members of the Scottish Grand Committee, that the Committee does not have the same Standing Order provision as Westminster Hall to enable the Chairman to prolong a sitting if it is interrupted by a Division. That is a legitimate matter for consideration and we should take account of it.

Mr. Tom Watson (West Bromwich, East): I thank my right hon. Friend for his gracious and tactful reply to my question on sitting hours last week. As he has had a week to sleep on it, has he managed to take 40 winks to consider early-day motion 607?

[That this House regrets the revised sitting hours; notes that the business of the House has been adversely affected; and calls for a review of the arrangements.]

It has been signed by more than 100 colleagues and calls for an urgent review of procedures. Can he tell me how many Members it would take to allow a debate on the new working arrangements?

Mr. Cook: I rather thought that the tact of my reply fully matched the tact of my hon. Friend's question last week. I notice that there are a number of signatures to the early-day motion, although not quite as many as voted against the proposition, which was carried convincingly and comfortably in the House on 29 October.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): May we please have an urgent debate in Government time on support for enterprise? Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that although the Ernst and Young enterprise survey published last month showed that the proportion of entrepreneurs who believe that the Government attach a high priority to entrepreneurship had doubled over the past 12 months, ministerial pride in that fact should be qualified by the reality that the rise is from 1 per cent. of respondents to 2 per cent.?

Mr. Cook: I am encouraged that the trend is in the right direction. We must continue to raise it towards 100 per cent. as fast as possible.

Mr. Malcolm Savidge (Aberdeen, North): May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to early-day motion 716 on British participation in a war in Iraq?

[That this House does not believe that British forces should be required to participate in a war against Iraq unless all of the following conditions are met (a) that there is clear evidence that Iraq poses an imminent threat to peace, (b) that there is a substantive motion of this House authorising military action, (c) that there is an express resolution of the Security Council of the United Nations authorising the use of military force against Iraq and (d) that all other policy options have been exhausted.]

Although some names were too late to include on today's printed copy, by last night—in just one and a half days—it had attracted the support of more than 100 Members of Parliament. I suspect that that is just a partial reflection of the grave concern felt by hon. Members on both sides of the House, and probably not just on the Back Benches. Does my right hon. Friend recognise that it would be an appalling denial of basic democracy if we were effectively committed at the UN to pre-emptive war while Parliament was in recess?

Mr. Cook: I understand the continuing interest in Iraq. It may be for the convenience of the Chamber to move on to the forthcoming statement on Iraq so that some of the points can be debated in substance rather than tangentially through me. Although I have the fiercest attachment to the prerogatives and rights of the House of Commons, we cannot tell the Security Council that it cannot debate a matter or take a decision because the British Parliament happens to be in recess for a week. Should any decision be reached in New York, we will, of course, put that to the House at the earliest opportunity. As I said, we stand ready to recall Parliament should that be required, but I do not anticipate that happening at the present time.

Sandra Gidley (Romsey): We have just had the regular 10 minutes of questions to the Minister for Women, but their focus is narrow and many submitted questions are transferred. Will the Leader of the House give some thought to supplementing those questions with a regular cross-cutting question session to Ministers in various Departments along the lines of the recently successful questions on youth issues?

[Sandra Gidley]

Mr. Cook: I entirely agree that the recent experiment in cross-cutting questions on youth issues was a great success. [Interruption.] Well, I am sorry that the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing) was not there, because it attracted the largest attendance that Westminster Hall has seen.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest): I was there.

Mr. Cook: Members who attended found it a success. At a time when we are not always held in the highest of regard and esteem outside this place, I was encouraged by the fact that the young people who attended also regarded it as a success and were impressed by it.

On the questions to the Minister for Women, I shall reflect on the comments of the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley). As there is provision for that in the Chamber, it would be more appropriate to continue those arrangements than to transfer them to Westminster Hall. However, I shall convey her enthusiasm to my right hon. Friend to have as many questions as possible and, in particular, not to have questions transferred.

Ms Meg Munn (Sheffield, Heeley): May I, too, draw my right hon. Friend's attention to early-day motion 607 on the change in hours? Does he agree that we would expect working practice changes in, for example, the fire service to be given more than a bare 14 days before firefighters expressed concerns about any problems encountered? Will he counsel hon. Members to have a little more patience with the changes and, dare I say, a little more imagination in resolving the teething problems, which would occur in any organisation that took on such changes?

Mr. Cook: My hon. Friend expresses herself with great clarity and persuasiveness. Tact suggests that it would be wrong of me to try to improve on such an excellent statement.

Iraq

1.46 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about Iraq. I thought that it would be helpful, given that the House is in recess next week.

The Security Council will meet in New York tomorrow to hear the latest reports from the executive chairman of UNMOVIC, Dr. Hans Blix, and the director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, Dr. Mohamed el-Baradei. I will be joining fellow Foreign Ministers for that meeting.

United Nations Security Council resolution 1441, which was agreed three months ago, placed the onus squarely on Iraq to co-operate fully and actively with United Nations inspectors in the disarmament of its weapons of mass destruction. It gave Iraq a final warning: comply with the UN's terms immediately or face "serious consequences." European Union Foreign Ministers expressed clear support for that goal last month when they declared unanimously that "the resolution gives an unambiguous message that the Iraqi Government has a final opportunity to resolve the crisis peacefully."

It is also worth recalling that at the summit in Prague, NATO Heads of Government—every one of the 19 present—explicitly endorsed resolution 1441. They said that it was a final opportunity and that serious consequences would follow.

Tomorrow's briefing will be the fourth update delivered by Dr. Blix and Dr. el-Baradei. The comprehensive reports that they delivered on 27 January, just over two weeks ago, painted a disturbing picture. Most damning of all was Dr. Blix's observation that Iraq "appears not to have come to a genuine acceptance...of the disarmament which was demanded of it".

Dr. Blix concluded that the Iraqi declaration submitted on 7 December, in accordance with resolution 1441, was "mostly a reprint of earlier documents," and did not

"contain any new evidence that would eliminate" unresolved

"questions or reduce their number."

The central premise of Iraq's so-called disclosure—that Iraq possesses no weapons of mass destruction—was, and remains, a lie. Nor was there any admission of Iraq's extensive efforts to develop weapons of mass destruction since the final UNSCOM inspections in December 1998 when it was effectively excluded from Iraq, as the inspectors made clear in their final report to the Security Council in February 1999.

In their update on 27 January, Dr. Blix and Dr. el-Baradei said that Iraq had failed to account for 6,500 bombs, which could carry up to 1,000 tonnes of chemical agent. It had also failed to account for 8,500 litres of biological warfare agent and a large amount of growth media, which could be used to produce about 5,000 litres of concentrated anthrax. They said that the 12 chemical rocket warheads unearthed by UNMOVIC inspectors were potentially, in Dr. Blix's words,

"the tip of a submerged iceberg".

They said that Iraq had failed to disclose the 3,000 pages of documents discovered not in an office but in the grounds of the private home of an Iraqi scientist, relating to the nuclear weapons programme of that country. They said that despite repeated requests from UNMOVIC and the IAEA, in accordance with resolution 1441, all interviews with key Iraqi personnel were being conducted in the intimidating presence of official "minders". They also said that in contravention of United Nations resolutions, Iraq had developed missiles that had been tested at ranges in excess of the 150 km limit specified in UN resolutions.

I remind the House that the British Government drew attention to Iraqi work on such missiles in the dossier that we published last September. We look forward to hearing in detail what Dr. Blix has to say tomorrow, but if media reports are correct, the al-Samoud missile programme is clearly in serious breach of Iraq's obligations. We would expect rapid action to eliminate any such illegal programme.

In drafting resolution 1441, Security Council members took pains to set two clear tests for further material breach by Iraq. In the first operational paragraph, they declared that Iraq

"has been and remains in material breach" of a score or more of obligations that date back to 1991. That is still the case. As for the two tests, a further material breach would have occurred, first, if Iraq made "false statements" or "omissions" in the declaration that it submitted on 7 December, and secondly, if it failed

"at any time to comply with, and co-operate fully in the implementation" of resolution 1441. The briefings by Dr. Blix and Dr. el-Baradei, as well as Secretary Powell's presentation to the Security Council last week, leave no doubt that Iraq has failed to meet both tests. The conclusion is therefore inescapable: Iraq is in further material breach of resolution 1441. We shall take full account of the reports of the chief inspectors tomorrow.

The prospect of military action causes obvious anxiety—as it should—here in the United Kingdom, here in the House, among our allies and in the region, and of course among the people of Iraq. I still hope and pray for a peaceful outcome to the crisis, but that will be possible only if we maintain unrelenting pressure on Saddam Hussein, including the threat of force, rather than casting around for excuses to delay. It is only through the pressure we have been exercising that we have got as far as we have in exposing much more of the danger represented by Saddam Hussein's regime, and exposing his lies and deception as well. If the international community lost its nerve now, that would significantly undermine the UN's authority and make the world a much more dangerous place, as dictators got the message that international law consisted of mere words and nothing else.

The Franco-German proposals announced this week to bolster the inspection regime will not deliver the assurance that the world needs about Iraq's weapons. Those proposals, I am sorry to say, are unrealistic and impractical. They shift the burden of proof from Iraq—which is where the Security Council has said it must be—to the inspectors, and they send Saddam the signal that defiance pays. What is the point of sending three times as many inspectors simply for Saddam to deceive them? What purpose is served by that? As Dr. Blix himself said on Monday,

"The principal problem is not the number of inspectors but rather the active co-operation of the Iraqi side, as we have said many times."

Those are the words of the chief inspector, not my words.

If the inspectors were to say that Iraq was actively co-operating, one might see a possible case for more inspectors; but I ask my hon. Friends, as well as Opposition Members, to consider what it is like to inspect anything without the co-operation of the organisation being inspected.

Iraq was found guilty of possession of weapons of mass destruction 12 years ago. The role of inspectors has always been to verify Iraqi compliance—this being based on the premise of Iraqi compliance—and not to engage in a "game of catch as catch can",

to use Dr. Blix's term.

I am glad to learn that other proposals attributed to the French and German Governments, such as the establishment of a no-fly zone over the whole of Iraq and the insertion of armed blue-helmeted UN troops, have now been officially denied. Had those proposals been implemented, they would have required an even higher degree of co-operation from the Iraqi regime than was required by resolution 1441. The creation of a no-fly zone over the whole of Iraq would have required the complete grounding of the Iraqi air force and its regular inspection to that end, and the insertion of blue-helmeted UN troops in a benign environment would have required all armed troops from Iraq to retreat to barracks. That too would have been the subject of inspection by the United Nations.

Let me now turn to the position in NATO. In mid-January, discussions began in the alliance of the need for contingency planning to cope with possible threats to the security of a NATO ally, Turkey, in the event of military action in respect of Iraq. Sixteen NATO allies, including 14 European nations, supported that entirely reasonable and responsible proposal simply to set in hand some military planning for very limited defensive mutual assistance. France, Belgium and Germany have resisted on the ground that a NATO decision on that very limited mutual assistance would somehow pre-empt any Security Council consideration of Iraq's further material breach. Faced with that deadlock, on 10 February Turkey requested consultations under article 4 of the Washington treaty. The discussions continue, with the United Kingdom fully supporting the efforts of NATO Secretary-General Lord Robertson to achieve consensus.

I remind the House again that at the Prague summit, less than three months ago, NATO leaders pledged their full support for resolution 1441.

Given the obvious risks and the possibility that military action may prove necessary, we are keeping under very close review the safety and security of both visiting and resident British nationals in the various countries of the middle east. We make assessments on a case-by-case basis for each country in the region, and will make announcements as necessary.

Even at this late stage, armed intervention is not inevitable. A peaceful resolution of the crisis remains in Saddam Hussein's hands. Full Iraqi compliance with the terms of Security Council resolution 1441 will deliver the outcome that the United Kingdom and the entire international community wish to see: an Iraq that no longer poses a threat to its neighbours or to the region. In the absence of full compliance by Saddam Hussein, however, United Nations inspectors will not be able to fulfil their mandate to verify Iraqi disarmament. Resolution 1441 warns Iraq to expect "serious consequences" in that event. By now, even Saddam Hussein must be under no illusions: that can only mean disarmament by force.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton): My right hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram), the shadow Foreign Secretary, is in China, and apologises for not being here today. I thank the Foreign Secretary for his statement, and for giving us a copy in advance.

The statement comes at a time when diplomatic relations between the United States and both France and Germany are, to put it mildly, scratchy. Public opinion here suggests that people are losing trust in the Prime Minister, and, crucially, we may be witnessing historic strains on the stability of a number of institutions that we have taken for granted for decades, such as NATO, the European Union and even the United Nations itself. However, we offer the Government our full support in their efforts to enable NATO to send missiles to defend Turkey. While we can understand America's fury at the attitude of France and Germany, we ask the Foreign Secretary to join us in urging our counterparts in Congress not to be drawn into recriminations against them. Whatever their feelings, we surely do not want relations between western democracies to slide into disarray.

The Foreign Secretary has said that we must wait for Dr. Hans Blix's statement to the United Nations tomorrow, and of course he is right. Any decision about Iraq requires an agonisingly difficult moral assessment. Resolution 1441 enshrines a judgment, which we share, that the cost of doing nothing is greater than the cost of doing something. Does the Foreign Secretary accept that if we are on the brink of military conflict, as seems likely, the issue must above all be approached with honesty and clarity? Given that resolution 1441 is fundamentally about Saddam Hussein's arsenal of weapons, and given the doubting mood of public opinion, do not talk of Iraqi links with al-Qaeda and links with terrorism, conflicting comments from Ministers, and the publication of an utterly substandard dossier only divert attention from the main issue and severely dent the Government's credibility?

A fortnight ago, a second UN resolution seemed a dead cert, but now it seems touch and go. The Foreign Secretary made no mention at all of a second resolution in his statement. Is it his intention still to go for one, and if so, when does he expect it to be voted on? If Hans Blix tomorrow reconfirms that Iraq is in material breach of resolution 1441, the Foreign Secretary said that "rapid action" will be taken, apparently, from what he said, by force, but how rapid is rapid? I think the Foreign Secretary and I agree that we respect those who take a principled stand against any military action. We also hope that they respect our shared view that we should not resile from implementing UN resolution 1441. Does the Foreign Secretary not agree that it is impossible to have any respect for a party leader who says that we must wait for Hans Blix, and then announces in advance of tomorrow's statement that he is going to go on the anti-war march on Saturday? After sitting on so many fences at once, it is no wonder that the leader of the Liberal Democrat party finds it so difficult to walk straight.

If Saddam Hussein goes, it is the clear intention of all involved in removing him to replace his regime with a democratic one if at all possible. But is it not a fundamental concept of any democracy that any Government should be accountable for their action to their electorate either directly or through Parliament; and is it not therefore a fundamental right of the British people that any UK military action should be subject to a substantive motion in the House of Commons?

The Secretary of State for International Development has so far refused to reveal any plans she may have for humanitarian aid to Iraq, and in The Guardian today she says that there will not be any aid anyway if there is not a second UN resolution. It is therefore doubly worrying that the Foreign Secretary made no reference to a second resolution today. At the very least, will he say what the Government's plans are for humanitarian aid, even if his Cabinet colleague will not? I welcome the news this week that Ariel Sharon has had talks with Abu Ala from the Palestinian Authority. Will the Foreign Secretary once again confirm our shared view that any action in or around the middle east needs to go hand in hand with a revival of the peace process between Israelis and Palestinians, without which there will never be stability in the wider Arab world?

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. Of course I understand the absence of his right hon. Friend the shadow Foreign Secretary.

Going through the points that the hon. Gentleman made, I accept that it is wise if we want to resolve this matter and ensure the cohesion of those key alliances of which we are members—NATO and the European Union—and, above all, maintain the authority of the United Nations, that we should seek to lower, rather than raise, the temperature of relations with countries with which we have great friendships, both within Europe and across the Atlantic.

On the issue of the dossier, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister dealt with that yesterday. We accept that parts of the document should have been made clearer, but I tell the House and the hon. Gentleman that the document itself was accurate in every particular—the part that was claimed to be from intelligence was from intelligence. As regards the second resolution, the reason why I did not explicitly mention the prospect of one is that we are waiting to hear what Dr. Blix and Dr. el-Baradei say. It is our decision as to whether or not we move a second resolution, and of course one remains in prospect. My view is that, rather than speculate about whether or not we move a second resolution and about what it says, having heard what Dr. Blix and Dr. el-Baradei said on 27 January, we should wait and see what they say tomorrow, then make our decisions. Subject only to recesses, our decisions will be reported to the House as quickly as possible. I also reinforce the point made by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House at business questions—the fact that the Security Council meets at times other than when the House is sitting means that we cannot always ensure that decisions made there coincide exactly with our sittings.

The hon. Gentleman made some interesting remarks about the leader of the Liberal Democrats. It is a matter for the right hon. Gentleman as to whether he goes on this march, but I have read all his statements carefully. The more I read them, the more completely confused I believe he is. For those who believe either that he is against any military action in Iraq or that he believes, as he said on 25 November in the House, that military action can only take place if there is a second resolution, I commend to the House the transcript of his interview on the "Today" programme on 27 January, in which he openly admitted that while a second resolution was his preference—he prayed the Prime Minister and myself in aid of that assertion—he then said that we might have to go without a second resolution—[Interruption.] Well, we look forward to further elucidation.

The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) referred to a substantive resolution. I agree, and always have done. I hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House will acknowledge that we have made a policy of introducing substantive resolutions in the House. That happened on 25 November, when we had a very good debate. There was a clear choice before the House—rather than a choice of whether we went home or not, there was a choice about the policy that we should follow. The Government's policy, which was supported by the Opposition, was backed by a vote of about 450 to 80, which I take to be a mandate on any basis.

As for a substantive resolution on military action, again, we have made it very clear first, that there will be a substantive resolution and, secondly, that it is our earnest intention and hope that that should take place in advance of any military action save in the one circumstance in which we judge that our troops would be put at risk. On such an occasion, the arrangement, as happened with the Conservative Government in January 1991, would take place a few days afterwards. That, too, however, would be very much second best. The overwhelmingly important issue, apart from all the other issues, is that the legitimacy of any action that we take as a British Government should be endorsed by the House, so that if our troops go into any action and place their lives on the line, they do so in the knowledge that they have the support of the British people as represented in the House.

Finally, on the middle east peace process, I entirely endorse what the hon. Gentleman said about the paramountcy of pursuing that process, which is why the Prime Minister and I were determined to go ahead with consultations with the Palestinian Authority notwithstanding the banning by Mr. Sharon of attendance at that meeting. On humanitarian aid, I do not recognise the description of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development. The Department for International Development is already providing millions of pounds to Iraq, and my right hon. Friends the Defence Secretary, the International Development Secretary, the Prime Minister and I had a detailed discussion this morning, as we have done for many weeks, about the nature of further humanitarian assistance and its conditions should military action prove necessary against Iraq.

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester): I start by thanking the Foreign Secretary both for providing prior notice of his statement and for coming to the House in advance of those critical meetings rather than after them. The Government have repeatedly made it clear that the international community can only deal effectively with Iraq if we are united. Does the Foreign Secretary therefore accept the concern that to ignore the vetoes in the Security Council may have serious consequences for that unity and would undermine the Security Council's role? Does he also accept the need to tone down the rhetoric on the part of Government to minimise the damage currently being done in relations with NATO and our EU partners, and with Russia and China? Will he use this opportunity to distance himself clearly from the suggestions being made in America that Germany and France should face economic sanctions or that American troops should be withdrawn from Germany as a result of this week's disagreements?

In his statement, the Foreign Secretary dismissed the French and Russian proposals that were put forward this week. Can he tell the House whether he has sought meetings with the French and the Russians about those proposals, and why he so quickly dismisses the option of further UN inspection and containment?

At the Security Council meeting tomorrow, I hope that Britain will lend its support to the work of the inspectors. If the inspectors believe that with more time, co-operation and space, progress could be made, they should be given more time. Will the Foreign Secretary commit himself to that, and recognise that the vast majority of members of the public who will be marching this weekend support the view, as does the Liberal Democrat leader, Charles Kennedy, that we should put our faith in the United Nations and allow the inspectors more time?

Finally, may I ask the Foreign Secretary to give a firm commitment that if a UN resolution is tabled next Monday, the House will be recalled on Tuesday for a full debate on that resolution?

Mr. Straw: First, may I say two things about the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Mr. Campbell), for whom the hon. Gentleman is deputising? I am sure that I speak for the whole House when I say that it is a matter of great pleasure to hear that the right hon. and learned Gentleman is making good progress. I also take the opportunity to record our congratulations to him on having been elected deputy leader of the Liberal Democrats.

The hon. Member for Winchester asked about us ignoring vetoes. We do not want to be in that position. We are asking all members of the Security Council, when they come to assess the report of Dr. Blix and Dr. el-Baradei, to follow through the true meaning of the language to which every single member of the Security Council signed up on 8 November. We cannot be in the position where we and other members of the Security Council believe that conclusions following from the true meaning of 1441 are inescapable, but one member, for example, seeks to avoid those conclusions. In the end, the decisions that the British Government make must be a matter for the British Government endorsed by the House, not for another member state.

[Mr. Straw]

We want a second resolution if we deem military action to be necessary. That has always been our position, but let it also be clear that 1441 is a sufficient mandate for such military action, because 1441 spells out with complete clarity that there are obligations on Iraq that it must follow through—very straightforward obligations. If Iraq follows them through, there will be—there can be—no military action whatever. If Iraq fails to follow those obligations through, it will be in further material breach, and if it is in further material breach, serious consequences—force—will follow. There was a suggestion in the United Nations when we negotiated 1441 that there had to be written into 1441 a requirement for a second resolution if military force was to take place. That was dropped from the final draft, which is how we ended up with 1441 in its present form.

The hon. Gentleman asked me about discussions with my French and Russian counterparts. We have discussions all the time. I shall be having more discussions with Igor Ivanov and Dominique de Villepin tomorrow. I accept entirely, as I did in response to the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton, that we do not want to be involved in recriminations between friendly member states of the United Nations, so we will not get involved in that.

On further United Nations inspections, I said in a speech on Tuesday this week that if the inspectors themselves ask for more resources, of course we will consider that, but we cannot be drawn into the argument from outside the inspectors' ranks, which seeks to imply that, in the absence of co-operation, more inspectors will resolve the matter. They will not. Procrastination is not the solution to the problem; co-operation is.

Alan Howarth (Newport, East): Does my right hon. Friend acknowledge that decent and humane instincts cause people to feel revulsion from war? Will he also explain to those who may be thinking about marching for peace on Saturday that there is an accumulation of evidence that indicates the need to deal decisively with the Iraqi regime as an irrational, aggressive, dangerous power in breach of international law, and that deeply desirable as it is that the United Nations should proceed together, if the UN proves unwilling to enforce its own resolutions, those nations that are willing to take responsibility would be justified in undertaking military intervention to disarm Saddam Hussein?

Mr. Straw: I agree entirely with my right hon. Friend. I do not criticise people who go on this march. That is their democratic right, and I celebrate the fact that they are able to go on the march. I acknowledge that not only they, but people of all political persuasions and none are anxious about military action. We should all be anxious about military action, but most of us recognise that in certain circumstances military action is necessary to save the peace.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk): Is the Foreign Secretary aware that there are many RAF personnel based in my constituency and living there? Quite a few have been deployed to the Gulf already; many are on standby to go. Those brave servicemen and women are prepared to lay down their lives for their country. Surely they deserve nothing less than a totally united alliance and a totally honest Government, who issue no more dodgy dossiers?

Mr. Straw: I have dealt with the latter point. The dossier itself was accurate. On the hon. Gentleman's wider point, yes, I am aware of the important garrisons of RAF personnel in his constituency. We salute their courage. Of course, as I said in my opening remarks, it is extremely important that those people, who are placing their life, their future and that of their family on the line, receive the fullest possible support, not just from this country, but from the wider international community.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): Just how will we determine that it is Saddam Hussein and his rotten regime that will face the serious consequences provided for in resolution 1441, and not the Iraqi people generally who suffer the bulk of the destruction? Their conditions have been described poignantly in the House by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development, who spelled out a number of serious humanitarian crises that will arise if an attack takes place.

Mr. Straw: Any military action involves a terrible but necessary calculation that the number of casualties and deaths from that military action should be less than that which would occur without such military action. I say to my hon. Friend that in that calculation we must not only bear in mind the deaths and killings by Saddam Hussein, which will continue into the future unless his vile regime is checked, but draw into that account the fact that Saddam Hussein is already responsible for the deaths of hundreds of thousands of Muslim people in his own territory and in the territory of Iran and Kuwait.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell): Does the Foreign Secretary share our concerns about Turkey, particularly in light of the disgraceful decision by France, Germany and Belgium not to fulfil their NATO obligations, and after the pretty shabby treatment that Turkey received from the EU for its application, which was underlined by the racist remarks of the Chairman of the Convention on the Future of Europe, Giscard d'Estaing? May I have an assurance from the Foreign Secretary that he will do everything to underpin Turkey, and that he will tell the Turks that the great majority of people in Europe, in NATO and in this country strongly back their new democracy?

Mr. Straw: The deal that was achieved at the European Union summit in Copenhagen was not a shabby one, but a very acceptable one, which we urged upon Chairman Erdogan and Prime Minister Gul at the time. I accept the wider anxieties expressed by the right hon. Gentleman. It is somewhat ironic that there is only one member state of NATO that is Muslim, and it is that state whose defence is being denied by three member states of NATO. This is an important matter to weigh in the balance. As for our position, we stand fully behind and in support of Turkey as a most important member of the NATO alliance and as a prospective member of the European Union.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): My friend mentioned the September document published by the UK Government, which suggested that Iraq had a fully functioning nuclear programme, but is it not the case that when the weapons inspectors reported on 27 January, they found no evidence at all that Iraq had reactivated its nuclear programme? It is because of the quality of evidence that has been presented by my friend and the Prime Minister that we seem unable to carry public opinion with us. Would it not be an absolute outrage if we went to war without a majority of members of the Labour party, the parliamentary Labour party and the British public endorsing that action?

Mr. Straw: I am sorry to say to my hon. Friend that I simply disagree with him. The evidence in respect of Iraq's possession of weapons of mass destruction, chemical and biological weapons and weapons programmes, and its readiness to develop a nuclear weapons programme, is overwhelming. The United Nations itself has said that repeatedly. This is not an assertion of the United Kingdom Government or of the United States; it is the central part of resolution 1441. I know that my hon. Friend subscribes very strongly to the United Nations and places faith in it. The third paragraph of the resolution states that the United Nations recognises

"the threat Iraq's non-compliance with Council resolutions and proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and long-range missiles poses to international peace and security."

That is the truth; that is what we are dealing with. It is Iraq that was found guilty 12 years ago and it has to prove its innocence, given the guilt that was plainly found in 1991.

On the nuclear weapons programme, the absence of evidence in a huge country where there are only 100 inspectors does not prove the absence of a programme. What we must then look at is the other circumstantial evidence. We must look at the fact that, in 1991, it turned out that Iraq had a nuclear programme that was so highly developed that it would have been able to launch nuclear weapons within three years.

Mr. Prentice: The evidence?

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend says that there is no evidence, but I look forward with interest to hearing what the inspectors say about the 3,000 pages of documents relating, I understand, to a nuclear programme conducted by Iraq. The documents were found not in filing cabinets in an Iraqi Ministry of Defence establishment marked "nuclear weapons programme", but in the private home of an Iraqi scientist. We would have found it odd if that had happened in this country and I believe that my hon. Friend would have found it so too.

Finally, I say to my hon. Friend—I do not believe that he is naïve, but I am anxious to protect him from that charge—that it is also worth bearing in mind the fact that Iraq said for four years that there was no evidence whatever of any biological weapons programme. Saddam Hussein said that it was absolutely untrue that such a programme existed and the inspectors could not find any evidence. As my hon. Friend is not naïve, I know that he would not have stood up and said, "Therefore, the programme does not exist." That would have been very wise, as it took the defection of Saddam Hussein's son-in-law to spill the beans and reveal that Iraq had the most terrifying programme. We know about this man. We know that he is not only a liar, but a man who has amassed terrible weapons to destroy his own people and the region. That is why we have to deal with the situation.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): I accept, in general, the evidence that the Foreign Secretary puts forward, but will he accept from me that last week's publication of the dossier, which was substandard at the least, undermined the Government's case, muddied the water and left those of us who broadly support the Government's position somewhat confused about their policy aims? Will the right hon. Gentleman tell me about those aims? He said earlier, "I still hope and pray for a peaceful outcome to the crisis." Can he foresee the achievement of such an outcome while Saddam Hussein is left in power in Baghdad?

Mr. Straw: Yes, and that has always been in prospect. Let us make this clear. It has been anticipated by the United Kingdom Government and by President Bush in an important speech that he made in Cincinnati late last year. I do not think that anybody in the House, on any side of the argument, has any brief for Saddam Hussein, but the objective of resolution 1441 was to secure his disarmament, hopefully by peaceful means. What President Bush said—I endorse these words entirely—is that if there was full and peaceful disarmament by Saddam Hussein, the nature of his regime would change. That is true. In any event, the objective is peaceful disarmament and Saddam Hussein has it in his hands to disarm peacefully and survive. I would not like the latter, but it would be an acceptable consequence of his full compliance with the will of the United Nations. That is why it is absolutely true when we say that he has a real choice. I hope that, even at this late stage, he exercises it.

Mr. Kevin Hughes (Doncaster, North): I am not a warmonger, and perhaps I should declare an interest: like thousands of others, my son has been called up for active duty. That will be worrying for me and my family, but it will not blur my judgment about difficult decisions that may need to be taken. Does my right hon. Friend agree that, if Saddam does not choose the peaceful route—it is still available to him as we speak—we may need to engage in military action, despite the shenanigans of Germany, France and Belgium?

Mr. Straw: I should like to place on record my huge respect for my hon. Friend and above all for his son. Like many other hon. Members, he has somebody in his family who will place their lives on the line if military action takes place. It is worth remembering that that is a long and honourable tradition for this country and that the freedoms that we hold dear and take for granted have been protected only as a result of the willingness of British servicemen and women to do what his son is now willing to do.

As for the action that we have to take, we hope and pray that the situation can be resolved peacefully. If it cannot be resolved in that way, we hope and pray for unity in the United Nations and the international community, but in the end, we also have to make our own decisions.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Have not Ministers told us in the past that there should and would be a second resolution of the United Nations? But today the Foreign Secretary tells us that that remains in prospect. Since he likes transcripts, I have a transcript of the Prime Minister's words on "Newsnight" exactly a week ago. The Prime Minister told the studio audience that the only narrow circumstances in which the United Kingdom would proceed to military action outwith a second resolution were those in which there was a majority in the Security Council that was subject to an unreasonable veto. It now seems that even that position has changed. Does the Foreign Secretary realise the hopeless position of going to war in the name of the United Nations without its full authority?

Mr. Straw: The hon. Gentleman needs to read the terms of resolution 1441. The full authority of the United Nations is there. We want a second resolution and we have always made that clear. As to whether there will be a second resolution, that remains to be seen.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): May I tell the Secretary of State that his tactics of exaggerating the negative and ignoring the positive in the inspectors' reports fool no one? War based on what we know so far would be totally disproportionate. May I bring him back to the public and the members of his own party? One recent poll showed that 46 per cent. of people in this country would not support a war against Iraq on the basis of what we know now, with or without a second UN resolution. In those circumstances, if he sends our servicemen and women into great dangers without the backing of the country, he will be betraying them and, I also think, disgracing his high office.

Mr. Straw: I do not think that my hon. Friend's comments are justified or worthy of her. I know that she feels strongly about this matter, but others are entitled to take a different view and feel just as strongly. I do my best, as I always have done in this House, accurately to reflect and summarise documents that we are discussing. It is impossible to read the reports of Dr. el-Baradei and Dr. Blix without concluding that they show in terms that I have already quoted that there has not been the active co-operation that was sought by resolution 1441—a lack of co-operation that goes back 12 years. I say to her that no one is exaggerating the problem and no one has invented the fact that Iraq had the programme. Until it proves otherwise—the onus is on it to do so and the evidence suggests the reverse—it looks as though it continues to have the programme. We owe it to our own people, but even more to the people of the region, to eliminate that danger before it is too late.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon): What evaluation have the Government made of the latest so-called bin Laden tape? The United States has leapt upon it as proof positive of a link between terrorism and Iraq, but the Foreign Secretary has not even mentioned it today. The British Government seem to be much more circumspect in making this link. Does the right hon. Gentleman believe that there is a substantive link between al-Qaeda and Iraq, or is this an area in which there is some difference between our appreciation of the evidence and that of the United States?

Mr. Straw: The Prime Minister and I have both said on a number of occasions that we have seen no evidence that links al-Qaeda with the Iraqi regime in respect of the events that happened before and on 11 September. I have also added that I would not be surprised if such evidence came forward, but I have seen none. As for other links—again, this has been made clear by the Prime Minister and me—there is some evidence of links between the al-Qaeda organisation and Iraq, in terms of the Iraqi regime allowing a permissive environment for the operation of al-Qaeda operatives, and there is overwhelming evidence of Iraq's active support for terrorist organisations operating in Israel and the occupied territories.

Mr. Stephen McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green): Like every other sane person, I would prefer to have peace, but the prospect of peace at any price frightens me because it probably means war postponed. Is it not the sad truth that the time has come when we must have overwhelming evidence of Saddam Hussein's compliance with the UN? If not, is not the blunt choice that we can either have a controlled, planned and deliberate use of force to disarm him or await the postponed war that will surely come? Such a war would come at the time, and in the place and circumstances, of Saddam Hussein's choosing.

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend speaks very wisely on this issue. We will gain nothing by procrastination. Deferring decisions and refusing to face up to the clear evidence will not make this easier to deal with, but very much harder.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire): Earlier this afternoon, in the other statement, the Home Secretary took issue with my hon. Friends who raised the issue of what has been described as the "dodgy document", and said that it had nothing to do with the threats to Heathrow and elsewhere. Last week, the Prime Minister told us—the Foreign Secretary reiterated this a few minutes ago—that there were clear links between the Iraqi regime and international terrorism. Yesterday, the Prime Minister referred only to the compassionate reasons for dealing with the Iraqi regime, namely to release the Iraqi people from the situation that they are in. Today, the Foreign Secretary's statement has, quite rightly, concentrated on resolution 1441 and the resolutions that have gone before it. Given all this, is it surprising that the British people are becoming more and more confused by the different messages coming from the Government, and that they do not fully understand the reasons for our being on the verge of entering into a military conflict? It is not that people are wholly opposed to it; they simply do not understand, because they are confused by the messages coming from the Government.

Mr. Straw: I do not accept that. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman acknowledged that the focus of my statement today has been on resolution 1441, because that will be the focus if any action becomes necessary. We cannot, however, exclude other terrible aspects of the Iraqi regime, including its lamentable humanitarian record and the fact that it has supported and continues to support terrorism, in the circumstances that I have already described.

Mr. Robert Marshall-Andrews (Medway): May I ask my right hon. Friend for a clear statement of principle and intent? If the weapons inspectors report that Iraq is reasonably and fully complying and co-operating with them, and if, as a result of that compliance, matter is found that indicates that the original declaration was misleading, false or—to use the topical term—dodgy, would that be regarded as legitimising war?

Mr. Straw: I will send my hon. and learned Friend a copy of resolution 1441. The test for a further material breach is clearly laid out in operational paragraph 4, and we are subscribing to that.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): The Foreign Secretary has put before the House today a well argued and well presented assessment for action, but he will realise that many members of the public are still sceptical. Many of them would have liked some real proof from the weapons inspectors. To that end, why was the latest intelligence information presented by Colin Powell to the Security Council—namely, a point at which the mobile germ warfare units replenished their stocks of materials—not made available to the weapons inspectors, so that, as Colin Powell was presenting it to the United Nations, Hans Blix and his inspectors could have found it and linked the assessment to reality?

Mr. Straw: Of course I understand the anxieties of members of the public. I have constituents, as does every other hon. Member, and I make myself fully available to them. I did so last Saturday, when I had a very good and thorough debate in an open-air meeting on Iraq that I organised in the centre of Blackburn. That consultation with my constituents will continue.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk): And with your son.

Mr. Straw: That is the essence of democracy, and I fully subscribe to it.

Of course there is no unanimity here, but the public want to hear the arguments in favour of the very difficult decisions that are before the Government and that will, perhaps, be before the House in due course. When they hear the arguments, they are convinced of the need for dealing with the issue in the way in which my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) has just spelled out. On the other point that the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) raised, there has been very active co-operation between the intelligence agencies in the United States and the United Kingdom, and the weapons inspectors. I shall not go into detail about that, but there is always a difficult judgment to make about whether any intelligence should be given publicity, because its source could be extinguished immediately. We also had to be very careful, in the initial stages, about the degree of intelligence sharing, to ensure that it was done on a secure basis. It has been there, however, and it continues. I do not believe that either of the chief weapons inspectors has any complaint about the level or degree of intelligence sharing with them.

Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South): I am genuinely saddened at the answer—or non-answer—given to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Medway (Mr. Marshall-Andrews), because it will only serve to reinforce the public presumption that the Government are seeking a pretext for a war on Iraq, rather than the avoidance of one. I want to ask the Secretary of State a specific question about chemical and biological weapons. On 5 February, in testimony before the House Armed Services Committee, Secretary Rumsfeld made it clear that America has plans to use what he referred to as "non-lethal" biochemical weapons on Iraqi society. Will the Secretary of State confirm what was admitted in that testimony, and that such weapons are illegal under the chemical and biological weapons conventions? Will he also confirm that the current UK policy is for UK troops not to be involved in any operations involving the use of such weapons? If that is not the case, will he explain why it would be acceptable for such weapons of mass destruction to be used on Iraqi society, if it is unacceptable for them to by used by Iraqi society?

Mr. Straw: I think that my hon. Friend is talking about CS spray, which our own police use.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport): In the Foreign Secretary's statement, we heard the line:

"The central premise of Iraq's so-called disclosure—that Iraq possesses no weapons of mass destruction—was . . . a lie."

Does the Foreign Secretary either know or believe that Saddam Hussein has a working nuclear device?

Mr. Straw: We have not received any evidence to that effect, but we know that he did have working nuclear devices and that he was within three years of being able to launch real nuclear weapons. We also know that the inspectors found—contrary to the disclosure—3,000 pages of documents relating to Iraq's nuclear programme, which were not in the offices of the Iraqi Ministry of Defence but in a private house.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North): Does my right hon. Friend accept that the majority of British people have not been convinced by the Government's case, not because they have lost their nerve or do not take seriously the nature of the Iraqi regime or the problem of proliferation, but because they have not been convinced by the logic that a massive military attack will solve the problem. They see the United States' approach to North Korea and the inclusion of Iran—which is currently our ally—in the axis of evil, and they ask questions about double standards. The Government, rather than continuously reiterate the threat from Iraq, should explain to the British people how a massive bombing attack would reduce the risk of terrorism in future. People see—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Foreign Secretary will be able to answer that question.

Mr. Straw: As a matter of fact, I do not accept my hon. Friend's assertion that the British public do not acknowledge the threat posed by Saddam Hussein. Indeed, in the past few months public understanding of the nature of the threat has greatly increased. I accept that public opinion is divided about whether we should back active diplomacy with a credible threat of force and be ready to follow that through. I understand that and I share the anxieties that people have about military action, because it should only ever be a last resort. We must show, as I hope we have, that we are being very patient and following through our obligations under international law by the United Nations route. However, as we know from world history, on occasions it is essential to enforce law by force; otherwise the world becomes extremely dangerous.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): How realistic is it to maintain that Saddam Hussein can be permanently disarmed of his weapons of mass destruction without the removal of his regime?

Mr. Straw: We are following through resolution 1441, which lays out a peaceful pathway for Saddam's regime. I have dealt with the fact that, whether we like it or not, it would still remain in place under the resolution, albeit in very different circumstances. Of course, if that happened, we would need to maintain a continuous presence, with some kind of inspection to ensure continued compliance. However, the fact that we would be willing to accept that is further evidence that we are straining every sinew to find a peaceful solution to the crisis.

Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate): Is it British Government policy not to engage in a pre-emptive strike on Iraq without a second UN resolution to that effect? Would it still remain British Government policy to engage in a pre-emptive strike against Iraq if one or—as seems likely—more than one of the five members of the Security Council veto a second resolution?

Mr. Straw: I have spelled out to my hon. Friend and to the House our great preference for a second resolution, if one proves necessary. However, there has never been the least dubiety that we must reserve our position in the event that a second resolution is not possible. I understand my hon. Friend's anxieties about so-called pre-emption, but the United Nations charter, in article 50 and several other articles in chapter 7, clearly anticipates the use of what is described as "preventative force" to enforce the will of the United Nations.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch): Does the Foreign Secretary accept that one of the reasons why the public are sceptical about the issue is the inherent ambiguity in resolution 1441? The Foreign Secretary today said that the words "serious consequences" could only mean disarmament by force. If that is the only interpretation of that expression, why were the words "disarmament by force" not included in the resolution originally?

Mr. Straw: That would have been better, in a way, but in diplomatic speak the choice was between "all necessary means" and "serious consequences". Everybody in the diplomatic community knows that "serious consequences" means the use of force. If the hon. Gentleman is saying that it would be better if diplomatic speak was more explicit, I agree, but those words mean force.

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North): Many hundreds of my constituents are Iraqi citizens. Can the Foreign Secretary tell the House what consideration the Government have given to the status of those constituents if hostilities break out? He will appreciate that they know better than anyone of the need to disarm Saddam Hussein, because they fled from his regime. It would be a travesty if their lives were disrupted further by this country's engagement in a war against Saddam Hussein.

Mr. Straw: I applaud the courage of many of my hon. Friend's constituents who are Iraqi exiles. Their families may still be at grave risk within the territory of Iraq. This country has a proud humanitarian record and we shall continue to uphold that record in the event of military action against Iraq.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Government have been famous for consulting focus groups? A very big focus group will meet on Saturday in London. It is high time the Government concentrated on listening to those voices from rural and urban Britain instead of paying too much attention to that highly motivated clique in Washington.

Mr. Straw: As my hon. Friend knows, I am very much a member of old Labour—[Interruption.] I have never consulted a focus group in my life, except the open-air meetings that I hold regularly in the middle of my constituency. I shall continue to do so. We recognise the strength of feeling about the issue and we are listening, but the faith that we have placed in the United Nations system can be sustained only if we do not make the mistakes that the country made before the second world war, when we failed to back that fine diplomatic institution, the League of Nations, with proper means to enforce its will.

Personal Statement

2.47 pm

Mr. Michael Trend (Windsor): I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me this opportunity to make this early response to the report of the Standards and Privileges Committee, which was published this morning, especially in the light of the imminent parliamentary recess and my wish to make my position clear.

I accept unreservedly the Committee's report, which finds me muddled and naive in my negligent understanding of the additional costs allowance. I apologise again unreservedly to you, Mr. Speaker, to the House and to my constituents. I am so very sorry.

Education for 14 to 19-year-olds

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Caplin.]

2.49 pm

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. David Miliband): This is an important, timely and, I hope, useful debate. I look forward to contributions from both sides of the House, because education and training for 14 to 19-year-olds needs consensus and common cause, as well as sharp exchanges. The Government recently published their views in response to the consultation on last year's Green Paper, "14-19: Extending Opportunities, Raising Standards", which was debated in the House on 21 March 2002. I am pleased to see that my right hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Ann Taylor) is here. She made an important speech in that debate, and I look forward to contributions from the Front-Bench teams of the two Opposition parties, the composition of which has remained the same since that debate. They will be pleased to know that my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, South (Mr. Lewis) will wind up the debate; I am sure that he will bring his customary élan to that task.

There were 4,000 responses to the Green Paper that was published a year ago, including some from hon. Members. As a result, we have refined some proposals, dropped others, and introduced new ideas to the package. I am grateful to all who have helped fashion the proposals that were published on 21 January. I believe that they represent the foundation of a new and positive approach to 14-to-19 education and training that should command widespread support.

I am encouraged by reactions from the education community, and I thought it noteworthy that Dr. John Dunford, general secretary of the Secondary Heads Association, should say that "we can look forward to reforms that will be much stronger than those set out in the Green Paper 12 months ago."

That is the purpose of consultation, and I am grateful for the positive and serious submissions that were made.

Today, I want to advance four propositions: first, that our system has strengths, but also the structural weaknesses of a low-status vocational offer and a narrow academic track; secondly, that greater flexibility at 14-plus is necessary over the next few years to promote sustained engagement by those dissatisfied with the current offer at GCSE; thirdly, that in the longer term, structural reform of the curriculum, and of assessment and qualifications, should seek to build a ladder of opportunity for young people, preserving standards and enhancing achievement; and fourthly, that for the immediate future, the Government are making the right choices to ensure safe delivery of this year's A level and AS level exams.

There is much to celebrate in our education system. To celebrate our successes is not a very British thing to do, but I think that we should. Ofsted says that we have the best generation of teachers ever. There have never been so many lessons judged "good" or "excellent". Test and examination results have never been higher. I remind the House that the Government have put their money where their mouth is with the most sustained increases in funding for a century, including in further education. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) shouts something about colleges, and in doing so he tempts me to repeat the figures. There will be £1,000 extra for the average school pupil by 2005–06, and an extra £1.2 billion for further education over the same period.

English qualifications are highly valued by higher education and by employers. Advanced level provides intellectual rigour and demanding standards. It is a robust platform for a three-year English university degree course. A levels and AS levels are—to coin a phrase—certainly well worth the paper that they are written on. Vocational qualifications such BTEC, RSA and City and Guilds provide high quality occupational skills and knowledge that are valued by employers.

These strengths should not however disguise the weaknesses that remain. Only half our 16-year-olds achieve five good GCSEs at age 16, and less than half of boys do so. Some 5 per cent. of young people leave school without any GCSEs at all. Participation levels at 17 put us ahead only of Greece, Mexico and Turkey in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development league table of participation rates. One in four of 16-to-18-year-olds had dropped out of education and training at the end of 2000—a rate that is significantly above the OECD and EU averages. Moreover, a young person from a professional background is more than five times as likely to qualify for higher education as one from an unskilled background. So now is the right time to turn our attention to the 14 to 19 phase of education. We have world-class performance in primary schools, key stage 3 reforms are focused on high achievement at age 14, every secondary school is to become a specialist school, and every teacher is to be backed up by high quality support. However, for a high-aspiration, high-achievement system we need reform at 14-plus.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton): Will the Minister take this opportunity to deny the story in today's edition of The Times by confirming that his proposal for federations of secondary schools will not involve a reduction in parental choice, or a reduction in the exam result information on individual schools that is available to parents?

Mr. Miliband: I am happy to confirm that, but I am tempted to say to the hon. Gentleman not only that he should not believe everything that he reads in the newspapers, but that he should not believe everything that members of his Front Bench tell the newspapers. The proposal for federations of schools is designed to promote collaboration among teachers at local level, which will help to drive school improvement. We want to increase the richness of, and the amount of, data that are provided on school performance. I do not regard the proposal as a threat to either of those things.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): Will the Minister therefore confirm that a federation of schools will not be a single admissions authority?

Mr. Miliband: I am happy to confirm that although we are considering joint governing bodies for federations of schools, we have not proposed that they be single admissions authorities.

I was going to give a short historical discursus on how, for a very long time, politicians have stood at this Dispatch Box and told the House that vocational education is the priority, and that now is the time to sort it out, but given the direction that our debate has taken, I will not go into that.

I shall explain the short-term reforms that we consider necessary, and which were set out in our response to the Green Paper on 21 January. We remain committed to the principle that all young people should experience a broad and balanced education, but we also want to create more flexibility at 14 to 19, so that every young person can choose engaging programmes of study that suit their ability and interest. We need to create this greater flexibility both through releasing time in the curriculum to allow more choice, and through increasing the number and range of subjects that young people can study. To free up time, we are reducing the statutory requirements at key stage 4, so that the compulsory curriculum is reduced to English, maths, science and information and communication technology. Having noted that my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) is here, I should also point out that we are seeking to make courses, notably in science, more engaging. Perhaps he will contribute to that subject in due course. It is important to point out that, although we will no longer require every pupil to study modern foreign languages, every school will have to offer them the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Gibb: Is it not odd to remove the compulsion to study a second language and at the same time to propose, as the White Paper does, an international baccalaureate? The French and German baccalaureates both include a compulsory second language.

Mr. Miliband: The hon. Gentleman anticipates a matter that I shall cover later on. We are not proposing to import the international baccalaureate; however, it would be foolish not to look at foreign systems, including the international baccalaureate, and to see what we can learn from them.

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead): The Green Paper states that "the international baccalaureate was not designed to meet the needs of a high proportion of young people".

Those who have the ability to profit from a foreign language can therefore do so within that scheme; however, it does not constitute a universal requirement.

Mr. Miliband: That is a helpful point. The international baccalaureate has attractive aspects in terms of its structure and assessment mechanisms, and we want to learn from that. However, wholesale importation is not what we are seeking.

I said earlier that the second leg of our drive to increase flexibility was to make more subjects available. To that end, we have already introduced eight GCSEs in vocational subjects such as engineering and applied science. Early take-up is encouraging across the board, and some two thirds of the young people who are involved in our increased flexibility programme are taking these new GCSEs. We intend to press forward with more new GCSEs in vocational subjects to promote local choice, not a national blueprint.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell): I of course applaud the broadening of the available GCSE options, but the Minister will realise that the two subjects that he picks—engineering and applied science—are those that one would expect to be taken by people who are going on to university, or to similar training courses later in life. In fact, the real need vocationally is on the part of those who leave school at 16, and who do not have professional trades to enter. Should not that gap be addressed?

Mr. Miliband: We are trying to address that gap as well. Of course, not everyone who leaves school at 16 wants to remain in education; they may prefer to go on to modern apprenticeships, which I shall discuss later. Such schemes have encouraging take-up rates, but we have concerns about the quality and we want to improve it. The hon. Gentleman's point is that we need a range of options to suit different aptitudes and interests, and that is what we are seeking to provide.

In emphasising choice, it is important that we recognise that a national uniform system will not be the answer: the solution in South Shields will look different from that in Swindon or in Southampton because the nature of our local institutions and labour markets differ. The Government's view is that we should build on local strengths—whether they exist in schools, sixth forms, sixth-form colleges, further education colleges, or local employment—to create a system that gives equal worth to all young people, provides high standards for all, and promotes high quality provision wherever young people study.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): The Minister has suggested, rather interestingly, that there will be local provision for local conditions. Does he accept that, if his target is to be met and half this country's young people go to university, many of them will not go to their local university? Is not there a danger of mismatch, in that what is on offer in the Minister's constituency of South Shields, for example, might not be deemed appropriate or suitable to allow a young person to be admitted to a university in another part of the country?

Mr. Miliband: Inadvertently, I may have misled the hon. Gentleman, as I was referring more to where courses might be delivered than to the curriculum that might be on offer. I am grateful to him for giving me the chance to clarify that important point.

I hope that there will be unanimity among hon. Members that policy development needs to be better informed by the experiences and needs of employers. I applaud those companies that are making a success of modern apprenticeships. The most recent figures show that, in July 2002, the programme was supporting the learning of about 220,000 young people in England. We want to promote the programme and raise its quality.

Vernon Coaker (Gedling): I think that my hon. Friend is to be applauded for his radical approach to the problems that he describes. Only radical solutions will enable us to tackle some of the failures in the system. My hon. Friend mentioned consulting business about the changes, but would not it also be a good thing to consult the young people who are experiencing the system, or who have experienced it, and ask them about the reforms that they would introduce to improve matters?

Mr. Miliband: I am sorry that my hon. Friend is less able to consult young people than he was in his previous role, when he was in a permanent focus group with them, but his point is well made. It is important to involve young people. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, South made an enormous effort to ensure that young people were consulted about the Green Paper proposals. It was a model of how Government should be open to young people's views. No doubt my hon. Friend will speak later in the debate, but I think that he would say that young people made a genuine contribution to shaping the proposals. That is a positive thing.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough): He is a good man.

Mr. Miliband: The Liberal Democrat spokesman gives my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary a significant commendation. He will be pleased to hear that, but I am sure that he will not be putting it on his election literature.

I can also confirm that the Government are committed to the programme of enterprise learning suggested by Howard Davies, which involves sustained engagement by young people with enterprise and entrepreneurship.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): The Minister's proper concern about the quality of modern apprenticeships should not be to the exclusion or detriment of their scope. In July last year, the Government understandably set a public service agreement target that, by 2004, 28 per cent. of young people would, by the age of 22, be starting a modern apprenticeship. Is it not a concern that there has been a fall of 36,000, or 20 per cent., in the number of young people on such apprenticeships?

Mr. Miliband: I shall ask my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary to reply to the specific statistics cited by the hon. Gentleman, as I do not recognise them from the briefings that I have had.

Mr. Bercow: They are the Department's statistics.

Mr. Miliband: I am sure that they are accurate, and I would never suggest that the hon. Gentleman would use anything other than correct statistics. I am sure that I am not given only the good news in my briefing. To answer the hon. Gentleman's substantive point, of course we must try and push on with quantity as well as equality. The lessons of the current programme must inform the expansion. We must make sure that it is driven by the learning needs of young people.

The Government look forward to the national roll-out of educational maintenance allowances, for which my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, East and Mexborough (Jeff Ennis), in his role as a member of the Select Committee on Education and Skills, has long campaigned. We also look forward to the further development of the Connexions service, which will combine to provide the essential infrastructure of advice and financial support.

These short-term reforms need to be implemented with due vigour, but also with care. Longer-term reforms require proper debate and careful planning. Our aim in the long term is a system that upholds rigour and standards so that those achieving recognition for what they have learned can be clear about its value. However, the system should also promote participation and progression so that it helps fulfil the potential of every young person. That is not a pipe dream. France, the US, Finland and Japan have such a system, and the Scots have a better system than ours. I believe that we can have as good a system as those countries have.

First, all young people must have access to coherent learning programmes. Whatever their chosen paths and aspirations, they should be able to combine sound acquisition of generic skills and knowledge with specialist learning tailored to their own needs and interests. We particularly need to tackle the longstanding weaknesses in vocational programmes. Too many courses and qualifications lack status, clarity and currency in the outside world. We need to strengthen the coherence of vocational programmes in further education, and their partnerships with schools, so that they have a much stronger sense of coherence and progression, and so that they provide a firmer springboard for progress into employment and into further and higher education.

We need also to address the narrowness of some of the programmes followed by our most able young people. Despite the Curriculum 2000 reforms, too many students still follow an over-narrow A-level programme. I have said before that I am struck by the wide-ranging demands of the international baccalaureate—for example, by the 4,000 word essay that is an important part of the assessment—and we need to consider that carefully.

Secondly, we must look at the existing range of assessment arrangements for young people. We must be sure that young people are assessed in ways that match the style and purpose of learning. We need to recognise that all the examinations and assessments that young people undergo should add value to their learning, by helping them to assess their progress, by motivating them and by recognising their achievement. However, we must also recognise the impact on young people and their teachers of the frequency and volume of examinations and assessments.

Ensuring that means looking again at the balance between internal and external assessment, and between one-off examinations and continuous or what the jargon calls portfolio approaches. We must also consider the role of formative assessment, which helps young people to understand their strengths, progress and development needs.

Helen Jones (Warrington, North): Does my hon. Friend agree that we must also look carefully at the number of GCSEs that some of our children take at 16? It is right for them to take a good balance of subjects, but the increasing tendency of schools to present themselves according to the number of children taking as many as 12 or 13 GCSEs has its dangers. That can work against a broader education.

Mr. Miliband: My hon. Friend speaks with some authority on these matters, Later, I shall make the case that we should not fall for the old English fallacy that more means worse. In this context, she raises an important point. We want to stretch young people. It is not right that the only way to do that is to do more and more GCSEs.

Chris Grayling: I am listening carefully to the Minister. There is broad agreement that the problem has to do with young people aged 14 to 16 who are not pursuing academic subjects. I am worried that tinkering further with the examination system for those aged 16 to 18, which has not been working badly, is the wrong priority for the Government and for schools.

Mr. Miliband: I shall make it clear later that it is vital that we offer stability and confidence to young people doing A-levels or GCSEs, or who are starting to think about their GCSEs. No Government should ever go in for tinkering for its own sake. However, there is a case for introducing stretch and breadth into the learning programmes of even the most academically able young people. We must try to ensure that the system stretches them to go as far as their talent can take them.

The third aspect, after curriculum and assessment, has to do with qualifications. We must have a long-term qualifications framework that motivates young people to stay in learning, with clear progression routes, whatever their strengths and aspirations. It must be meaningful and credible to higher education, employers and others who use qualifications to make judgements on individuals.

The benefits of a clear ladder of progression to a common qualification or group of qualifications at around 18 or 19 are obvious. Responses to our consultation last year told us that, although most people supported the aims of the matriculation diploma, it risked adding unnecessary complication to the existing system without being radical enough to achieve the degree of change that we should be aiming for.

That is why groups such as the National Association of Headteachers, the Headmasters Conference and the Association of Colleges are increasingly attracted to, and arguing for, what they call an English baccalaureate. Baccalaureate-style qualifications work well in many other countries. They stretch learners, and value a range of achievements. Designed for English circumstances, built on clear commitment to higher standards, such a model could work here.

It would not however be right for the Government to impose those reforms; but I am gratified by the degree of consensus that exists among schools, higher education, colleges and employers. Now is the time to test and refine that emerging consensus. That is why we have appointed the working group on 14 to 19 education and training, chaired by Mike Tomlinson. We have asked the group to consider, over the next year to 18 months, how to effect longer-term change of 14 to 19 learning, covering curriculum, assessment and qualifications.

Mr. Willis: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the qualification system itself is one of the things that has bedevilled our education system? Our qualification system starts from the top and moves downwards because it is geared primarily to enabling universities to select students in the easiest possible way. Unless we tailor examinations to meet curriculum objectives, we shall simply fall into another trap. How does the Minister square that with what he says about an English baccalaureate? We should simply be creating an examination structure for particular students with the particular objectives of higher education, trade or other vocational avenues.

Mr. Miliband: I respect the hon. Gentleman's views on this as on many other subjects. However, my comments about recognising all achievements in a unified qualifications system cover his point. We should certainly not disparage the need of universities to recognise high achievement; it is important that the qualifications system play that role, but that should not be its only role. Rather than the system being a series of hurdles that weed people out of education and training, I want it genuinely to be a ladder of opportunity that allows them to proceed.

Ann Taylor (Dewsbury): I am interested in what my hon. Friend is saying, but the point that was just put to him is a valid one. Are not many universities moving away from demanding specific grades and adopting a points system? They are asking students to obtain a certain number of points in their A-levels. Does that not show a willingness to consider a wider approach? A credit accumulation system might suit everybody's needs.

Mr. Miliband: My right hon. Friend, too, speaks with much authority on this subject. Universities use a range of techniques and the Government are giving some support for research into the possibility of a credit accumulation system of the sort that she describes.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Miliband: Yes, but this will be the last intervention that I shall take; I do not want to overstay my welcome.

Mr. Chaytor: Is not the beauty of the English baccalaureate concept that it would enable us finally to erode the distinction between the academic and the vocational, if it was based on a credit accumulation and transfer system? Could we not look more closely at the operation of the baccalaureate in France, where rigid divisions between the academic and vocational no longer exist?

Mr. Miliband: I hope that my hon. Friend has the chance to describe the beauty of the new system in a contribution later on. His overall point is well made. I have never understood why in this country we think that vocational qualifications are second class, given that law, medicine or music are all vocations. It is time that we moved beyond that outdated distinction; it is not healthy for the country. Different qualifications should not have a different status. I should like us to move towards general and specialist study, as that would cross the academic and vocational divide.

It would be wrong of me to close my speech without reporting to the House on the reforms being introduced to ensure the safe delivery of examinations this summer. While reform is being considered, stability is essential. For this year's A and AS-level students, for those taking GCSEs and for those who are considering their GCSEs, reform must be long term; it must not destabilise the learning opportunities of young people.

The issues raised by head teachers' representatives and some examiners, in September 2002, about the grading of last year's A and AS-level examinations led to widespread concern about the stability of the A-level system. I repeat my deep regret for the distress that was caused, above all, to young people, but I am pleased by the vigour and efficiency with which the new team at the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority—the chief executive, Ken Boston and the chairman, Sir Anthony Greener—are seeking to implement the widely welcomed recommendations of the Tomlinson reviews. They are also following up all outstanding complaints about grading or marking last year.

In consultation with teacher associations, head teacher associations and examination boards, the QCA has now produced simple and clear descriptions for AS and A-Level standards. Furthermore, as recommended by Mr. Tomlinson, the code of practice has been amended significantly. The memorandum of understanding that was recommended is under discussion between the Department and the QCA and will be published in the not too distant future. I can confirm that the QCA is establishing an independent group of experts to report on the maintenance of standards in selected groups of subjects from year to year.

On 3 December, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that we would make available up to an additional £6 million to secure delivery of the 2003 exams. The money will be spent on ensuring that the 2003 examinations are delivered accurately and effectively, with particular attention paid to ensuring that there are sufficient examiners. The examinations taskforce, chaired by the QCA with representatives from the awarding bodies and the teaching profession, will oversee delivery of the examinations.

The Government do not mark exams, but hon. Members should be in no doubt that we in Government are determined to take whatever action is necessary or recommended to improve arrangements for testing and marking so as to ensure the smooth running of public examinations this year and beyond.

Mr. Willis: During the row about A and AS-levels, a major criticism related to the independence of the QCA from the Government. The Minister referred to the memorandum of understanding which was outlined in the quinquennial review, but many of us are still gravely concerned that the Government are too close to the QCA and that unless the authority becomes wholly independent we shall not get back the confidence that the system so clearly deserves. Will the Minister think again about that—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. The hon. Gentleman's intervention must come to a close.

Mr. Miliband: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. I think I got the drift of the intervention.

The independence of the QCA is absolutely vital in the setting and marking of examinations and in the relationships with awarding bodies. I agree with the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) 100 per cent. about that. However, the QCA plays other roles; it is the Government's curriculum adviser, too. Simply to call for the wholesale independence of the QCA does not give due deference to its two roles. When the hon. Gentleman sees the memorandum of understanding, I hope that he will feel that we are doing sufficient justice to the independence required in assessment while recognising the shared interest in curriculum development.

The changes that we are proposing in the 14 to 19 phase are about offering young people greater flexibility to pursue programmes that excite and motivate them. But let us be in no doubt that, to achieve that, we need cultural as well as structural change. We are really talking about greater opportunity and choice, and we have to break the important cultural taboo on the relationship between academic and vocational study that I mentioned earlier and which was also raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor).

There is a second cultural challenge. As I have said on several occasions, we need to banish the English curse that more means worse—that more choice will mean lower standards and that more achievement means diluted assessment and diluted achievement. Standards are rising, because teaching is getting better and students are working harder. I for one am happy to celebrate that, but I will not rest until we have a system that matches the potential of young people with the opportunities that they deserve. That will take time and it will take ideas, but we are ready for that. I look forward to the views of the House.

3.18 pm

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): The debate is welcome, even though, sadly, it has been overshadowed and somewhat curtailed by other events.

We are discussing a crucial phase of young people's education: the possible remodelling of the whole secondary school curriculum, the future of public examinations and much more. It is regrettable that we have only three hours in which to do justice to so much. I hope that we shall have further opportunities in the not too distant future to return to this important subject.

Much in the Green Paper is welcome. We welcome the honest assessment of some of the problems that need to be tackled, some of which the Minister has mentioned today. Nearly half our young people do not achieve five good GSCEs and 61 per cent. do not achieve a good GCSE grade in English, maths and science. Five per cent. of our youngsters emerge from the system with no GCSEs at all. As the Minister knows, that problem is much worse in many of our cities; the figure rises to more than 10 per cent. in Hull, Bristol, Nottingham, Newcastle and Manchester. He and I agree that that situation is not acceptable and that we must work to overcome it.

We very much welcome the attempt to improve vocational education, to regain the interest of those who are disaffected and to improve the skills of our young people. But as the Minister will expect, we also have some concerns and significant differences with the Government over how to approach these matters.

There is a real problem with vocational technical education in this country. It has been a preoccupation of those who make policy for 150 years. The Minister resisted the temptation to give a historical discourse, and I shall resist it as well, but it has long been recognised that we have fallen short in this area. The repeated attempts that Governments have made to tackle it have never been truly successful.

The Learning and Skills Council reported in "Skills in England 2002" a position that is worsening by some measures, stating that nearly a quarter of companies say that there is a skills gap, a measure that was up 7 per cent. on the figure for the year before.

As Ruth Lea, of the Institute of Directors, has written:

"put quite simply, when it comes to overall educational standards and workplace skills the UK is not world class and this damages productivity and economic performance."

She went on:

"We suggested a bipartite system in the UK, comprising an academic pathway (which should be made more rigorous) and a properly developed vocational pathway. (And, no, we do not mean an extension of 'vocational' GCSEs and 'vocational' A-levels that are still quasi-academic)."

This is a route that we hope to explore further. Why cannot England have the kind of excellent specialist technical schools that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition and my hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) saw in Holland on Monday?

We are worried that the Government may be setting the wrong tone in the way in which they pursue an objective that we share. If they share our objective of strengthening the vocational offer, as the Minister puts it, and achieving higher esteem for technical education, then by setting a costly and unnecessary target of 50 per cent. participation in higher education they are piling financial pressure on to universities and students, when they should be giving more weight to the vital role of the further education sector in bridging a growing skills gap.

Ms Meg Munn (Sheffield, Heeley): If the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that we should maintain participation at 43 per cent. rather than seek to increase it to at least 50 per cent., is he also suggesting that children and young people from disadvantaged backgrounds who are not currently going to university can never hope to get there? Or which young people who go currently is he suggesting will not go in future?

Mr. Brady: Absolutely not. What I am suggesting is that entry to university should be based entirely on merit, and that our objective on getting people from less advantaged background into universities should be based not on messing about with qualifications and the routes they take to get there, or by social engineering in the admissions process of universities, but on improving the performances of schools and ensuring that children come out of schools with the qualifications they need to get into university.

I am strongly opposed to an arbitrary target of 50 per cent., which has no educational or other justification. It has been plucked out of the air. It is causing problems and has no real purpose. We should not set an arbitrary objective for the number of young people going into university. We should allow it to find its own level. The emphasis the Government are giving by stressing the more academic university route runs the danger of pulling attention away from the area where there are real problems in our education sector, the vocational and technical area and the role that the further education sector could perform, which should be expanded.

Chris Grayling: Does my hon. Friend agree that in setting the 50 per cent. target the Government completely failed to explain the connection between that target and the labour market, leaving open the real fear that they are creating university places without knowing what the training will be and what the end product will be in terms of employment?

Mr. Brady: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I would not want to be pulled too far into a debate on higher education. But there is a danger that pursuing the target for the target's sake will result in an expansion in the number of places, a continuing expansion in the number of young people emerging with ever-increasing levels of debt, and, as my hon. Friend suggests, a disconnection between the needs of the labour market and the qualifications with which young people are emerging. That may mean that those young people do not receive the benefits that Ministers constantly say young people gain from a graduate qualification, because they will not be emerging into highly paid professions. Some will face long periods of unemployment.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Ivan Lewis): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that modern apprenticeships can lead into higher education, that foundation degrees can lead into higher education, and that the one way in which we undermine the possibility of changing our culture in regard to vocational education is to suggest that we have a sheep and goats approach to our education system? That is why vocational education and training have failed historically.

Mr. Brady: I could not agree more. The Minister is absolutely right: those routes should be ways into higher education and to university. The danger is that if instead all that the Government do is to fix a 50 per cent. target, the target will be to increase the number of places, not to find more people coming in through those routes or through the more traditional A-level routes. That is a mistake.

Mr. Chaytor rose—

Mr. Brady: I shall give way once more, before I make progress.

Mr. Chaytor: Would not the hon. Gentleman accept, in respect of his point about raising standards in schools, that if the current trends in performance at both GCSE and A-level continue, the 50 per cent. target will automatically be met over the next seven years?

Mr. Brady: I do not accept that. I shall come to some comments on qualifications. As the hon. Gentleman knows, there are very real concerns about the rigour of qualifications. I welcome some of the remarks that the Minister made in opening, because those concerns need to be addressed. We cannot automatically assume that the improvement in exam performance is always a sure indicator of an improvement in standards. As the hon. Gentleman takes a great interest in education, he will know, as I do, that there are universities that are now, for instance, giving remedial coaching in mathematics to students who have A-grades in maths A-level.

Mr. Willis: Name one.

Mr. Brady: I could name one, and it is not that far from the hon. Gentleman's constituency. I shall not do so, but I had that conversation with a professor of computing at a particular university only a few days ago. Hon. Members who take an interest in education know that there are real concerns and that universities and employers are encountering difficulties sometimes with apparently well-qualified students, where the substance of their qualifications does not seem to meet the apparent qualification level. So I do not accept the point that the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) made.

In suggesting that everybody should aim for university, which is not really the right route for everybody, in pursuit of egalitarianism the Government risk falling into the trap of giving a message that is elitist and is focused on the academic.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) rose—

Mr. Brady: I shall not give way. I want to make progress.

If we want to increase opportunity, the Government say, ever more people should go to university. If we want to raise the esteem of vocational qualifications, they say, we should call those qualifications "GCSE" or "A-level". That is not the right route for vocational qualifications. It risks a further loss of rigour in our academic qualifications.

Helen Jones rose—

Mr. Brady: The hon. Lady, whom I know well and respect, knows that I have given way a good deal. I am happy to give way when more time is available.

I welcome the fact that the Minister indicated that a baccalaureate-type qualification falls very firmly into the category of longer-term possible reforms set out in the Government's response, because it is essential that we now focus on restoring the rigour and reliability of our A-levels. The discussion of replacing the whole examination will do nothing to tell people sitting A-levels in the next few years that the exams are fair and credible. A baccalaureate may bring more breadth to the curriculum, but if breadth is at the expense of depth, it is the last thing that we want. We saw a loss of rigour in exams when we moved from O-level and CSEs to GCSE and to modular A and AS-levels. We must not allow that to happen again in moving to baccalaureates from A-levels.

One of our strongest concerns about the impact of Curriculum 2000 and A-levels is that, in all too many cases, the pressure of time put on students at that point in their education removed the opportunity for those in the lower sixth year to engage in other activities, such as sport, drama and music. That is one of the reasons why we have argued for scrapping the AS-level, which was, in any event, introduced so incompetently. AS-levels have not only caused a reduction in the breadth of the educational experience—the Minister raises his eyebrows, but I stress that that experience goes much wider merely than the academic courses of study on offer—but have put in place a round of public examinations in the lower sixth year.

Ms Munn: The hon. Gentleman has obviously not been informed by his Conservative colleagues on the Select Committee on Education and Skills that we could find no witness who would scrap AS-levels.

Mr. Brady: The hon. Lady should try harder. I am sure that, if she were to follow the Under-Secretary's example of talking to young people, she would find many people who deeply regret the experience of the implementation of Curriculum 2000 and the damage that it caused.

Putting in place an extra round of exams in the lower sixth year has led to young people being over-examined, and we also saw the confusion about the proportion of marks accounted for by the AS-level modules—modules were accorded 50 per cent. of the marks when they merited only 40 per cent. of them. That was one of the main factors that led to last summer's A-level fiasco. If, as the Government's response says, our first priority is to ensure the smooth running of A-levels this year and beyond and if the Government are serious about restoring the credibility of A-levels, they should look again at withdrawing AS-levels.

We welcome the idea of some children spending a significant amount of the post-14 education learning in the workplace, but, again, we have some real concerns; we welcome it only if they have a high-quality learning experience. That proposal was first mentioned some time ago by the then Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett). He was then talking about a fairly small percentage of children—the disaffected and disengaged, persistent truants and those who cannot be kept engaged in the traditional educational route—but the proposal has now grown into a major plank of the Government's policies for 14 to 19- year-olds.

That initiative gives rise to some serious worries. First, quality may suffer; kids must not make the tea for the local employer. I know that the Minister does not want that to happen—it is not what we want to happen—but I hope that he will recognise that, in trying to offer such a massive provision of workplace training for children throughout the country, there is a danger that quality may not always be maintained. Secondly, there is a concern that sufficient priority will not be attached to guidance. If children are to be channelled into vocational routes at 14, we must ensure that they are the right ones. As the Guidance Council says,

"the delivery of a universal service by qualified Personal Advisers with career guidance skills needs to be a reality for all young people, not just those at risk of dropping out."

The Minister will be aware that serious concerns are being expressed about the way in which the Connexions service is being implemented; the focus is too much on those who may drop out, although many others need the guidance and support that ought to be made available.

The Guidance Council goes on to pose some questions to the Government:

"How will the quality of"— careers education and guidance—

"provision across all schools, colleges and work-based learning be guaranteed, in the absence of a statutory framework for careers education and guidance? Will it guarantee entitlement to one to one support from a qualified Personal Adviser with career guidance skills for all young people, to enable them to make the best possible choices from the expanded curriculum?"

[Interruption.] I am glad that the Minister seems to have a copy of that briefing note, so I hope that he has prepared some good answers.

How will the Government monitor consistently high quality in the development of individual learning plans at the start of key stage 4, when crucial decisions need to be made? How will the development of initial teacher training and leadership programmes reflect the need for tutors and other staff to play an enhanced role in the career planning and review process? The Government's plans put far greater emphasis on the need for good guidance for young people. If there is more flexibility, there will be a greater diversity of routes from the age of 14. We have to ensure that young people take those choices and make those decisions with the proper guidance and support.

We also welcome the proposed greater flexibility in the curricula, but that, too, gives rise to concerns. One of our most serious worries relates to what the future will hold for language teaching in our schools. We are prepared to accept that the compulsory teaching of a modern foreign language up to 16 is not appropriate for everyone, but we are worried that language teaching beyond 14 will decline under the Government's proposals before adequate provision is in place to fulfil their pledge that all school children at key stage 2 will have the opportunity to study a modern foreign language by 2010. The Minister believes that that will be achieved with the help of an army of language assistants, but he told me in a written answer on 21 January that in our 25,000 schools we have only 29.5 full-time-equivalent language assistants. We wish him well with his pledge, but at present it looks very much like pie in the sky. Even if he meets his target, we will be replacing compulsory languages post-14 with optional languages in junior school. The Government risk leaving the next generation even less able in foreign languages than those generations that have gone before. It also seems odd,

I might add, that citizenship classes will be compulsory, but the study of history, geography and languages will not.

We have one overriding concern—that schools that have coped with a state of constant change and reform over 15 years or more are now to be faced with yet another upheaval: more uncertainty, more curriculum changes and more changes in the exam system. Schools that have worked hard to accommodate the birth of the GCSE, the national curriculum, local management of schools and curriculum 2000—the latter being unfunded and, sadly, bungled—are now to take on a whole new 14 to 19 approach, the funding and direction of which will itself be split between the local education authority, which will, at least for now, pass on funding for 14-to-16 provision, with the Learning and Skills Council funding 16-to-19 provision. I should be interested to hear further comment from the Minister as to whether that will be the long-term picture, or whether he envisages that the role of the learning and skills councils will expand towards the start of the 14-to-19 phase of education.

All this comes at a time when teachers and heads in even the best schools are struggling with ministerial red tape and interference. As the head of an outstanding local school in my constituency told me on Friday,

"I have no problem with accountability but it has now gone far beyond that; the amount of red tape is forcing me to devote all my time to management where I should be concentrating on leadership."

I hope that the Minister will take on board the fact that if these changes are to succeed, it will be because of strong leadership in schools, not micro-management by the Department for Education and Skills.

In conclusion, we welcome the Green Paper and the debate that it invites, but urge the Government to proceed with caution and to look for quality in vocational and academic education. If they proceed with the haste that accompanied the introduction of AS-levels, the education of a generation will suffer.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind all hon. Members that Mr. Speaker has imposed a 10-minute limit on Back-Bench speeches.

3.38 pm

Ann Taylor (Dewsbury): I intend to be brief, and therefore shall not take up all the points that I would wish from the speech by the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady). I must say, however, that I completely reject his contention that there is a lack of rigour in the examination and assessment structure and, by implication, that today's youngsters are not as well qualified as they appear to be. I believe that we have the best qualified youngsters coming up through the education system that we have ever had, and that our responsibility is to try to build on that and to improve it for the future. If I agree with him on one thing, it is his concern about foreign language teaching and the pace of change, which I hope Ministers will keep in mind throughout the next few years.

I agree with the basic analysis presented by my hon. Friend the Minister for School Standards. He is right that structural weaknesses remain in the education system, especially in relation to the low status of vocational education and the narrowness of academic education. That has been a problem for many years, and we must address it. I am glad that we are having a grown-up discussion about what should happen post-14, because it is important to tackle that problem now.

In such a short debate and with such a brief time in which to contribute, I simply want to mention three aspects of post-14 education and use my constituency experience to try to give a flavour of the necessary changes. I welcome the changes to the GCSE—for example, the ability of young people in future to do a GCSE in engineering. It is good to increase the range, although doing that is not problem free.

It is difficult to attract the right teachers for engineering. However, the teachers are there if we can lure them back, and perhaps the greater problem is getting the right facilities. Many further education colleges opted out of subjects such as engineering after their incorporation because of high overheads. If we are to encourage schools to provide a more adventurous range of GCSEs, we must deal with such problems and help them to have the quality facilities as well as the quality teaching that they need.

There is much scope for co-operation between schools on the post-14 curriculum. That has not happened in the past, and it has become more difficult, especially during the time when schools were almost asked to compete for grant-maintained status. We can redevelop some co-operation and use the fact that not all schools will be able to offer the same range of GCSEs to get them to work together more closely.

In Dewsbury, we mainly have high schools for 11 to 16-year-olds. Some have specialist status and others have beacon status. They all have different strengths and they are not a million miles apart. For vocational GCSEs—I appreciate that we are not to use the term, but I am trying to convey the concept—some schools could specialise in specific subjects and co-ordinate their timetables. For example, pupils from Thornhill high school in my patch could go to Earlsheaton high school for engineering lessons. Wednesday afternoons could be designated for switching schools. Some imaginative thinking would benefit everybody. I volunteer Dewsbury for any pilots that the Minister deems appropriate to test that further.

We need to ensure that we have quality post-16 provision throughout the country. It must be provided where people want it. I welcome the fact that more youngsters are doing AS-levels and I reject the comments of the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West about those qualifications. I welcome the fact that more youngsters go on to study A-levels.

However, in Dewsbury, almost all our academically minded youngsters are exported for post-16 education. As I said, our schools are mainly for 11 to 16-year-olds. There are extremely good sixth form colleges in neighbouring towns, especially Greenhead college and New college in Huddersfield. There are also good colleges in Leeds and Wakefield. Although Dewsbury has one school that caters for 11 to 18-year-olds, the town does not have quality AS-level and A-level provision. It is wrong that youngsters have to travel outside their area for such education.

[Ann Taylor]

Dewsbury college is good at what it does. It offers a wide and increasing range of courses, but it deals with part-time and mature students in particular. Not many 16-year-olds who want to do AS-levels and A-levels go to that college for the limited number of courses on offer. We could build on co-operation between institutions. My ideal solution—which I think could also work elsewhere—would be to have a new sixth form college working in collaboration with existing high schools. Somebody from those high schools could be on the governing body of the sixth form college, and staff could be shared because not every school has every speciality. Such a solution could enhance the education on offer to 16-year-olds. We have to consider this urgently, because the number of 16-year-olds who get five or more good GCSEs and want to stay on in education will increase. We have an opportunity to provide better education and to consolidate the co-operation that should exist, and will increasingly exist, between schools. Again, if the Minister is looking for areas for pilot studies, I volunteer mine.

My third point touches on something that the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West said, but also on other issues. The hon. Gentleman talked about vocational routes as if they were rigid—once people were on such a route, they were on that and nothing else and could never get off. Some people are concerned that, if we are not careful, we may—despite having ended the 11-plus—be introducing the 14-plus. Nobody wants that; nobody wants a sudden divide into one route or the other at age 14. It is very important indeed to get the structure of qualifications right.

Hon. Members have mentioned an English baccalaureate and one or two hon. Members have mentioned credit accumulation. I remind my hon. Friend the Minister for School Standards of a Labour party document of many years ago entitled "Opening doors to a learning society". That document said that credits for GCSEs, BTECs or GNVQs could build into one overarching qualification that could become an English baccalaureate, although perhaps under another name. We have to incorporate that concept into our education system. I urge my hon. Friends to treat this issue, which has been around for a long time, as urgent.

This is an exciting time in education for this age range. They are impatient for more opportunities and the time is right for us to push the boat out and be more adventurous. We should do so not to create turmoil but to create greater and better opportunities for youngsters who are achieving but could achieve even more in future.

3.47 pm

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough): It is always a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Dewsbury (Ann Taylor). She makes a powerful case for what is a fundamental philosophy of Liberal Democrats—that of decisions being taken locally rather than at the centre. Her former colleague Baroness Williams of Crosby, in a discussion that I had with her last week, made exactly the same comments about Labour's past policy documents on credit accumulation. It is nice to see that some people remain faithful to their beliefs, even though they may have moved about the House.

We welcome the strategy paper on education for 14 to 19-year-olds and we thank the Minister for making time for a debate. We are not often given the chance to debate policy papers, and it is important that we debate this one. We also broadly welcome the thrust of the proposals. Anyone reading through the document and the Green Paper would find it hard to disagree with the stark analysis of system failure going back not just a few years but many decades.

We are pleased that the Government are prepared to take a measured approach to their proposals for system reform, especially on qualifications structures. Despite the rather sad comments of the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady), it is clear in the document that there is to be a measured approach to many issues. A knee-jerk reaction to a new qualifications structure would be absolutely disastrous for young people who are just starting year 10.

Mr. Brady: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Willis: Of course, I would be more than excited to.

Mr. Brady: Has the hon. Gentleman not just said exactly what I said?

Mr. Willis: With respect, that is not what I heard. Perhaps I should be terribly disappointed.

Despite the fact that some things need to be taken slowly, we cannot simply allow them to go on as they are at the moment. There has been a lack of progress over many years. I spent most of my professional life working with the sort of youngsters for whom the Green Paper and reports such as "Bridging the Gap" and Helena Kennedy's wonderful "Learning Works" raised expectations and hope. The Minister provided his expertise to the social exclusion unit for many years. At least, he certainly offered his advice when he had a more important job as a political adviser.

"Bridging the Gap" identified the fact that, in 1988, 170,000 16 to 19-year-olds were not in work or training of any sort. Another 280,000 were in work but received no training. Most of them had no skills. That is a damning indictment of the system but, five years after the report was published, we are in exactly the same boat. Doing nothing for the next five years is therefore not an option.

In 1988, we created a post-grammarian curriculum for all. I am not overly-critical of what happened then and in the Education Reform Act 1988. The post-grammarian curriculum has been a real success. The fact that in 1988, 35 per cent. of young people got the equivalent of five good GCSEs and that the figure is more than 50 per cent. today is testimony to what has happened since then. It is also testimony to the success of the comprehensive system, which has delivered those results.

That curriculum approach coincided with the decline of craft, practical and laboratory work in schools. Such work was squeezed by the curriculum. Furthermore, between 1988 and 1997, we saw virtually the end of apprenticeships in the workplace and the end of most industrial-based training schemes. All that has come home to haunt us.

Since 1988, the temptation has been to have a more academic education for all that is intended to serve individual and societal needs. The obsession with GCSEs, performance tables and competition between schools and colleges was the hallmark of the previous Government, but it has severely distorted the education market for 14 to 19-year-olds.

Mr. Boswell: Does the hon. Gentleman not accept that, in 1986 and the following years, we introduced a comprehensive system of national vocational qualifications for the first time and that, from 1992 onwards, we introduced a comprehensive structure of GNVQs? The system was not without its faults, but it was at least a sign of our commitment.

Mr. Willis: The hon. Gentleman has always been committed to this issue, and I particularly commend the 1992 reforms. The introduction of GNVQs led to a reversal of trends in schools. Unfortunately, however, the academic curriculum has dominated schools since 1988, and that is causing major problems today. It has had two effects.

The first effect is the massive skills shortage in the workplace, for which we must all take some responsibility. The second, and more important, effect is that the education system has significantly failed a large number of young people, especially in terms of the curriculum that it has delivered. When I think about the problems with young people—the antisocial behaviour and disaffection, the exclusions from school and the creation of an underclass—it is clear that we cannot simply ignore what has gone on in our schools and the fact that the curriculum has not engaged them. It is important that we start to address that problem.

I was just starting my teaching career back in 1963 when Newsom's "Half our Future" was published. Many hon. Members will have read that report and no doubt remember it. Newsom made the same analysis of the situation as the Minister made today: his response was to divide people into sheep and goats. He said that for 50 per cent. of our young people, the secondary system was doing well—hence the title "Half our Future"—but that the other half needed a different approach. We have still not made the necessary progress.

I was disappointed by some of the comments made by the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West. I am delighted that he has been to Holland yet again. I do not know what he does in that country, but Conservative Front-Bench spokesmen seem to have a real affection for its attractions.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North): The hon. Gentleman likes tulips.

Mr. Willis: The hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) is trying to distract me, but it will not work.

The hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West mentioned modern language teaching. The Minister is right to say that it should be optional at key stage 4. However, he is fundamentally wrong not to make it a compulsory component of key stage 2 because only those schools in relatively middle class areas will offer modern languages to their children. That will put other areas at a greater disadvantage, especially in some of our inner cities where the basics of a modern language are important.

I was disappointed by the Tory response and the comments of the leader of their party. I suppose they can say what they like because they will never be in government. [Interruption.] Well, we are optimistic about our chances. Tory rhetoric reflects a pursuit of elitism—the very thing that has bedevilled our education system. If hon. Members read the debate in 1944 when Butler introduced the tripartite system, they will see that Conservative Front-Bench spokesmen are describing the same situation today. Perhaps that is a move forward from free schools, but it is hardly an agenda for the 21st century.

Chris Grayling: I am intrigued that the hon. Gentleman argues that Conservative policies are elitist when he advocates the downgrading, or possibly even the scrapping, of GCSEs, which risks creating the old two-tier structure between AS-levels and GCSEs that we once had between O-levels and CSEs. It is his policy that is elitist.

Mr. Willis: I am terribly grateful to the hon. Gentleman for taking such an interest in our policy. Unfortunately, he is wrong. I have a great deal of respect for him, however, and he does not usually make party political comments.

We will never reform the 14-to-19 agenda unless the individual, rather than institutions, is put at the heart of those reforms. We can never satisfy the needs of individuals unless institutions offer a comprehensive menu of options from which students can choose, as the right hon. Member for Dewsbury said earlier.

Despite the changing focus that the Department's strategy signals, core issues remain unaddressed. I hope that the Minister will consider those issues following the debate, and that the Under-Secretary will refer to them when he winds up. The issue of independent advice and the Connexions service is very important. At present, the only students receiving such advice are those who will not acquire five good GCSEs. All our youngsters need advice. Moreover, it is not good enough to provide it when they are 14. We must start engaging much earlier with students who, at 14, will be choosing courses that will affect not just their key stage 4 but their 14-to-19 progress. I think that throughout key stage 3 they should be introduced to the idea of what constitutes the world of work, and receive proper guidance.

Unless we can break free of institutionally dominated advice, we shall not give young people the service that they require. At present schools and colleges, especially schools, have a financial incentive to keep youngsters on the programmes that they can offer. That is fundamentally wrong: young people themselves must be at the heart of the agenda. It is tough for schools now. When I was a head teacher, it was much easier to create a menu and say, "Kids, you must choose". Looking back, I think we did them a great disservice.

The hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West mentioned the division between the Learning and Skills Council and local education authorities. He was right to do so, but he did so for the wrong reasons. Of course we must find a solution to the funding problem. The present situation is farcical: if someone between 14 and 16 wants to do some work in a college, there is confusion over whether the LSC should pay by means of a special grant, whether the LEA should pay, or whether devolved funding should be involved. We want a single funding stream for more than one reason, however, be it LEAs or the LSC—although we must have a proper grown-up debate about that, and not just hide behind traditional loyalties. If we are truly committed to taking a new look at vocational education, we must bring employers in. We must not assume that only schools and colleges can deliver education and training; places of employment can do that as well.

The Minister seems to be shying away from the subject of 14-to-16s and employers, who are hardly mentioned in the document. We should be giving employers incentives to deliver part of the curriculum in the workplace. They should have access to resources in the same way as schools and colleges.

Chris Grayling: I am intrigued by what the hon. Gentleman said about finance. Has he considered the possibility of a voucher scheme, which might provide the interchangeability for which he is arguing?

Mr. Willis: No. I am always happy to consider these issues, however. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman, who is so obsessed with the way voucher systems work in America, should go to Cleveland and Milwaukee and see the disastrous effects of introducing a voucher system throughout an authority. I merely suggest that he could do that rather than going to Holland.

One of the key groups whom the proposals need to target consists of young people who drop out of our system at 14—the 9 per cent. who leave school without any qualifications at all. If we are to engage them we have to offer something significantly different from 14 onwards. It is important to involve employers but, to return to the point made by the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling), the real difference will be in the curriculum. We are pleased that the Government have rightly dropped the ludicrous division between vocational GCSEs and vocational A-levels. We have no objection to the widening of the GCSEs or A-levels on offer to include more practical or vocational courses, but we should not pretend that that constitutes the provision of a vocational education curriculum, because it does not. I hope that the Minister will reject the absurd proposition that more students pursuing vocational GCSE studies will result in far greater number of students achieving the five A* benchmark, as that can only be achieved by dumbing down the quality of GCSE studies, which no one in the House wants.

Vernon Coaker: The hon. Gentleman has just made an important point about vocational GCSEs. Does he agree that the introduction of GCSEs or vocational courses alone will not tackle disaffection?

Mr. Willis: Of course it will not. We need to offer young people a plethora of opportunities. If the reforms simply keep everyone inside a GCSE framework they will fail miserably. On the 16-plus barrier, if the reforms continue to provide a 10 GCSE diet for all, because that is how schools can perform well in the league table, we will fail. In the White Paper, the Minister contradicts himself by saying that he wants to slim down the courses on offer to a core of English, maths, science and IT but, at the same time, he wants to keep league tables, success in which depends on doing at least five GCSEs and a few more to make sure that five are passed. Schools will continue to compete on their league table ratings and the GCSEs that they offer instead of trying to offer young people what they need.

The hon. Member for Gedling (Vernon Coaker) is right. I recently visited a Sara Lee factory in Slough that has taken a group of disaffected youngsters out of school for team building. Those young people have since dramatically re-engaged with education. The huge success that Skillsforce and the Ministry of Defence have jointly achieved in co-operation with the Department shows how young people who would otherwise not be engaged can be engaged. Unless we abandon the nonsense of every student having to do GCSEs when they are 16 and schools having to compete in league tables, the reforms are not worth the paper they are written on, as they will sadly create by default a two-tier system with the kids who can going on to do one thing and the kids who cannot going on to do something else.

This is an interesting debate, and hon. Members will wish to make other points. We have a short period in which to engage our young people. There is great support for the Government reforms. Five years ago, I said that we had all the evidence that we needed to make changes, but we did nothing. In five years' time, if we have not moved forward, everyone in the House will have failed.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I have been informed by some Iraqis who live in this country that relatives in Baghdad have just contacted them, saying that the weapons inspectors are preparing to move out. Given the statement by the Secretary of State today, which seemed to some of us very warlike indeed, and given that Hans Blix reports back tomorrow on the inspections, would it be possible to get a Minister to the House to confirm or deny the rumours that are circulating?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Hon. Members are aware that the Foreign Secretary was in the House just over an hour ago to make a statement on Iraq. I have had no indication that any further statements will be made today.

4.10 pm

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North): I associate myself with the point of order. The issue is serious and puts our debate in perspective.

I am heartened that we have having the debate, nevertheless. For some time, I have thought that science education in this country could do better. I am pleased to hear my hon. Friend the Minister say that the Government are addressing the problem. The need for that has been obvious to me as a chairman of governors at various schools in the Norwich area, and from informal discussions with teachers, technicians and students in my constituency, as well as from the report of the Science and Technology Committee, which rigorously examined science and technology education for 14 to 19-year-olds. I see that two of my colleagues on the Committee who participated in that report—the hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban) and my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter)—are present. We toured the country, talking to young people about their thoughts on the matter, so the issues that I am about to raise come from the grass roots.

It was clear that teachers were extremely frustrated with science teaching, technicians were demotivated, and students were bored to death. No wonder: the curriculum is far too prescriptive, the assessment is quite inflexible, and resources are lacking. The Government have recognised that all is not rosy in the world of science education, but I wonder whether they know what to do about it. We have had a ragbag of initiatives recently—a science year, Planet Science, a key stage 3 strategy, an applied science GCSE, science and engineering ambassadors, new professional development initiatives, one-off investment in science labs, a consultation on the roles of support staff, and a pilot of a new science GCSE. What is the strategy behind all these initiatives, where are they leading and where do we aim to be?

For all that, we produce some very bright young people who go into higher education, win Nobel prizes and succeed in developing great new ideas, which contribute significantly to the world of science and technology. My remarks may seem critical, but they are intended to show that we can do better if we sort out some of the problems at the grass roots.

My hon. Friend the Minister appeared before the Committee and participated in a debate there which made an Arsenal-Tottenham derby look like a vicar's tea party. I hear my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead laughing. When we asked about the Government's ideas about science teaching for young people, the answer was that we just have to give them the facts and everything will be all right. We said that about history some time ago, and history teaching has moved on quite a bit in the past 30 years.

Science is not about knowing facts. It is not about answering Jeremy Paxman's "University Challenge" questions on science, although I am very tempted to join the team so that I can be extremely brilliant and give all the answers about Ohm's law and equations. But that is not what science is about. It is just one peripheral aspect of science. Science is more properly about engaging in experimentation, getting the facts and knowing what questions to ask.

Science is a key part of our culture in this country. As Front Benchers on both sides of the House have pointed out, it is essential for our economic competitiveness and quality of life and it is part of our history and culture. It is just as important as Booker prizes, Nobel prizes and all the other prizes that demonstrate excellence in this country.

The problem is that we must consider other aspects of science teaching. It is essential that people be literate about science. There are no issues of more importance on today's front pages than genetically modified crops, triple MMRs—measles, mumps and rubella vaccines—and nuclear power. I do not want people to understand all the equations, but I want them to have some sort of understanding so that they can engage with the questions that are raised. I do not want them to react in an emotive way because The Sun and The Mirror tell them what the questions should be. They should have some sort of confidence and understanding. When we talk about public understanding of science, it often involves an arrogance about science and technologies on the part of those who say, "If only the public understood our language and what we are talking about, it would be all right." Those days are long past. I am talking about engaging at a level at which we can talk to each other and in a language that allows us to put the facts in front of the people and say "This is what we think is happening; we are not quite sure, but this is how it might develop."

When the space disaster occurred the other week, I was struck by all the science involved and how all the wonderful work that is done can go down in the public's estimation because of such a tragic event. The work must go on and we must engage people's brains throughout the world in ensuring that we make progress for humanity. That is not just about learning facts.

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I very much enjoyed my time working on the Select Committee on Science and Technology. One of the messages that I got from our discussions with teachers and pupils—he may be aware of this issue—was that our fact-driven approach to science teaching reduced the time that was available to debate the issues and gain an understanding that did not necessarily include every scientific issue, but enabled people to talk about such issues sensibly and rationally.

Dr. Gibson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. What he says is absolutely true. The young people to whom we talked said that they were put off when the headline news was all about issues such as GM and human cloning, but they could not talk about them. Instead, the teacher said, "There's no time; we must get on with the curriculum and pass exams" and so on. What a tragedy that is. Is it any wonder that that approach puts young people off carrying on and developing their ideas? Their being put off does not mean that they are not interested. Young women in particular were put off by such an approach. On asking young people what experiments they liked doing best, one saw that they did not want to cut up buttercups. We have all cut up buttercups in our time; it is dreadfully boring. Instead, they wanted to cut up a heart. They wanted to see how their bodies functioned and so on. I understand that. There are many hearts that I would like to cut up—[Laughter.] But that is for another time.

One of the other problems is the demands of the examination syllabuses. The awarding bodies say that they are constrained by the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority's requirements. The QCA says that it must safeguard standards. A great deal of buck-passing goes on in this area. Where will all the impetus for change come from? We need more flexibility in the assessment system. Coursework can provide students with the opportunity to show initiative and follow their interests. Last week, with the grace of the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale), I opened a science laboratory in Clarendon grammar school in Ramsgate.

[Dr. Gibson]

Seeing the young women in the school engaged in experiments was stimulating and made me feel that it was worth banging on about the issues that they were concerned about, as we in government can contribute and make life better for them.

Jumping through hoops should happen not only in PE lessons, but in many other areas where we can engage young people to achieve excellence. I have always been against examinations. Having taught in university and continually assessed people day in, day out, I can say that exams were a boring process, as I could have predicted what 90 per cent. of students would get in their final exams. We had seen all the coursework, but we put the students through that dreadful wringer of higher exams and three or four days of trauma. Very few people move on from the marks that they attain in the coursework system. Although the Minister of State and I may share an office, and seats at the same football ground, we certainly do not always agree about what should happen in higher education. We do agree, however, that many of the higher examinations that produce the upper seconds, the first classes, and all that, are for the rubbish bin.

Mr. McWalter: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way, although I am aware that he knows that he will get extra time for a second intervention, so I am intervening partly for the thrill of listening to him for longer. Is he saying that one of the results that he would like to see from this initiative is that science in some form—it has a huge number of forms, as he has said—should be present throughout the system all the way through to a qualification to be obtained at the age of 19?

Dr. Gibson: Of course, we cannot deny that. I noticed this week in the debates on hunting, for example, that at least two and a half days were spent on the science of hunting deer, and on whether the experimental work that had been done on behaviour was bona fide. It is just as important for a politician to have an understanding of that as it is for a five-year-old, a 12-year-old or a 15-year-old. Science runs through all our lives, and we must have some confidence in the subject and not just trust the experts to tell us what we should think.

Science is based on evidence, and hands-on skills are very important in that regard. We can still go into laboratories today and see "Tony loves Cherie" scrawled on those awful brown-topped desks and remember how we spent boring afternoons watching the teacher doing the experiments and demonstrating to us how something worked, when what we wanted was to get into it ourselves—to make mistakes, perhaps, but to learn using hands-on skills. It is important to be able to do that. The Government have respected that need by providing a certain amount of money to develop the laboratories, but there are still many laboratories that turn young people off. It does not excite or engage young people to walk into a laboratory and see an old Kipps generator in a cupboard in the corner, caked in dust and chemicals, and all the other poor equipment there. Going out and taking part in field studies and seeing what happens in nature is also important. Because of the accidents that have happened, we must also address the health and safety problems involved.

Someone once said to me that we would never get a Charles Darwin out of the current system in this country, and I fear that that is true because we do not give young people the time to engage with nature or to look at what is happening. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister does things like that, but I remember him telling the Committee that he had failed some subject in the science field dreadfully—I forget which stage he had reached. He might have been a greater scientist than he is a politician. Who knows?

We spoke to many inspiring and dedicated teachers, and there is good science going on in our country. We could really make it better, however, if we respected the technicians and the teachers, and made the young people who are enthusiastic and excited about science engage in the process—which is about the real world that we live in—of putting the science facts in, but also allowed them the facilities for gaining hands-on experience, finding out what is happening, questioning, arguing and not accepting. That is what science is all about, and we should be doing that in our schools.

Sir John Stanley (Tonbridge and Malling): I am glad to follow the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), whose scientific expertise is appreciated in all parts of the House. In opening the debate, the Minister said that the Government's policy was for every secondary school in the country to be a specialist school. I have no difficulty with specialist schools and, as I shall go on to illustrate, one of the earliest specialist schools—a technology college—was created by the previous Conservative Government in my constituency. I have concerns, however, about one aspect of the Government's policy, and that is the limited number of specialisms—even after the announcement of additional specialisms by the Secretary of State this week.

I am concerned about whether the existing specialisms are adequate for all types of school. I believe that, in one category of school, they are not. That is the category of schools with exceptionally high all-round academic ability. I am fortunate to have at least one such school in my constituency: the Judd school in Tonbridge, which is a voluntary-aided grammar school. It is undoubtedly one of the top-performing academic state secondary schools in the country. Its performance rests on all-round attainment. However, under the present categories of specialist school, there is no specialist category for all-round academic ability. The Government have placed an impossible dilemma before the Judd school. It is told that if it does not become a specialist school, it will lose out substantially—by around £150,000 next year—but if it becomes a specialist school in one of the limited categories, such as maths or languages, it will have to skew its curriculum and staffing, and will cease to have the all-round capability, at least to the same extent, that it has at the moment.

The Government need to consider the position of those state secondary schools that have high all-round academic ability, because there is no adequate specialism for them. The headmaster of the Judd school has written to me with two pertinent questions. He asks: "Does the Government really want us to become a Specialist School if in so doing we are forced to jettison much of our expertise? Do we have to choose a distorting specialism to be given proper funding?"

I hope that the Minister will reflect on that point and see whether it is possible to create a specialist category of all-round academic attainment for such schools.

My comments on the curriculum for 14 to 19-year-olds relate to those parts of the country, such as mine in Kent, where we still have grammar schools. I do not regard the grammar school issue as a party-political one, because for me, it is an educational one. I recognise that in the 1960s and 1970s several Conservative authorities decided to introduce comprehensive schools. Equally, I am well aware that any number of Labour Members have given grammar schools the clearest possible personal endorsement that an individual can give and have sent their children to one. I respect that choice and, as far as I am concerned, it is not a cause for criticism of any individual who has done so.

I trust that the Government will reflect on the fact that the remaining grammar schools enjoy profound support in their communities. They have been truly tried and tested by parents in those communities. The remaining grammar schools are the survivors. They have survived attempts at abolition by local education authorities, when so many introduced comprehensive systems in the 1960s and 1970s; abolition by Government coercion under the Labour Administration of the 1970s, when Baroness Williams was Secretary of State for Education; and abolition by ballot, under the present Government. It is a striking fact that since the introduction of the School Standards and Framework Act 1998, almost five years ago, sufficient signatures to precipitate a ballot have been collected in only one location—Ripon, in Yorkshire—and when it took place, two thirds of the parents voted in favour of retaining the grammar school. We should not forget that the parents whose children go to grammar schools are in a clear minority in the areas concerned. In Kent, just under one third of children go to grammar schools, with the remaining two thirds going to non-selective secondary schools. Yet parents in those areas have wholly rejected the possibility of precipitating ballots, and the House knows what the answer was in the one area in which a ballot was held.

Like the right hon. Member for Dewsbury (Ann Taylor), I should simply like to give to the House the experience in my own constituency. The town of Tonbridge has six secondary schools, of which no fewer than three are grammar schools: Tonbridge girls grammar school, the Weald of Kent girls grammar school, and the Judd school, to which I have referred. There are three non-selective secondary schools: the Hugh Christie school, the Hayesbrook school, and Hill View school.

Labour Members might think this a classic example of children who do not go to grammar schools suffering a lesser education than they should achieve. However, the Hugh Christie school, because of its performance, was one of the first to be singled out for technology status. That was achieved in 1994, under the previous Conservative Government. The current Government have singled out Hill View school by awarding it arts college status as a specialist school. They have also singled out the Hayesbrook school by awarding it sports college status. Even more significantly, all three of the non-selective secondary schools to which I have referred were deemed sufficiently good—with a sufficiently good academic performance—to receive approved sixth forms from the previous Conservative Government.

So notwithstanding the existence of three grammar schools, under two different Governments all three non-selective secondary schools in the Tonbridge community have achieved the status of specialist schools, and of schools with approved sixth forms.

Mr. Brady: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Sir John Stanley: Very briefly.

Mr. Brady: I am very grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way so close to the end of his remarks. I am anxious that he be aware that what he says applies not only to secondary schools in his constituency. A written answer that I received from the Minister just the other day shows that of the 180 remaining secondary modern schools—or high schools—in the country, a quarter are achieving better results than the average result for all-ability comprehensive schools.

Sir John Stanley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that—what I am saying does indeed have a very much wider application.

I hope that the Secretary of State, notwithstanding the somewhat hostile remarks that he made about grammar schools since taking his post, will reflect closely on the fact that the remaining grammar schools enjoy huge, if not overwhelming, parental support in the areas in which they still exist. They are tried and tested, and they produce outstanding educational performance alongside non-selective secondary schools, which also do extraordinarily well by their own children. I put it to the Government that simply to ideologically remove the remaining grammar schools would be an act of sheer educational vandalism.

4.33 pm

Helen Jones (Warrington, North): I am pleased to be able to contribute to this debate on what is, as my hon. Friend the Minister said, a crucial phase in the education of our young people. Fourteen to 19 is an age at which people set the course of their future life, and at which, we hope, they become aware of the opportunities opening up before them. However, during that phase it is vital that we keep their interest in, and enthusiasm for, education, and we do that best by making sure that they achieve success.

It is fair to say that, as the White Paper sets out clearly, some progress has been made under this Government. More children are getting five good GCSEs, and numeracy and literacy standards are rising. However, the White Paper also sets out clearly the problems that we still face. We are far too low down the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development's league table of people who stay on in education after 16. There is too much variation between schools. As has been said, in some schools fewer than 10 per cent. of children get five good GCSEs. It would be a sorry failure for the nation if we allowed that to continue, and a tragedy for the young people involved. They would fail in school and not acquire the habits of lifelong learning that they will need in the future.

[Helen Jones]

I suggest to Ministers that we should take a far more radical look at what our young people need to learn to equip them for the society in which they grow up. That will not necessarily be what we needed to learn. I hope that we will not be afraid of asking what education is for.

We must also be careful about defining education purely in economic terms. Of course, schools should equip young people to earn a living. That is basic, but they should do much more. If we fall into the trap of thinking that we should provide a purely utilitarian education, we shall fail—economically, culturally and spiritually.

If education is about more than jobs, however, it is also about not doing what we used to do, simply for the sake of it. When we design an education system, we are always influenced by our own values, by the education that we wanted to receive, and by our history. My hon. Friend the Minister of State did not want to give a history lesson, but one historical fact has bedevilled English education. In the 19th century, the Taunton commission decided that there would be three types of secondary education for three different social classes. Ever since, we have thought of subjects in those terms.

My plea is that we stop doing that. We must start thinking about what young people will need for the society in which they grow up. They will need high qualifications for employment, and they will have to change jobs rapidly. Increasingly, they will spend part of their working lives abroad. Many people will live away from their families, with all the lack of support that that entails. Also, people will be deluged with information all the time. We must equip them to cope with that.

The White Paper rightly sets out some of the minimum standards that all young people should achieve in English, maths, science and ICT. I support that proposal, and I hope that the House can agree about it. However, I want to go further. We should provide young people with choice, but we should also be talking about a minimum level of education that goes wider and which all our young people ought to achieve. Some of that could be delivered through traditional subjects, but some would be part of the wider curriculum. I want to set out some suggestions for discussion. It is important that we reach some consensus on the matter. Chopping and changing is no good for students, parents or teachers.

First, I echo the plea made by my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), that people should acquire scientific literacy, regardless of the other subjects that they do. People need a basic understanding of science, its history and how it has shaped our culture. My hon. Friend was right to note that they also need a means of assessing risk, and pointed to the number of scare stories that have to do with scientific facts. People cannot assess risk. We would be missing out a major part of our young people's education if we do not teach them how to do it.

We must not fail to teach young people how to deal with the deluge of information. They are growing up in the internet age. We must make some effort to teach them how to distinguish fact from opinion, good information from bad information and well researched information from mere speculation. If we do not, we will not be training them to cope with the world in which they are growing up.

Dr. Pugh: Does the hon. Lady agree that an inherent weakness of the current A-level system is that it inclines students to think of themselves as either scientists or non-scientists at the tender age of 16?

Helen Jones: I agree with the hon. Gentleman; that can be a weakness of our system, if young people are given the wrong advice. It is partly due to the university entrance system, so perhaps we should be encouraging young people to study a much broader swathe of A-level subjects.

All young people should grow up with some knowledge of the history, customs and institutions of the country in which they live, but they are also citizens of the world and they need to know about the problems and opportunities in the world in which they will grow up. They should have knowledge of at least one other country and its culture.

I have grave doubts about our post-14 language teaching. I cannot believe that most of our young people are not capable of coping with learning a foreign language. I support the Government's attempts to introduce foreign languages earlier, in primary school. Although some children cannot deal with learning a foreign language at that age, many more could do so if the teaching was right. German or Swedish workers can give television interviews in English and I refuse to believe that our young people are inherently less able than them.

I support the introduction of more practical and vocational subjects in schools, but it must be carefully done. Used properly, such subjects can be a way of engaging and maintaining young people's interest in education. However, we must not divide young people into sheep and goats at the age of 14; there must be pathways between practical subjects and higher vocational or academic education. The Labour movement, in particular, should remember that categorising people at the age of 14 does not always work, any more than it always worked at the age of 11. If such categories had been fixed, Ernest Bevin would never have been Foreign Secretary—there are many similar examples.

An important aspect of the Green Paper was not included in the White Paper. The Government are rightly introducing citizenship classes, but we need active citizens. Some form of community service should form part of the final leaving qualification in whatever leaving certificate we eventually introduce. There are several reasons for that.

First, we need to help our young people to grow up by learning to accept responsibility and to help others. There are several good voluntary schemes and we need to make wider use of them. Secondly, there is an increasing generation gap, because there are fewer extended families and people are moving away from their families. We can narrow that gap through voluntary service. For example, in my area, there are many older people who worry about keeping their gardens tidy and many young people who could help them and benefit from that contact. Finally, we need to show our young people that being a member of society carries obligations as well as rights. We must assist them to learn about their obligations at an early stage.

I raised an important point in my earlier intervention. Some of our children sit far too many examinations at the age of 16. That has two dangers. First, it squeezes some important subjects out of the curriculum. Secondly, it can lead to children being spoon-fed for their exams, which means that they do not develop the necessary research skills, which are essential for learning in later life. They cannot read around the subject or undertake projects that are not exam-related. I hope that we can help schools to develop other methods of improving and assessing students' work, which can be used alongside public examinations, because both are equally important.

4.45 pm

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury): It is a privilege to take part in this debate. I was going to apologise to my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) for missing part of his speech, but he is returning the compliment by missing part of mine, having left the Chamber for a short while.

I wanted to make a brief contribution because I believe that there is a need to concentrate on many education issues, and I am not confident that we are quite getting the response right. It is not necessarily a matter of party politics. In some ways the problem is a lack of understanding of what is going on in the country.

I should like first to speak generally and then to talk about children and young people who are losing out—perhaps one or two in my own constituency.

My constituency is very mixed; it is agricultural, but it also has a great deal of industry. Like many others, it requires many skills, including those needed in the health services. I find that there is a great skills shortage. There is a shortage of teachers, for example. Every time I meet head teachers they tell me how difficult it is to recruit. It is not that they have a great number of vacancies, but the quality of applicants is not what it should be. One head told me openly last week that if he had the choice he would not employ a number of teachers now in his school if he could find others who were better. He thinks that they are substandard. That is not a very good situation.

We know that in the health service there is a shortage of doctors and nurses, but less talked about is the shortage of scientific staff. People are not training to go into that kind of work.

Part of the aerospace industry is in my constituency. I was able to ask a question about it earlier today. There is a shortage of people entering the industry, of people wishing to go into what might be perceived as a dirty job. Being an engineer is perhaps not as glamorous as certain other types of work.

We have skills shortages in so many walks of life, yet we are apparently educating many people to degree level. I am the first to acknowledge that the party I support, when in Government, considerably increased the number of people going to university. I think that that was a good thing. I did not have the benefit of a university education. I wish I had.

Something, somewhere, is going wrong when more and more people are entering university but many leave as graduates with no job to go into or enter jobs that do not require degrees. I am not saying that one should go to university only in order to obtain a better job. The value of the education must also be taken into account. But there is something wrong when so many young people find themselves in jobs for which they are over-qualified or have no jobs at all. We must question, therefore, whether the Government's 50 per cent. target is necessary.

As I have said, while there are graduates who have no jobs or who are doing jobs that do not require degrees, we have many skills shortages throughout the country. So something, somewhere, is not working. We need to address that problem, and I am not convinced that we are doing so.

I turn to the second part of my speech, in which I want to concentrate on the children we are leaving behind. As several hon. Members have already mentioned, there is a problem of children and young people missing out. Statistics from the last century show that most people have become more prosperous and that health services and housing have improved. Yet we seem to have developed an underclass of people. It is an awful phrase, which was used earlier, but I cannot think of a better way of putting it. We have a class of people who miss out completely. They miss out on better health services; they miss out on better housing; they miss out on prosperity. One of the reasons is that they also miss out on education.

At least 50 per cent. of the prison population, and possibly nearer 60 per cent. now, are illiterate or semi-literate. I would not for one moment say that illiteracy is an excuse for committing a crime. Somebody who is illiterate and commits a crime must be punished. There is a question about what that punishment should be, but they must comply with the law just as the rest of us do. However, we also have to accept that there is an obvious link between no education and crime. Our education system has been developing for an awfully long time, so we have to question why so many children leave school without the basics of education.

Hon. Members have rightly concentrated on GCSEs, international baccalaureates, A-levels and degrees, but the other side of the issue is that a lot of our young people are leaving school without even being able to read and write. That is a tragedy. It is a waste for them, and it is a tragedy for society, because those people often go on to commit crimes. The statistics show that 40 per cent. of street crime, 25 per cent. of burglaries, 20 per cent. of criminal damage and a third of car thefts were carried out by 10 to 16-year-olds when they should have been in school. Not only are they missing out on the education that might get them good jobs, but they are causing an awful lot of problems for society. We must ask ourselves why that is happening.

I want to touch on another issue that is linked to that problem: special educational needs, which is a subject very close to my heart. There is a very good special educational needs school, called Alderman Knight, in my constituency. Its pupils are frequently physically handicapped, but they also have learning and behavioural difficulties. That school does an excellent job. My hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing)—who also declines to hear my speech at the moment—visited that school not long ago, and she was very impressed by what she saw. I ask the Minister to visit that school, too, because it is under threat of closure. Gloucestershire county council is not Conservative run. I do not seek to make a party political point, but it is run by an unholy Lib-Lab pact.

Dr. Pugh: Was that not a party political point?

Mr. Robertson: It was not a party political point at all. Gloucestershire county council wants to close that school. It has already closed one special school in Gloucestershire—Bownham Park, Stroud—and it has two further schools on the agenda for closure. A former Minister who dealt with special education told me that the Government's reforms and proposals should not be seen as a green light to the closure of special schools—okay—but why is it happening?

I ask the Minister to come to Gloucestershire to visit Alderman Knight school and to look the teachers, parents and, more importantly, the pupils in the eye and tell them that he thinks that that school should close. I do not believe that his heart is cold enough to do that. I know a number of Labour Members—perhaps I have had a drink with them downstairs, gone on trips with them and perhaps even gone horse racing with them—and I know that they would not want that school to close, so why has Gloucestershire county council got that agenda? Why is it allowed to get away with that?

Special educational needs is a big issue in itself, but the wider point that I want to make is that such closures will not help to reduce the number of people who are missing out on education. The Government said that they have an inclusion policy. Yes, a lot of people with special needs can be included in mainstream schools, but very many cannot. I ask the Minister to consider that very important point.

Jeff Ennis (Barnsley, East and Mexborough): I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in this very important debate. There is no doubt that 14-to-19 education is being increasingly portrayed as the missing link in extending access to higher education. I say that because currently 90 per cent. of students who gain two or more A-levels go on to higher education before they are 21. However, only 19 per cent. of them come from the lower socio-economic groups, as opposed to 43 per cent. from the higher groups. Additionally, for generations now, the prevailing attitude in education has been "academic good, vocational bad." That attitude must change, and I am delighted that the White Paper advocates how that can best be achieved.

I am sure that the Minister will recall the Adjournment debate on education in the coalfields that I initiated just before Christmas, in which I quoted the report, entitled "Patterns of educational achievement in the British coalfields", produced by Sheffield Hallam university in 2000.

The four main findings of the research that I drew to the House's attention were as follows. First and foremost, the proportion of pupils achieving five or more GCSE passes at grades A to C is 7 to 10 percentage points below the national average. Secondly, educational achievement in the coalfields tails off badly in the mid-teen years between the ages of 14 and 16. In primary schools, the gap between performance in the coalfields and the national average is relatively small and has tended to narrow over time. Thirdly, there is no evidence that performance in the mid-teen years relative to the national average is getting any better. Lastly, even among those staying on in full-time education beyond 16, performance in the coalfields still lags behind the rest of the country. That coalfields case study underlines exactly why we need to get a firm grip on the 14-to-19 agenda.

One of the major initiatives that the Government have embarked upon to improve attainment in secondary schools has been the development of specialist schools status. I am glad about the recent announcement that will give all secondary schools the opportunity to apply for specialist school status. This week, I was even more delighted with the news that Ridgewood school in Scawsby, in Doncaster in my constituency, has become one of the first four engineering specialist schools in the country. I am also delighted that the Government are creating two new specialisms of humanities and music as from October this year. It is also good news that rural schools will be allowed to incorporate a rural dimension into their chosen specialist bid.

Another important Government initiative that has been extremely successful in my constituency is the Barnsley education action zone. The Barnsley EAZ, which was set up in 1998, was one of the first 12 in the country. It contained 21 schools—three secondary schools, 16 primary schools, one special school and one nursery school. In the EAZ, the number of seven-year-olds who read to the expected standard has increased by 12 per cent., compared with the national average increase of 4 per cent., in the past three years, and there are similar figures for 11-year-olds. There has been a 16 per cent. rise in the number of young people doing well at that age, although the effects are less marked at secondary level than at primary level.

That brings us back to why we must positively address the 14-to-19 issue. What we need to do can be showcased by my experience as a governor at Willowgarth high school in Grimethorpe, which is part of the EAZ. I declare an interest in that context. Although Willowgarth is a very deprived school—36 per cent. of the pupils are entitled to free school meals—its improvement has been greater than EAZ average. It has moved from a dismal record of 13 per cent. of pupils gaining five A to C passes in 1998 to 35 per cent. gaining five good passes in 2001—a remarkable increase of almost 200 per cent. in its success rate in less than four years. Before the EAZ was established, Willowgarth never came higher than 12th out of the 14 secondary schools in Barnsley in its record of achievement. It is now fifth out of the 14—an incredible performance that speaks for itself.

Another important feature of Willowgarth's success is the fact that 35 per cent. of pupils who left the school last year were accredited with work-related key skills. Some 90 per cent. of pupils leaving in 2001 did so with an accredited information and communications technology—ICT—qualification, in the form of a GCSE pass or a GNVQ, which helps better to equip children for the world of work. In my opinion, the main reason why the EAZ has been so successful at Willowgarth is the broadening of the curriculum to include more GNVQs and the extension of the school day to support targeted students. The EAZ staff have provided that support, which is vital to continuing educational success in the coalfield communities. The excellence in cities initiative, which now largely supersedes many EAZs, is especially important. Willowgarth intends to bid for technology school status, and I commend the school to the Minister.

Barnsley and Doncaster have benefited in recent years from education maintenance allowances, which have made a difference to the staying-on rates. I am pleased that the Government have decided to provide them nationally from September 2004. I want to make a positive suggestion about them. We should track the students who qualify for EMAs to ensure that the allowances have the desired effect. I should also like the Government to consider extending the EMA to higher education instead of the maintenance grant. That would mean seamless movement from the junior to the senior EMA. We should pitch it at £1,500 rather than £1,000.

It is great news that we are going to discard the unhelpful distinction between vocational and academic GCSEs and A-levels, and that more vocational GCSEs will be created. I am also pleased about expanding the modern apprenticeships, which have been successful in Barnsley in the past.

If we are to achieve the aims that the document on education for 14 to 19-year-olds sets out, the agenda must be partnership driven. No school is an island. Each school and every partner organisation must work together to bring out the best teaching from schools, colleges and work-based learning provision. It will require local education authorities to play an enhanced role, working in tandem with all secondary schools and the local learning and skills council. The role of LSCs has not been mentioned sufficiently.

In areas of high economic deprivation such as Barnsley and Doncaster, it is also essential to involve the local economic regeneration forums to ensure that local vocational courses accurately reflect local business requirements. Learning and skills councils have a major co-ordination role to play with local schools, further education colleges and universities. A more collegiate approach should be established between specialist and non-specialist schools.

To overturn the inadequacies of our secondary school system, we must create educational opportunities for all. The new specialist school system needs to be part of an overall network of educational provision in a local education authority. Every school should have a distinctive part to play, and schools should complement rather than compete with each other.

To achieve such inter-school co-operation, the Department must make school transport a greater priority. For too long, the Department has adopted the attitude that transport is the sole responsibility of the LEA. It must play a much more positive role in assisting LEAs to develop imaginative school transport policies, such as those that Select Committee members witnessed in Birmingham last year.

Before I finish—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. The hon. Gentleman will not be able to finish because he has had his 10 minutes.

5.3 pm

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Barnsley, East and Mexborough (Jeff Ennis). My family is rooted in the coalfield communities of east Durham and I therefore know the importance of education for the self-improvement and advancement of those who live in such areas.

I was enticed to speak in the debate through a series of conversations in the past six months with constituents and employers about the importance of vocational and technical education. The evident lack of skills in south-east Hampshire shows the need for enhanced skills. For example, the director of a listed company in Hampshire who is approaching retirement has chosen to do plumbing at a night class. That is not because he wants a second career, but because he wants the skill to do his own plumbing work. Hon. Members might have thought that we should be training younger people to do those jobs.

To echo the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson), there is clearly a relationship between a lack of numeracy, literacy and technical skills and problems in communities. My hon. Friend mentioned the educational attainment of people in prisons. Last summer, I spoke to people who worked in a jobcentre in Fareham. They said that many young people—especially men—who were coming on to the job market but were finding it difficult to find a job had poor literacy and numeracy skills. I also spoke to people at a local housing association who had found that, among their tenants, it was the young men who were the most in need of skills training but the least willing to receive it.

The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) mentioned the 9 per cent. of people who leave school without qualifications. Some young people are disaffected with schooling, resulting in high levels of absenteeism or truanting. They are missing out on the skills training that they need if they are to play a part in society.

Part of the problem lies in the way in which we present education to our young people in schools. There is too great an emphasis on the merits of academic education, to the exclusion of other skills in other areas. The Government make great play of achieving 50 per cent. participation in higher education among 18 to 22-year-olds. To those who are not academically able, that gives the impression that vocational training is second rate. No parity of esteem exists for academic and vocational education—which reminds one of the binary divide between polytechnics and universities, which the Conservative Government abolished. We have to have that parity of esteem so that people acknowledge the value of vocational education and so that people who are disaffected with education, or disengaged from it, can see the point of it.

To improve vocational education, we must have greater co-operation between the school sector and the further education sector. As the Minister said earlier, we must ensure that local provision of training matches the needs of the community. It was therefore disappointing to read in the Ofsted report that came out earlier this month that "Area-wide inspections are showing that it has so far proved hard to establish a clear strategy,"— in further education—

[Mr. Mark Hoban]

"based on a detailed analysis of local need, for offering a coherent range of courses across the attainment range".

A great deal of work clearly needs to be done within the further education sector to improve the provision of courses. The needs of the local business community must be considered before it is decided what vocational training should be offered. People who finish vocational training—either at school at the age of 16, or in post-16 education—have to be able to see that their training has value. There have to be employment opportunities at the end of it. The skills that the business community needs must be matched to the skills that are taught in the local FE colleges.

We have to look beyond the provision of training courses by the FE sector. There could be other providers, such as businesses. I draw the attention of the House to a scheme in south-east Hampshire, where HMS Sultan, which is a training establishment for the Royal Navy, is offering one-year residential courses for people taking part in a modern apprenticeship scheme. That has received many positive comments from employers. They have found that the young men and women who left school at 16 and who have gone on the residential course for a year come out of the process much more mature and better equipped for the world of work than they were a year earlier. We need to offer more diverse provision to ensure that we give young adults good vocational training and good training in life skills. The hon. Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) mentioned the importance of teaching young adults the skills that they need to live as well as the skills that they need to work.

The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough referred to workplace training. The Ofsted report was critical of the quality of that training, and it is important that the young people who receive training in the workplace find that it is of good quality. Therefore, the learning and skills councils, the FE colleges and commercial training providers must work together. In my area, much of the vocational training in the Navy is provided by a commercial company, Flagship Training, which is part of Vosper Thorneycroft. It is recognised by the Learning and Skills Council as providing good quality training to apprentices in the area.

The Ofsted report mentions failings in vocational training, the FE sector and workplace training, but it sets a benchmark as to where we should be. If we are to bring about parity of esteem for vocational and academic training, it is clear that we need to make significant improvements in the way in which courses are provided and taught. Young people who are currently disaffected with education should enjoy training courses that are equally as good as the academic courses that their peers receive elsewhere.

The Government and those involved in education face the challenge of ensuring that children and young adults receive the right level of education in good quality courses, so that they are motivated and understand that they have a role in society. They should see that society has something to offer them and that they have something to offer to society. That is how we can tackle the problems that the country faces from the disengagement of young people—particularly young men—in our local communities.

5.12 pm

Mrs. Ann Cryer (Keighley): I have lost count of the number of my hon. Friends who have opened speeches on education with the words, "I was the first person in my family to go to university." I can do better than that. I was the first person in my family to go, at the age of 15, to work in an office. That was regarded as a great achievement. I did not go into the factory where my aunties and father had worked. Like the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson), I did not go to university and that perhaps makes me all the more sensitive about those who fail in education or who are failed by it. I am not sure which it is.

In the past 15 years, I have had an abiding concern for the academic underachievement of the Pakistani and Bangladeshi communities. That underachievement stems from the fact that young husbands and wives have come here from the subcontinent and do not speak English. If the learning and skills councils do not tackle that problem and teach them English to a good level, they will not speak it in their homes. Consequently, their children will go to school without knowing any English and that will set back their academic and working lives. Without the essential knowledge of English, they will not progress.

Because of the anxiety that I have had for more than 15 years, I decided to ring a couple of schools in my constituency to prepare for this debate. Although I could not get hold of them directly, my assistant rang the two schools in my constituency with the largest number of Asian children.

I was delighted to learn from the deputy head teacher of the first school that although a large number of girls used to disappear because they were taken back to Pakistan or kept at home, the problem has now been solved. By working hard with the parents, the school is getting over such problems. By and large, girls are staying at school longer to do A-levels and to go on to higher education. The problem of girls disappearing was a problem at that school, so I am pleased that things have changed.

The deputy head teacher told me that although the girls are doing well, there is a problem with Asian boys, who are not doing so well. She also told me that there was a problem with white families who are on the move. I am talking not about travellers but about families who constantly move from town to town and school to school. Their children are difficult to teach and it is hard for them to do well at school. Apparently, one family with eight children had moved so often that they had lost track of where they had lived. As a result, the children were poor academic achievers.

I phoned the other school, which also has many Asian children. One of the teachers was good enough to send me a fax that summarised the teaching situation with regard to Asian girls. The fax sets out a good analysis of the problems and I am pleased that the school is moving in the right direction. The fax says:

"As a general rule, the families of . . . Asian girl students tend to be very supportive of them staying on to pursue their education to the Sixth Form; and many have done well there, and have gone on to higher education. Bilingual or multilingual students who do not speak English at home often develop later academically than other students of their age".

So I am pleased with my hon. Friend the Minister's comments on flexibility at 14-plus. Those girls need that flexibility because their lack of English at four gets them off to a late start and they often do not get around to doing A-levels until they are 19 or older.

The fax goes on to say:

"so continuing education post 16 can be extremely important. Our experience is that parents"—

I am talking about Asian parents—

"are usually very happy to encourage their daughters to stay on as long as they are motivated . . . For a minority of our students there are very difficult issues around the family's wish to arrange a marriage for a daughter before the daughter feels ready for it. This can cause great anxiety for some students, and it has sometimes resulted in a student's education being interrupted sooner than the school would think desirable. Adolescents sometimes find it very hard to stand up to the pressure of family expectations, or even at times to discuss their feelings in an open way with their parents."

That is, of course, a cross-cultural problem. Teenage children not being able to discuss problems with their parents is common in all cultures. That does have an impact on their education. However, the fax then states:

"It has to be said that families are sometimes more understanding and supportive in the event than their children give them credit for; but things can and do sometimes go wrong, and in extreme cases we have seen students leaving home and putting themselves at considerable risk because conflicts of this kind have not been resolved within the family."

The teacher concludes by saying:

"As a school with a predominantly white staff", which is the case in most of my schools,

"we are in great need of more adult role-models for our Asian students. It would be particularly useful to have more Asian women on our staff in positions of authority and responsibility."

That goes wider than academia. The Bradford area needs more Asian women who have achieved. They do exist, but I want more so that Asian girls see them as role models for their futures rather than simply marrying at 16 and 17 and leaving the academic world.

Finally, I draw hon. Members' attention to early-day motion 703 tabled by the hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman). It is entitled "BBC 'Hitting Home' Initiative", and states

"That this House applauds the BBC for their Hitting Home initiative of a week of programmes on television and radio starting on 15 February dedicated to domestic violence"— meaning the eradication of domestic violence.

Schools must be about a bit more than preparing kids for exams. They must be about preparing them for life. From their early years of education until the end of their schooling, they should be shown the importance of gender equality: I can think of nothing more important than that. I am not just being politically correct. It is extremely important for boys in particular to understand that girls are as good, as clever and as capable as they are. They should also be taught to disapprove of bullying, however it takes place. If we can get the message across in schools that bullying is not a good thing, and that girls are at least as good as boys, we shall go a long way towards defeating domestic violence and preventing many young men from perpetrating it later in life.

5.21 pm

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell): I am delighted to be able to speak on such an important subject. I think there is cross-party consensus on the need to improve things for those aged between 14 and 19, although there may be different approaches and different ideas about how to solve the problems that undoubtedly exist in many schools.

I want to make four points. The first relates particularly to those between 14 and 16. Notwithstanding what has been said by a number of Members, notably the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis), I feel that we should be robust enough to be willing to push children into a different educational environment if that is appropriate. It may mean separating classes; it may mean streaming; it may mean creating different environments for different aptitudes. When we talk of pushing kids into the workplace, we must bear in mind the fact that the academics—those who will go on to university—will find themselves in a different educational environment from those in the vocational arena.

There is ample evidence to suggest that treating children with different skills in different ways does work. I know that Members disagree on the role and the rights and wrongs of grammar schools, but there are some hard facts relating to the teaching of academic children in an environment that is geared to them. In the recent added-value study, grammar schools came out on top; but we know from research carried out last year that they add value particularly in the case of "upper-middle ability" children. There is clear evidence that tailoring education to specific educational needs really works.

I do not propose to make this a discussion about the rights and wrongs of grammar schools, but I have always felt that the failures of the past were due to the absence of a strong and viable vocational alternative, and a lack of interchangeability. In an intervention earlier, the Minister made an important point about the need for interchangeability between the vocational and educational streams. At no stage should shutters close off one option from another—although that does not mean that the separate streams should not exist.

I welcomed what was said earlier this week by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) and my hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Mr. Green), the shadow Secretary of State for Education and Skills, about the need for a better, stronger, vocational model, and the need to learn from countries that have done well in that regard.

My second point relates to those aged between 16 and 18. I have made it here before, and will continue to do so. I fear that many of the Government's changes may ultimately undermine sixth forms, and I am still concerned about the long-term commitment of learning and skills councils to investment in them. I will watch carefully to see what happens in the next few years, and will regularly challenge Ministers to ensure that in the understandable drive to strengthen vocational education the strengths of school sixth forms are not undermined and that greater emphasis is not placed on colleges at the expense of sixth forms. Both have a role to play, and sixth forms must not suffer as a result of the changes. On exams for 16 to 18-year-olds, as I pointed out in an intervention, I do not believe that the A-level system was broke. The Government's priority should be to sort out the availability of non-vocational education for young people aged 14 and over. They do not have to focus so much on trying to reform and rehash the A-level system, which has served the country well for a good many years.

Thirdly, on the vocational pathway, we have heard from Ministers about the desirability of modern apprenticeships and their intention to put pupils into the workplace at a relatively early age. I do not dispute the desirability of apprenticeships or young people gaining experience in the workplace but, as Ministers set out on that strategy, I remind them that the workplace of today, as the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough suggested, is very different from the workplace of 20 or 30 years ago. We no longer have the large-scale industrial employers who delivered significant numbers of apprenticeships to young people. Speaking from experience, I know that the pressures in the workplace are such that it is difficult to invest enough time in young people for them to gain the skills that they need to benefit from their experience there. Ministers must look extremely careful at the structure of such arrangements to make sure that those pupils are not simply kicking around an office with nothing to do, losing time that could otherwise be spent on education.

The 18-plus education system has been touched on by Members but its importance needs to be restated. The Government are introducing a 50 per cent. target for the number of pupils who go into higher education, but I am genuinely concerned that in too many cases pupils go into higher education at 18 taking courses that are not suited to the realities of the employment market that they will enter. If we do not tailor training for students aged 18 and above to the labour market, we will end up just putting our young people through university on courses that they may enjoy but which will not help them in professional life. At the end of the process, they will be left saddled with debts that they will struggle to repay, which is wrong.

I do not agree with arbitrary targets, but if the Government are going to increase the target to 50 per cent., they must know exactly what those students will end up doing. They must look at the future labour market and economic trends; they must try to identify what will be required in future, and must work with schools and colleges to ensure that pupils are going in the right direction. Pupils must not end up taking the wrong courses and achieving the wrong qualifications for the jobs that are available.

Fourthly, we must be careful to invest in further education as well as higher education, as FE has a vital role to play in developing the skills of the future. FE tends to be available locally, and many student debts are built up because students are away from their home communities. That is desirable for many young people, but we cannot provide universal education away home, however great and enjoyable the university experience, only to leave those kids with huge debts and the wrong qualifications at the end of the process. We have excellent FE colleges in this country, including NESCOT—North East Surrey College of Technology—in my constituency, which is doing first-rate work in developing a variety of skills. It trains the craftspeople of tomorrow as well as equipping people to take degree courses. In future, the role of such colleges, to which people can travel from home, will be as important as that of universities. We must make sure that the drive to get more young people into university does not take place at the expense of high-quality college-based education and training, which may be much more relevant to the labour market than many of our university courses.

I finish with this thought. If Ministers do not plan their policy for the future against the realities that employers, statisticians and economists say will be the labour market of the future for those kids, none of their targets or strategies will work. I have not yet heard the analysis and the insights to convince me that the Government know where their strategies are going in employment terms.

5.30 pm

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North): I welcome the White Paper wholeheartedly. It responds to the many pressures on our system. For the first time in many years, it sets out a coherent way forward for the 14-to-19 phase of education. In his opening remarks, my hon. Friend the Minister said that he would give us a history of the various failures to strengthen vocational education over the past hundred years. I regret that he did not do so, but my regret was mitigated by the fact that the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady), in the assumptions that underpinned his opening remarks, gave us living proof of many of those failings. I made a note of the fact that two thirds of his speech was focused entirely on universities and A-levels, which suggests to me that he has not taken on board the thrust of the White Paper on 14-to-19 education.

Mr. Brady: The hon. Gentleman is giving a misleading impression. I concentrated on those points in order to highlight the fact that the Government are wrong to pursue those priorities. [Laughter.] The hon. Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) was in the Chamber. She knows perfectly well, and she can check the record tomorrow, that I said there should be a greater emphasis on FE in the Government's proposals, and that is where they are failing most profoundly.

Mr. Chaytor: I am sorry the hon. Gentleman did not make his emphasis clearer in his opening remarks. I found it interesting that he seemed to ignore one of the main points of the White Paper, which involves abolishing the distinction between the vocational and the academic. His assumption, clearly expressed, was that universities were for those following an academic path, whereas further education colleges were for those following a vocational path. I found it interesting that the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) advanced his criticism that universities were insufficiently academic. There seems to be a schizophrenia deep in the Conservative party about the future of higher education.

On the academic/vocational divide, one of the most important aspects of the White Paper, which I warmly welcome, is the new language that my hon. Friend proposes—the terms "general" and "specialist". We should no longer use the terms "academic" and "vocational", because for as long as we continue to use them, the question of hierarchy will come into the matter. It is impossible in our political culture for the vocational to be seen to have parity with the academic. The new framework of general and specialist studies is the right way forward. My only regret was that, after the point had been made early in the White Paper, the language was not consistently followed and regressed to the use of "vocational" and "academic" later on.

On the definition, does the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West really think that a degree in medicine is not vocational? Does he think that a degree in law, physics or management is not vocational? We must challenge outdated, archaic assumptions of what is vocational and what is academic. In the school system, is art not vocational? Given the labour market in which we are living and in which the creative industries are generating more and more jobs, more young people are now involved in the creative industries than were involved in textiles. Are we saying that art is not a vocational subject? I find that bizarre.

Mr. McWalter: I am particularly grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way, as this is the only way I shall get into the debate. Does he agree that subjects such as motor vehicle studies, which is available as a GCSE subject in Northern Ireland but not in the rest of the UK, have a tremendous academic potential for making young people understand certain concepts, and they have that "Wow!" factor that will often get them into a school, whereas they might otherwise be tempted to stay away?

Mr. Chaytor: If it were not for the fact that I want to see the end of the GCSE, I would welcome its extension to motor vehicle studies. The point is—this is another priority in the White Paper—that we need to play down the significance of the GCSE if we want to increase participation rates and encourage stronger interest in lifelong learning among more young people. The GCSE currently acts as a barrier to our doing that, so it is critical that it be gradually given less significance and become a sort of progress check on the way to the age of 19.

We must also go further and urgently start work on establishing the development of an English baccalaureate—an all-embracing qualifications framework at 19. If we can do that and take into account the points made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Ann Taylor) about the importance of developing a modular structure for such qualifications and a framework for credit accumulation and transfer, we will be on the way to having a school and further education system that will compete with the best in the world. We will find that, in such a modular structure, students will increasingly mix and match subjects such as history, geography, literature, music and art, as well as motor vehicle studies, engineering, hairdressing and hotel management. That will be better for individual students and provide a far better service for those who have traditionally been failed by our education system. It will also provide a better service for those who have traditionally followed an extremely narrow academic curriculum, and it will be for the good of the country as a whole.

I should like to make one or two extra points. The White Paper's focus on the individual learning plan is crucial. My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mrs. Cryer) expressed concerns about gender equality. In one sense, that issue is changing rapidly, as it is girls who are now racing ahead in our school system. In GCSEs and—I think—A-levels, there are significant improvements in the performance of some groups of girls, if not all groups. However, what concerns me is that the rate of intellectual, physical and emotional development of our young people is hugely variable. The assumption that all young people can take precisely the same form of assessment at the same stage of their lives is misguided. From not only 14 years, but 11, we need a far greater focus on individual guidance and learning plans. I am sure that the flexibility of the new curriculum that is emerging in the White Paper will be an important step forward.

I want to express two reservations about issues on which the White Paper does not go into sufficient detail. On the institutional arrangements for the development of the 14-to-19 phase, it is a strength of the document that it focuses so much on the curriculum, but it does not say very much about how we will deliver it. The appendix contains a detailed work programme, which is important, but I should like to flag up to my Front-Bench colleagues the concerns expressed in many quarters about the ability of local learning and skills councils to bring about the transformation that we seek. There are concerns about excessive bureaucracy in the LSCs, lack of transparency and decision-making processes. There are also concerns about lack of expertise in the LSCs. We understand the history and the way in which staff were redeployed from the previous bodies, but getting more direct expertise about secondary education and further education into LSCs is a priority.

Finally, it is crucial that the 14-to-19 phase is now firmly on the agenda, but let us not overlook what happens at the age of 11. The most crucial determinant of many young people's educational future is the school to which they are allocated at 11. I do not want to rise to the bait that was thrown in by several Opposition Members earlier about academic selection at 11, but I hope that the Minister will not be deflected by the first interventions in the debate relating to admissions policies for federations of schools. One of the great ironies is that we have recently announced the establishment of an access regulator for universities. If we had an access regulator for secondary schools, there would be far less need to look at access to universities, because things would follow through automatically.

5.40 pm

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): This has been a particularly constructive debate and it has perhaps ranged rather more widely than its narrow remit. Time will not permit me to comment on all the various interesting contributions that have been made, but they have been almost universally constructive. I hope that the hon. Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) will not think it invidious if I single her out, because I thought that she made the single most important remark of the debate when she reminded us that this was not simply about competitiveness, and that education had a value in itself. We should never forget that, whatever else we say. A fairly common theme running through a number of hon. Members' speeches was the need for greater guidance for all young people; if this issue is complicated for us, it is extremely complicated for them, and they have only one chance to get it right.

We have no objection in principle to the themes of the White Paper; we find it constructive. The only point that I would make is that there are a number of interlocking interests that are not exactly the same, and Ministers need to be clear when they are pursuing these policies where they are placing the emphasis at any one time, especially if there is any dissonance between them on any particular policy. The first objective is the need for greater flexibility in the system, and we welcome that. We would also welcome better linkages back into key stage 3 and even into primary schools, and forward into the post-secondary experience of university, training or whatever. Coupled with that is the concern to sort out some of the confusion in the present qualifications structure.

The second objective—again, a proper one—is to tackle the problem of the 10 per cent., or thereabouts, of socially excluded young people, who have probably voted with their feet. We have to remember that they might not even be in school to consider doing GCSE, and we need to start to motivate them earlier, in ways that have been touched on today. The third objective—the endemic one; it has been an issue ever since the Royal Society of Arts report of 1884—is the need to tackle the desperate, deep-seated lack of prestige for vocational education. That need is encapsulated in the words that I remember from civil servant who has now retired, so I think I can quote him. When I once said, very pertly, on receiving a document, "This will require two A-levels, or the equivalent vocational qualifications", he replied, "That, of course, goes without saying, Minister." That said it all.

Alongside that worry about the vocational gap is the manifest fact that we need people with a vocational education. We have a desperate shortage of them, despite the fact that some modern apprentices are coming through. The Minister may want to advise me on this, but I believe that, at the advanced level, there are not enough. There are far too few, for example, to meet the needs of the construction industry—a subject that we debated recently. We shall be able to fill all the available places with people with craft-based skills, and we also have requirements for those with technician-based skills.

In the time remaining, I would like to concentrate on a number of points. The first relates to institutional arrangements, and we have not yet mentioned how difficult it will be to put together the 14-to-19 phase. For a start, there is a systemic division at 16, when compulsory schooling ends and post-compulsory schooling, involving voluntary participation in education or training, begins. Secondly, there are structural subdivisions, post-16, between school and further education, which is itself divided into general FE colleges, sixth form colleges and the training arm, along with whatever provisions are blended in between them for the particular individual. There have always been concerns about the anomalies in funding and remuneration in that area, and they have not always been levelled up, even if they are gradually becoming nearer to one another.

In its briefing, the Association of Colleges referred to concerns that colleges were only receiving the pupils that schools would rather not touch, and that also has a bearing on their concerns about inspections and Ofsted results. It is worried that guidance is still skewed towards keeping pupils in schools and that colleges may not get credit from their local LSCs for involvement in any pre-16 education. Proper concerns also exist about the legal framework. For example, if children under 16 go into college, child protection, liability and health and safety issues may arise.

Having said all that, I am sure that the Minister will agree that it is a powerful experience to encounter a group of 16-year-olds in a further education college who might not have very good GCSEs but who have rediscovered the relevance of education. They have a buzz about them and are motivated not only to do well in their vocational attainment, but to reinvest in their general educational skills. That is a contribution that FE can make to the overall mix. I should also record the fact that there are more A-level students in the FE sector than in sixth forms, but they both matter and we should not create artificial distinctions tonight. We need to draw together the whole offer and make it relevant to the individuals.

I have scribbled down some possible criteria for a good vocational qualification. They include rigour, even if the assessment style may be different from that for general or academic attainment; occupational relevancy; coherence within the overall curriculum, so there is some understanding that a subject will be offered alongside other subjects; acceptability to teachers, because it needs to be something that they want to deliver; and acceptability to pupils and their parents, because it needs to be something that they wish to study. We must not forget that the pupils will be volunteers for the new subjects.

The parity of esteem to which we have referred cannot be achieved by fiat or ministerial edict. It will need to be earned, mostly by the qualifications' acceptability to employers. There can, therefore, be no question of tailoring vocational GCSEs to the weaker candidates. Of course, if people do not find it easy to do academic subjects but do well with their hands, that is great. However, that should not mean that the entire qualification is skewed to achieve that. It must be just as relevant for others who may wish to participate.

A case can be made for strong occupational relevance. I hope that when the sector skills councils are up and running, they will provide a contribution by specifying what is needed and how it should sit alongside other qualifications that may fill up the offer. I have always recognised a certain strain in the GNVQ concept, because it tries to be both academic and vocationally relevant. It is not fully a preparation for work, and was never intended to be so. In some cases, it may be better to offer an GNVQ-type qualification, even pre-16, alongside the appropriate general education.

None of these proposals will work unless the offering is feasible to deliver—including any assessment—cost-effective and acceptable to the stakeholders. Strangely enough, as vocational education moves further back into the compulsory education years, its marketing effort must be even more developed.

In conclusion, I wish to make one or two comments on outcomes. Mediaeval Oxbridge would have understood rather more than modern Oxbridge would articulate that all education is, in a sense, vocational, in that it leads to something. What is needed is to get the balance right in terms of ultimate employability. The Association of Colleges expresses some concern that arises out of the experience of Curriculum 2000, with colleges being discouraged by the reaction of universities, which have discounted key skills and taken little account of breadth in their offers and interviews. The association points out that "it is crucial that 14-19 developments gain the endorsement of HE and are taken account of in HE offers."

The business of trying to produce specifications of what is sensible, although not always ideal for the individual, is an important art that we must develop.

Beyond that issue is the acceptability of qualifications to employers. The market has not been perfect, and what employers want has not always been well articulated. They probably need a range of skills and attainments within the individual, and different kinds of recruits with different attainments across recruiting profiles. However, above all they need closer association with the education system—we cannot go on in silos. At the same time, there needs to be greater flexibility for individuals to tailor their own offers, and to develop beyond their original horizons: if they do well, they should be able to proceed to a degree and become a modern apprentice, for example.

The two forces are university pull and pupil push, and to be effective they need to operate in the same direction. If Ministers can fashion a strategy for 14 to 19-year-olds that turns words into achievements, they will have our support; indeed, they will be judged by their success, or otherwise, in doing so.

5.50 pm

Mr. Ivan Lewis: On the whole, the debate has been of a very high standard, and many positive contributions have been made. However, the great contrast was to be found in the contributions of the hon. Members for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady), and for Daventry (Mr. Boswell). As my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) said, the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West repeated the mistakes that have been made throughout history in our attempts to present vocational education and training.

Mr. Brady rose—

Mr. Lewis: The hon. Gentleman articulated a "sheep and goats" model—exactly the model that the Leader of the Opposition announced as Tory party policy on his visit to Holland earlier this week. That is quite astonishing.

Mr. Brady rose—

Mr. Lewis: Unlike the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West, the hon. Member for Daventry outlined some principles that could be the basis for consensus in our approach to vocational education and training.

Mr. Brady rose—

Mr. Lewis: As he listed those principles, I scribbled them down simultaneously. Our approach should provide a high-status, high-value route for young people. We must provide a high-quality learning experience that should not be the same learning experience as a general qualification. The experience can be stand-alone, or form part of a mixed learning pathway. It can lead directly to higher education and a vocational route—making nonsense of the 50 per cent. allegation—or to skilled employment. The option must genuinely be for all young people, and not just for disengaged young people.

In achieving those objectives, we need to put in place a number of component policy building blocks. We must consider the quality of advice, information and guidance; the attitude of parents and how to influence it; the attitude of young people; and employers' human resource policies. Employers say that they want people with vocational skills, yet they still advertise for people with five O-levels. We need to look at the way universities respond to high quality vocational pathways for 14 to 19-year-olds. I agree with the hon. Member for Daventry when he says that no magic wand or White Paper will deliver parity of esteem. What we should seek are the building blocks that converge esteem, and in time, parity of esteem will occur naturally.

The hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West also said that young people take too many exams, and he questioned the virtue of a baccalaureate model. However, an article of 27 August last year, entitled "Tories look at replacing A-levels with baccalaureate", states the following:

"A-levels are no longer the 'gold standard' they once were, the Conservatives are to argue, as they promise an overhaul of the sixth form curriculum to require students to show greater breadth of knowledge.

Proposals being discussed by Damian Green, the shadow education secretary, and his team could mean the introduction of extra exam papers in which students would be expected to show ability in subjects they were not specialising in . . . Another option is to extend the international baccalaureate".

That runs completely counter to today's contribution from someone who is a member of the Conservatives' Front-Bench education team.

The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) made a generally positive contribution, as ever. He described me as a good man, and I shall put that in my next focus leaflet in Bury, South. He welcomed a measured approach, and it is absolutely vital that we get it right. We must reassure people about the integrity of the system in the short term, and we must also ensure that we get the reforms right when we deliver them, and as they impact on young people and teachers.

[Mr. Lewis]

The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough said something that I thought slightly unfair about the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West. He said that the Tories can say whatever they want, because they will never be in government. That accusation has often been made about the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough, who also said that my hon. Friend the Minister for School Standards was in the social exclusion unit. That was only when my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister thought that my hon. Friend needed extra help to get back on message.

Many people have spoken about the importance of impartial advice and guidance in respect of the Connexions service. It is important that the service be independent and of high quality. It must be universal, in the sense that all young people have access to it, and it must recognise that some young people need more intensive support than others. The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough will be pleased to hear that we will be issuing guidance very soon on providing careers guidance from the age of 11. We accept that it needs to start far earlier than 14.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Ann Taylor) spoke in an informed and passionate way about opening up opportunities in her constituency. She rightly advocates the tremendous possibilities now available for co-operation between education institutions in localities. Schools can now co-operate with each other, and with local colleges. In the pathfinder projects and the federations that now exist, schools, colleges and employers work together in an integrated way. I am sure that we will look sympathetically on an application from Dewsbury for that type of pathfinder project.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury also referred to the importance of high-quality 16 to 19 provision in her community. She does not want young people to have to leave Dewsbury and go elsewhere for that provision. If it can be demonstrated that those needs are not being met in Dewsbury, there are real opportunities, under the area inspection and area review processes, for resources to be found to create the necessary specialist provision, whether it be part of a FE college or as a stand-alone sixth form college.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury also mentioned the structure of qualifications and the importance of looking at unitisation. I have excellent news for her and other hon. Members: my hon. Friend the Minister for School Standards has briefed the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority and asked them to look at the question of unitisation with regard to qualifications.

My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) listed the many tremendous initiatives on science that the Government have introduced, but accused us of not having a strategic approach. There may be some legitimacy in that criticism. I invite my hon. Friend to come to the Department to discuss with me how we can develop a more strategic approach—as long as he promises not to summon me before his Select Committee.

The right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley) said that specialist status was not suitable for schools with a wide academic base. That is extremely offensive to many schools that have achieved or applied for that status. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made it clear that the issue with grammar schools has to do with the effect on standards for all pupils in the relevant localities. It is not about ideological warfare.

My hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) made an excellent speech. She talked vividly about the consequences of failure in terms of people dropping out at 16. We need to remember that dropping out at 16 often leads young people into low-skilled jobs, unemployment or crime, but those young people are also the parents of the future. When they parent their children, they will not instil an understanding of the importance of education—the reason we have so many difficulties in terms of aspirations.

My hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North made a strong case for the importance of getting young people engaged in active citizenship and voluntary work as part of a leaving certificate. We are all worried about the disengagement of young people from their communities, and the intergenerational conflict between younger people and their elders. Getting young people involved in community service is extremely important, and it will help with creating the skilled work forces that our public services will need in the future. Young people involved in voluntary work are far more likely to go into such work.

My hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, East and Mexborough (Jeff Ennis) spoke eloquently about the contributions made by different Government initiatives to raising standards in his community, where low aspirations have been a problem for too long. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister for School Standards will look sympathetically on Willowgarth school's application for specialist status.

My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mrs. Cryer) made a very eloquent contribution about the importance of getting right the education offered to young people from the ethnic minority communities.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North advocated a more individualised approach to learning, which would take into account people's cultural or religious backgrounds and the barriers that they may face in making progress in education.

We all share a passion for all children to have those opportunities and a programme of learning tailored for their individual needs.

PETITION

Epsom Common

6 pm

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell): I present a petition on behalf of the Epsom Common Association, concerning the proposal to build a roundabout adjoining Epsom common, a historic area of land on the edge of my constituency.

The petition states:

To the House of Commons.

The petition of the Epsom Common Association.

Declares that the roundabout access proposed on the B280 (as a second access point to the West Park Site, Epsom) be removed from the relevant planning application by the National Health Service.

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons put this matter before the relevant Minister, in order to implement and assist in the future protection of Epsom Common (designated a Site of Special Scientific Interest), by the removal of the said roundabout access from the relevant planning application by the N.H.S.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

La Mon House Hotel Bombing

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Dan Norris.]

6.1 pm

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford): I am grateful for this timely opportunity to bring before the House a solemn matter that affects my constituency and which cries out to be addressed.

On Monday next, when the House will have risen and Members will have returned to their constituencies, people throughout the kingdom will go about their everyday chores, in business, at recreation and in the family. But in many parts of Northern Ireland, people will approach Monday in a very different frame of mind. They are the relatives of those who lost their lives in the La Mon bombing, one of the worst atrocities ever to occur in the Province. They are joined by the surviving victims, and by the many members of our emergency services who experienced the horror that unfolded in the Castlereagh hills on that dismal February evening.

Monday marks the 25th anniversary of that horrific bombing at the La Mon House Hotel, in Castlereagh, on Friday 17 February 1978. I speak not just as the Member of Parliament for Strangford, the constituency targeted by the Provisional IRA that night, but also as a member of the La Mon Bursary Committee. The committee comprises a representative group of people: relatives of the victims murdered that evening, victims who were injured in the bombing and former members of the emergency services who were involved in the aftermath of that indiscriminate and appalling attack on innocent people.

We seek, in a positive way, to keep the memory of La Mon alive and in the public domain. I speak not just from the call of duty but as someone who has been touched by the anguish and, yes, the courage of those to whom I shall refer as the "La Mon victims".

Serving with the La Mon group since its foundation in 1998 has allowed me more fully to comprehend the terrible pain and suffering that the victims experienced that terrible night and which abides with them 25 years later. Although those individuals cope with their pain and carry their burden with great dignity, one of the hardest challenges that they face is living with the knowledge that the Government have failed them by not holding an independent public inquiry to investigate the circumstances of the bombing and to establish where the responsibility lies for planning, directing and carrying out the atrocity. Twelve innocent people were killed in the massacre, and many more were seriously injured.

The events surrounding that fateful evening in Castlereagh will for ever be imprinted on the minds of the scores of people who escaped from the clutches of death. Some of those injured are still suffering physical pain to this day. Even those fortunate enough to walk away without a physical mark are haunted by the memories of that dreadful night.

The evening began as a night of celebration. It was a happy get-together for members of the Irish Collie Club and their friends. They had converged on the hotel from around the Province and were in a cheerful mood, looking forward to a pleasant event. They had been allocated a private function room known as the Peacock room.

[Mrs. Iris Robinson]

If ever there was an apolitical and non-denominational group, that was it. If ever there was an event devoid of any political purpose or content, that was it. Yet through the dark of that evening a group of men descended on the hotel. As they approached they would have heard the laughter from inside. They would have seen the innocent families deep in conversation, and they would have assessed the huge numbers who would be their victims.

What followed defies human understanding. To plant a conventional bomb at the hotel would undoubtedly have resulted in loss of life or at least certain injury. But the evil executioners of this terrorist act left no margin for doubt as to the outcome of their evening's work.

The terrorists strapped their explosives to two cans of petrol and attached them to the security grille over the windows of the room. They retreated under the cover of darkness, and no doubt congratulated themselves on their brave act as they journeyed home.

The massive explosion that resulted sent a sheet of burning petrol through the small function room, incinerating those in its path. In addition, the glass and materials from the explosion shredded the many helpless, innocent and unsuspecting victims.

Following the bombing, forensic experts had to use scraps of clothing, jewellery and dental charts to undertake the task of identifying many of the guests that evening, such were the heat and ferocity of the blaze.

It is hard for us to imagine tonight what it was like for the victims. The explosion sent an intense and colossal fireball of blazing petrol raging through the room. It set people alight and fuelled an uncontrollable inferno.

In the adjoining function room, known as the Gransha room, 400 members and guests of the Northern Ireland Junior Motorcycle club, including almost 100 children, were holding their annual dance, but the guests in the Peacock room took the main force of the bomb. Those who could—men and women, old and young—emerged screaming, with their hair, clothes and bodies on fire and scrambled out of the burning ruin. In addition to the many guests in the hotel that evening, there were in the region of 90 staff on the premises.

Eye-witnesses told of hotel guests with limbs blown off who must have been dead or who lay dying in the flames, which spread rapidly, as the burning petrol flowed across the floors. By the time the police received the bomb warning and set out for the hotel the doomed building was well alight.

The IRA killed 12 innocent people that night. Altogether some 33 people were injured, all suffering various degrees of burns. The number of those who to this day live with the mental scars remains unknown.

In the aftermath of the massacre, republicans sought to deflect criticism by suggesting that it had not been their intention to kill anyone and that the police were responsible for not acting on the warning. The more things change, the more they remain the same. That craven lie—blaming the police for not acting on the warning—grieves the victims.

The police investigation into the type of bomb used by the IRA found that four times the normal amount of inflammable liquid had been used. Those who planted the bomb at La Mon would have seen through the window, as they attached the bomb, that the room was full of innocent people.

The death toll included three married couples. Those murdered were Mrs. Christine Lockhart, aged 32; Mrs. Carol Mills, aged 26, and her sister-in-law, Mrs. Sandra Morris, aged 27; Mrs. Sally Cooper and her son-in-law, Thomas Neeson—Sally Cooper was 62, but I do not have an age for her son-in-law—Mr. Paul Nelson, aged 37, and his wife, Dorothy, aged 34; Mr. Gordon Crothers, aged 31, and his wife, Joan, aged 23; Mr. Ian McCracken and his wife, Elizabeth, both aged 25; and, finally, Mr. Daniel Magill, aged 37.

The minister at the funeral of Gordon and Joan Crothers, who left behind a two-and-a-half-year-old child, made the following comment:

"What makes men behave in a fashion worse than the animal creation about them? Animals kill only to eat when they are hungry and, within that law, they are clean. But when men kill in wrath, brutally and without mercy and consideration, from some misguided sense of racial hatred, then they are worse than the mad dogs. They are without mercy and deserve none in return."

I remember the evening of the La Mon bombing only too well. My husband, then a young councillor, visited the site shortly after the explosion and still speaks of the scene of devastation and horror that he witnessed and how even the experienced members of the emergency services were overcome with the enormity and the awfulness of the slaughter and carnage.

I should like to refer to a newspaper account of an interview with one survivor, Mrs. Lynette Holt, recorded in the Daily Mirror. She describes the IRA attack as follows:

"I remember a bang and seeing flames all over the dance area, someone pushed me under the table. Then the lights went out. My best friend, Christine Lockhart, was sitting next to me. I don't know what happened to her. I knew if she fell, she wouldn't get up without help because she had an artificial leg. The girl behind me was killed, and my husband, David, was blasted halfway across the room. A man came out onto the dance floor, he was completely on fire . . . like a torch. Then my husband pulled the table off me and shouted at me to come on. I put my hands out to see if I could find Christine. I wanted to drag her towards the kitchen. The smoke and flames were like plastic burning. You couldn't breath. I knew that if I didn't get out I would suffocate. I was in a pitch black cloud of smoke, and all around me were people screaming and panicking. The heat was indescribable. I felt my back was on fire."

I have given Lynette's description, although I have to point out that it is only one of many such accounts from people who suffered injury or bore the loss of a mother, father, wife, husband, son or daughter. Yet who is listening to these people? Who is allowing them to tell of their pain and suffering? Who is investigating these events and reporting on them? The Police Service of Northern Ireland tells us that the file is open, but those responsible are not even being actively pursued by the police. The families want an inquiry. The Government say that it would not be appropriate. The Minster wrote to me almost a year ago in response to my letter asking for an inquiry, and said:

"Bloody Sunday for example, was different because where the State's own authorities are concerned, the Government must be sure as it can be of the truth, precisely because in this country we pride ourselves on our democracy and our respect for the law, and on the professionalism and dedication of our security forces."

That statement might have flowed well from the Minister's pen, but it was received with astonishment by the victims who read it. This, they would tell the House, is precisely why an inquiry is needed.

The Government's policy in Northern Ireland is to place in government those who represent the organisation that carried out this attack. More than that, the distinct possibility is that a candidate for one of the top Government posts after the next election will be the man who was arrested by the police during their investigation into the bombing, and who is known to have had control over the team responsible for this outrage and carnage. The car that was used in the terrorist attack was hijacked in his area, and those brought before the courts came from his area of command. The Daily Telegraph of 20 February 1978 said in its editorial:

"One of those now being detained for questioning in connection with last Friday's murders is Gerry Adams, formerly known as the head of the IRAs Belfast Brigade and now described as an active member of provisional Sinn-Fein. If the evidence to support any specific criminal charges against this man is not forthcoming, he will presumably be released to continue in his activities. Can this, as things are now, be right?"

There are many unanswered questions and many people to be called to account. I believe that the victims of La Mon cannot simply put this chapter behind them until such time as they obtain answers to their questions. There should be no cover-ups and no one should be above the law. The police are certain that the attack was sanctioned and approved by Gerard Adams, who was then in command of those who are known to have carried it out. The extent of his involvement in the planning and directing of the attack also needs to be probed. When the Minister says that "the Government must be as sure as it can be of the truth, precisely because in this country we pride ourselves on our democracy"

I agree with her. Indeed, that is the case regarding the victims of the La Mon bombing. Do the Government not want to be as sure as they can be of the truth of La Mon before advocating that one who it is believed was intimately and directly involved in masterminding and ordering the carnage at La Mon should be placed at the head of our democratic institutions in Northern Ireland? Can the Minister imagine what it must be like for those affected by the La Mon bombing to have to live in Northern Ireland every day and to witness Mr. Adams being elevated and courted by this Government while they live with the loss that he was complicit in causing?

I am proud to say that Castlereagh borough council, of which I am a member, has supported the La Mon victims committee in all its work, including the development of its bursary scheme. The council has also dedicated a stained glass window in its council chamber to the memory of the 12 innocent victims. The words of the Ulster poet, James Hewitt, are used:

"You say the name and I see the place—La Mon."

Although I believe that today is a time for remembrance and for respecting and honouring those who were murdered, we have to do more. None of those people were military or police targets. The Provisional IRA can make no excuses. The La Mon victims were innocent, decent, respectable citizens who were out for a night of enjoyment. As hon. Members would expect, the IRA bombing of La Mon House hotel continues to cause anguish and pain to this day. Those left behind have not forgotten it, and I will certainly not forget them. It is right and proper that that crime against humanity is investigated and the truth made known. We need closure, and to stem the pain and show that the suffering has not been in vain.

As the victims prepare for the 25th anniversary of the bombing, the Government can show understanding and solidarity with them by announcing an inquiry. Frankly, the relatives and surviving victims are not asking for another farce such as the Bloody Sunday inquiry. They want a simple, legally competent inquiry that allows their questions to be directed to the relevant individuals and conclusions to be reached.

Is their pain less important than that of the relatives of Bloody Sunday? Are they citizens with lesser rights? Should not the Government take more care to ameliorate the hurt of the innocent victims of terrorism rather than pandering to and appeasing its perpetrators?

"La Mon—you say the name and I see the place."

Yet I also see the aftermath. I see the legacy of the bombing on the lives of those it touched. I see the scars on the bodies and the minds. I see the cruel loss of those who have had their loved ones plucked from them. I see the hurt and the injustice. I see decent people crying out to be heard, and those who had courage in the face of adversity now showing courage in the face of obduracy. I see a great and terrible wrong that must be put right.

In the name of those who cannot speak, I urge the Government to act.

6.22 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Desmond Browne): I congratulate the hon. Member for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson) on securing the debate. She has done us all a service by enabling the House to remember the tragic events of 25 years ago on Monday, when the La Mon House hotel was bombed. I congratulate her on ensuring that the anniversary did not pass unmarked by Parliament.

As the hon. Lady reminded us, the details of the attack on the La Mon House hotel are horrific. We recall that outrage not only with sorrow but with revulsion. For those to whom the subject is only a faint memory, it was opportune for the hon. Lady to recall the details of the event. It was clear from the manifest emotion that that engendered in her that she feels for the victims and survivors in a very personal way. The bravery that she showed in articulating the story as she did has done us a great service. It was a privilege to be present.

I intended to refer to the details, but it would be an inappropriate use of the short time that I have left. I do, however, want those present to understand that I know the details of that particularly horrific attack. Reminding myself of them in anticipation of the debate brought home to me the nature of the horror. As Minister for victims, I have had the privilege of hearing many moving stories and meeting many brave people. I would not seek to pick out any individual from among those who have survived or been hurt by this terrible tragedy, but one of the most moving stories of all was from Rita Crawford, who lost her daughter Elizabeth and son-in-law Ian McCracken in this incident. As the hon. Lady reminded us, they were just 25. They were newly married. I met Mrs. Crawford last May during the golden jubilee garden party at Loughry, and I was particularly struck by her dignity and spirit in the face of such overwhelming tragedy. She is a true heroine.

I have not yet had the privilege of meeting many more of those who were affected by the La Mon House atrocity. I am sure that they will be consistent with my experience throughout Northern Ireland: all victims and survivors of violence over the past 30 years are, in their own way, heroes. They are the people who have paid the price of the violence that has scarred Northern Ireland for the past three decades.

Mrs. Robinson: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Browne: I will just finish this point.

At this time, when there is talk of acts of completion, it is imperative that those who are involved in discussions give the victims of violence their rightful place. I will ensure that that is done. It is a pity that the hon. Lady's party is not represented in some of those discussions, especially in the implementation group for the Belfast agreement, where I intend to hold discussions with politicians in Northern Ireland about victims.

Mrs. Robinson: Is the Minister aware that, on Sunday at 2.30 pm, Castlereagh borough council will hold a service at St. Finian's church? I am sure that the families would be delighted to have the Minister in attendance, if that were at all possible.

Mr. Browne: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for the invitation. I am sure that she will understand that, because of my present responsibilities, my diary is very full. I will have to check what I intend to do this Sunday, but she can rest assured that, if it is at all possible, I will try to be there. However, I have to spend some time with my own family; I know that the hon. Lady will appreciate that, as she has a family herself. If I am unable to be there, it will be for pressing reasons, and I am sure that the hon. Lady will pass on my regards to the people who will be present. My thoughts will be with them on Sunday afternoon.

On the principal call that the hon. Lady made, I will have to disappoint her. I was not the author of the letter to which she referred. However, my fellow Minister who penned that letter gave the appropriate response at this time to the request for a public inquiry. Having listened carefully to the hon. Lady, I say to her with the greatest respect that the Government have no plans to establish a public inquiry into the tragedy at La Mon House. However, I understand the arguments that she made. In particular, I understand the reference that she made to the Bloody Sunday inquiry.

In the two minutes remaining, I want to set out in greater detail what was said in that letter. I know that the hon. Lady is a great supporter of our police force, the public prosecution system and the legal system. She holds them up, as I do, as examples of how crime should be pursued. It is because we take such pride in the police and the court system throughout the United Kingdom that we must make every effort to ensure that nothing detracts from the highest standards of behaviour in our police forces and in the administration of justice. There must be nothing questionable in their actions, nothing indefensible in their behaviour, nothing iniquitous and nothing base. That pride in the police and security forces has caused the Government to agree to investigate cases where allegations have been made against them—those very few cases where there has been cause for concern about their actions. We want to trust them; we have to trust them. We must therefore ensure that we are able to trust them. Our police and security forces must be whiter than white. That is why we have these inquiries. They are not designed to punish the police or to make comparisons between the police, the security forces and the other victims of crime. We have a different structure for dealing with such cases. The police investigate, and as the hon. Lady said, the police file is still open.

If there is additional information and evidence at this remove from the incident, it should be examined by the police. We should not set up inquiries which compete with the police investigations and which somehow suggest that there is something that the police could have done at the time. We know full well that that was not the case. Indeed, at the time, about 100 members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary were devoted and deployed to the investigation. As the hon. Lady has pointed out, 25 people were arrested, including Gerry Adams. One man was successfully prosecuted and he was given 12 life sentences for the manslaughter of those who died. As the hon. Lady will know, he served more than 15 years in jail.

It is because we rely on that structure to investigate and to prosecute that the Government do not draw the comparisons that the hon. Lady asks us to do. We do not say the same things about the police force as we say about terrorists. We rightly treat terrorists as criminals and look to the police to investigate them and the courts to punish them. Therefore, we entrust the investigation of the bombing at the Le Mon House hotel to the police.

The hon. Lady made an implication that, in my respectful submission, is not fair. I do not believe that it would be fair to the men and women of the RUC or the Police Service of Northern Ireland, who have served and who have continued to serve the people of Northern Ireland so bravely, to have them treated in the same way as we treat the other investigations that we carry out. Conversely, it would not be fair to grant to the terrorists the concern that we give to the security forces and to their standards.

I deeply regret that that is my response to the hon. Lady. We should not forget the frightful deaths at Le Mon. The House is grateful to her for giving us the opportunity to consider the issue today.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes to Seven o'clock.

Army Barracks (Deaths)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Woolas.]

9.30 am

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Hull, North): I am grateful to be called to address an issue that is of such widespread public concern. In the previous Session, 128 hon. Members of all parties joined me in signing an early-day motion calling for a public inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the deaths of four young soldiers at Deepcut barracks in Surrey. My hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Foster), one of whose constituents died, regrets that he cannot be present today and sends his apologies. The Minister knows of his interest in the case, but my hon. Friend is where I should be—at an important meeting of the Standards and Privileges Committee.

Since last October, the families of Sean Benton, James Collinson, Geoff Gray and Cheryl James have been joined in their quest for a full investigation of Army deaths by the families and friends of Paul Cochrane, Ross Collins, Richard Donkin, Tony Green, Dale Little, Aled Martin Jones, Alfie Manship, Gary Riches, Richard Robertson, Alan Sharples, David Shipley and Christopher Young. The issue goes far beyond Deepcut barracks. Young soldiers are dying needlessly in barracks in Great Britain and Northern Ireland, in Germany and Bosnia. Whatever the circumstances of their deaths, those young people joined the Army full of hope and expectations of a great career. Their families grieve for the waste of young lives. It is a matter of worry for every Army family and every hon. Member.

I wish to pay tribute to the courage of the mothers and fathers who have placed the intimate circumstances of the deaths of their sons and daughters in the public domain. I have been overwhelmed by the love that has given those families strength. The force of their determination has broken through a wall of silence. Despite their loss and profound grief, the families have told their story and acted with great dignity. They are bound by a common search for truth, but also by the conviction that it is worth persevering if other families may be spared the loss and heartache that they have suffered.

Whatever the cause of death, families in such a situation experience hardships over and above their immediate loss. In many cases, they were far away from where the death occurred and were usually excluded from the scene of the death. They have experienced great difficulties in discovering how their children died, and they felt that the Army establishment closed ranks against them. Hon. Members will be well aware that it was the pressure of the families that was instrumental in persuading Surrey police service to extend or re-open investigations into the four deaths at Deepcut barracks. I am not seeking to pre-empt the findings of that inquiry in any way.

I am pleased that the Surrey chief constable and his team have drawn from the Macpherson report and made considerable efforts to involve the relatives and their legal representatives in the investigation. Uniquely, that courtesy has also been extended to hon. Members who have expressed an interest in the outcome. It is not for the police to reach conclusions. In due course, the results of their investigation in each case will be passed, in the first instance to the Director of Public Prosecutions, if appropriate, and the coroner.

In those cases where an inquest has already been completed, it will be for the coroner to decide whether to re-open the case on the basis of fresh evidence. The chief constable is acutely aware of the public interest in the investigation and has been at pains to demonstrate the service's resolve to identify systems issues in the course of the inquiry. In the jargon of modern policing, his officers have established a "learning account" on which our colleagues on the Defence Committee, which is looking into such matters, could draw, as could a wider public inquiry.

I pay tribute to the journalists in press and broadcasting media who have encouraged the families to tell their stories and to bring the matters to the attention of the general public. I have been taken, too, by the spontaneous generosity of the experts who have given their services freely to assist the families in their search for truth. The insight of forensic specialists, legal advisers, public relations professionals and academics, as well as that of agencies such as the Commission for Racial Equality and the Equal Opportunities Commission, has been enormously important. I have benefited from the input of hon. Members from parties across the political spectrum, as well as from my own. This is not a party political matter, but a matter of national importance and interest.

I want to develop further the case for a tribunal of inquiry to be established under the Tribunals of Inquiry (Evidence) Act 1921. I believe that there is an overwhelming public interest in establishing a judicial inquiry with the powers necessary to appoint investigators, hear evidence and determine the truth. There is a feeling throughout the country, whether or not it is justified, that complacency and cover-ups are rife in the deaths and other issues. I believe that public confidence can be restored only by an inquiry whose independence is beyond doubt.

I am aware that the Ministry of Defence is not generally well disposed towards public inquiries. However, no one is looking at an inquiry on the scale of the Saville tribunal—a very necessary one in my view. A modest inquiry can satisfy the required terms of reference. I am not looking to undermine the Army or to challenge military discipline. On the contrary, an Army looking to the future has everything to gain by co-operating fully and learning from such a tribunal. I want a positive and open-minded response from the Minister. I hope that he can find words to express his support for the families of victims and understand some of the frustration that they have experienced. I trust that he can honestly acknowledge the scale of the problem and, with his ministerial colleagues, undertake to engage in a dialogue that can assist in the search for truth.

An inquiry into Army deaths must listen to all those families who have so far expressed doubt and suspicion about the death of their loved ones, and it must be prepared to hear new cases. When a fresh investigation is required, it should be conducted wholly independently of the Army and the original investigating force. The inquiry should be UK-wide and cover all sections and all ranks of Her Majesty's armed services. It should invite the views of victims and the opinions of experts. It should meet in public and publish its findings.

The inquiry needs to address two issues. First, it must examine and make recommendations concerning the environment in which the deaths are occurring, so that deaths may be prevented in future. Secondly, it must study and make recommendations that will provide a prompt and effective remedy.

On the environment in which the deaths occur, I make a number of observations. Each year, there are around 9,000 new recruits to the armed services. Up to a third of the total are child soldiers. The policy of recruiting under-18s must be re-examined. The Ministry of Defence has a general duty of care towards employees, especially when potential misuse of lethal weapons by under-18s is involved. Too many young recruits at barracks such as Catterick are dying through a lack of adequate supervision and proper pastoral care.

In October last year, the Minister responded to public pressure by asking external consultants to conduct a tri-service review of internal practices involved in initial training of non-officer recruits. However, some of the incidents went beyond the period of initial training. While we welcome the publication of new research, the transparency of the process leaves something to be desired. The families of the victims have yet to be approached for their views. According to Ministry figures, between 1984 and 2001 there were 445 recorded suicides in the armed services, which is too many, and the figure is disproportionately high for a disciplined and secure service environment.

There must be better safeguards against suicide and self-harm which provide in-house assistance independent of the chain of command. Too often, the problem has been that a person has to complain about his bullying to the person who is the bully. Military discipline and punishment must not override the protection of soldiers at risk. Doctors and welfare professionals must be given appropriate standing. They must be independent of the chain of command.

After the locum at Deepcut was asked to leave last November, I was surprised to discover that the barracks have used no fewer than 32 civilian medical practitioners in the past three years. In many regiments, there is evidence of a culture of extreme bullying, routine violence and sexual harassment that constitutes torture and inhuman and degrading treatment. Preaching zero tolerance from the sidelines is no longer enough; the perpetrators must be hunted out and prosecuted relentlessly, and such practices eliminated.

In too many cases in which criminal offences have been committed, the Army is perceived to clam up, close ranks and protect its own. It must demonstrate through exemplary action that there can be no impunity for perpetrators. Whistleblowers should be encouraged, and potential witnesses guaranteed protection. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye pointed out, the Army has taken a cavalier attitude towards coroners' inquests. Although it recorded the decisions made, it did not take notes of what took place—or at least did not keep them.

On the means by which to provide an effective remedy, at the most simple level we need effective monitoring and the provision of statistics concerning deaths, injuries and internal discipline. The pervasive culture of secrecy within the military is entirely inappropriate for modern management, and it fosters abuse. According to the Minister's headline figure, 1,748 members of service personnel have died from non-natural causes in or around barracks since 1990. It is evident that a large number of those are victims of road death, as traffic accidents have been included in the total. However, it is clear that at least 100 of those deaths were firearms-related, non-combat fatalities, but I have found it well nigh impossible to get a clear picture of how, why and in what circumstances they took place, and what disciplinary action, if any, was taken.

Bereaved families and the local media have named 23 victims at Catterick barracks, but the Ministry of Defence has been consistently unwilling to provide information that would enable the public to identify clusters of suspicious deaths. The information is not held centrally or in the form requested and, it is said, could be provided only at a disproportionate cost. I hope that public concern will cause the Minister and the Department to change their attitudes, and that the Minister can give an undertaking that he will provide such information.

If deaths are to be prevented, we should establish a complaints procedure that is independent of the chain of command. It is worth considering the case for a new body that would provide oversight. Perhaps there could be an inspectorate of the armed services. The European Court of Human Rights now insists that, in cases of death involving members of the security forces, the independence of the investigation must be structurally guaranteed. The Deepcut investigation has led to some adjustments to the standard operating procedures allowing for police primacy over investigations of suspicious deaths, but I do not believe that they go far enough. If bullying and other malpractice is to be eliminated, there is a strong argument for putting serious assaults, rape and sexual harassment of males and females under the same scrutiny, outside of the police force.

When criminal charges can be brought, there must be provision for greater public scrutiny of decisions made by the prosecuting authorities. The key to justice being seen to be done at all levels is the involvement of the families of victims at a very early date. Uniquely among the cases that I have identified, the family of Tony Green at last saw his killer prosecuted by the courts, but they had no input into the decision to charge the perpetrator with manslaughter through gross negligence. They had no involvement in the prosecutorial service and no access to information. Particularly at a time when the Government are encouraging public debate—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that he must be sensitive to matters sub judice.

Mr. McNamara: With the greatest respect, I am not questioning or challenging any verdict; I am talking about the family.

At a time when the Government encourage public debate on the introduction of a five-year mandatory sentence for the mere possession of a handgun, is the Minister surprised that the family consider that a two-year sentence adds insult to injury?

There is already a public debate about the procedures and verdicts that are available to a coroner's court, and my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye has referred to those in correspondence with the Department. However, that debate also concerns Northern Ireland. The relatives of victims of army deaths have been ill served by an inquest system that is at least 50 years behind the times. There is an issue about a coroner's powers to demand documents and to compel witnesses. There is an issue about the disclosure of witness statements prior to an inquest hearing.

There are issues about the provision of legal representation for bereaved families at public expense, the training and regulation of coroners, the role of coroner's assistants and the financial resources available to coroners. The latter is especially pressing in Northern Ireland. The shortcomings of the Deepcut inquiry have thrown up several issues relating to the practice of forensic experts. It is remarkable that there is no adequate system for the training or regulation of forensic pathologists or ballistic experts.

I have tried to give a flavour of the issues that must be addressed. I have tried to reflect suggestions and proposals put forward by the families of those most concerned. On our behalf, and looking to the future, the Army asks a great deal of its young recruits, and we have a responsibility to ensure their protection. The number of Army deaths speaks for itself. There are clear public interest reasons for establishing a tribunal of inquiry, and, to restore public confidence, that must be conducted independently under the direction of a senior judicial figure.

If the Minister is not prepared to concede my case—and those made by hon. Members of all parties—for a full inquiry, I hope that he will give an undertaking to investigate cases brought before him, to remove barriers to the free flow of information and to set out a programme of transparent measures that will address issues that are identified.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Five hon. Members are seeking to catch my eye and there are three Front-Bench spokespersons. Their wind-ups should start at 10.30 am, so hon. Members who contribute to the debate may wish to tailor their remarks accordingly.

9.47 am

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): Thank you for calling me in this debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have a clear reason for being here, and that is to highlight the case of my constituent Des James whose daughter, Cheryl Marie James, died on 27 November 1995 at the age of 18. The hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) clearly highlighted the general strategic points that relate to that case and covered the issue in general. I shall support his points and his request for action by highlighting that individual case. I do not intend to take long but by your leave, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall be specific about what happened to Cheryl James.

Cheryl James's parents are not confident about the open verdict on her death that was given at the inquest, and that is the heart of my concern. It is important to underline that the parents do not necessarily say that the open verdict was an unreasonable conclusion, but they cannot be confident that a different conclusion would not have been reached if there had been a more detailed inquiry. Des James has highlighted specific concerns that I wish to put on the record. I hope that the Minister will assure me that he takes seriously the request of the hon. Member for Hull, North and myself for an independent and extensive inquiry into Cheryl James's death and into the deaths of others.

The heart of Des James's concern is that his daughter should not have been armed and alone at the gate when she died. The Army confirmed that in a letter to him and described the procedures at the time as having been "misunderstood". In addition, it took the Army eight hours to inform Des James of his daughter's death, which is a very long time. The family did not even know the name of the camp commander in 1995, because he did not contact them. They have only recently found out that it is Nigel Barry Josling.

Mr. James is concerned about how the family were treated with regard to that crucial information. Some family members learned that Cheryl James had died by listening to the news, which shows laxity about how individuals were contacted. It is not right that people find out from the news that they have lost a close family member. Des James was not even given the opportunity to identify Cheryl. A local undertaker returned her body to the village on Friday 1 December, so for the four days following her death the family hung on to the hope that there had been a misidentification.

Nobody from Surrey police contacted the James's family or visited them at any time following Cheryl's death. The first time that the family spoke to the police was in June 2002—some seven years after the death. It is peculiar that the parents were not involved earlier. The greatest single concern, however, is that the only people to have claimed throughout that the death was a suicide were Army representatives. The board of inquiry concluded that Cheryl James committed suicide, but others are more sceptical. The James family are not saying that it was not suicide, but they feel that the evidence was not convincing. The inquest recorded an open verdict, which suggests a degree of support for that view. The James family have evidence that the Army documented the death as suicide one week before the coroner's court was convened. The family worry that there was a desire to come to that conclusion more quickly than the details of the case implied.

The procedural chaos at the time of the death is another worry. Immediately after the death, there was discussion about whether the Surrey police should be involved in the inquiry. However, the relationship between the Army and the police should be clarified. The case for an independent inquiry in all such cases is watertight. At the very least, the James family do not feel that justice was done in the public eye. There should have been a clear differentiation in the inquiry between the Army and those who decided the verdict.

The family do not understand why an apparently thorough initial investigation was completed in only two weeks, but we have already had six months of a new inquiry and it is still not complete. If I had been Cheryl James's parent, I would probably have drawn the same conclusion as Des James and asked the Army the same questions. How can the Army give me a watertight assurance that what it claims took place actually did? How can the Army assure me that there was no bullying and that there were no extraneous circumstances leading to Cheryl James's death?

I hope that I would take Des James's circumspect and measured approach in not pointing the finger of blame explicitly at the Army and by not claiming a different cause of death. His comments have been logical, objective and measured. However, I share the concern that he harbours. If he were able to speak in this debate, he would probably say, "Convince me that I have nothing to worry about and that the tragic death of my daughter was indeed a suicide. Convince me that there is not an endemic problem in the way in which our young people are treated in the Army that caused Cheryl to take her own life. Perhaps most importantly, convince me that there was not a more sinister cause of death."

Des James does not hate the Army or think that it is a corrupt or rotten institution. The Army does a difficult job and, especially in these troubled times, most people are happy to pay their taxes for the services that it provides. However, even the Army should accept that uncertainties such as the ones that we have discussed work against it in terms of recruitment and also against the interests of natural justice. The parents in these cases have a right to expect more considered and cast-iron conclusions on the deaths of their sons and daughters.

The Minister should listen seriously to the examples of Cheryl James and others, and move in the direction suggested by the hon. Member for Hull, North. An independent inquiry into the deaths would aim to provide certainty for the parents about what actually happened. The inquiry would be effective only if the Army is duty bound to provide information in an upfront, clear and non-evasive way, which it would probably be prepared to do were the mechanisms of an inquiry in place.

What is the Minister's perspective on the request for systemic change to ensure that we do not need debates such as this one to get to the truth? Is it possible to set up an arbiter or other independent inspectorate of the armed forces? In the old phrase, if people have done nothing wrong, there is nothing to fear. An inspectorate would reassure young people who are thinking of joining the Army and their parents, and the public at large, that joining the Army does not expose an individual to particular dangers and stress which could be avoided by openness.

I am pleased that the hon. Member for Hull, North secured the debate and that the Minister is willing to reply to it. Above all else, for the sake of parents and our young people joining the Army, I hope that we can make significant progress by regarding this debate as a watershed. We seek nothing more dangerous than the truth. If we find that truth, we can clear up question marks left by the past and ensure that such questions do not arise in future.

9.57 am

Sandra Osborne (Ayr): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on securing this debate and on his wider campaigning efforts with the families who have lost loved ones at such a young age. My primary aim is to raise the case of a constituent whose death occurred 11 years ago. In so doing, I am aware of the difficulties of investigating events after such a long time. However, there are striking similarities between my constituent's death and those that we have discussed, and they merit further examination.

I am adding my voice to the plea for an inquiry so that questions can be asked and, I hope, answered. As things stand, we do not know what happened in many of the cases, and that is the most frustrating aspect for the families concerned. There is a perception that there is no robust and effective mechanism in place in the Army to ensure proper scrutiny of unexpected deaths.

The Ministry of Defence and Ministers say that there has been no cover up of any sort, but that has not convinced aggrieved families, the members of which have become increasingly angry about what they regard as a failure to account for their loss. They feel let down by a general lack of concern and what they feel to be a haste to suggest suicide as an explanation and quickly draw a line under the deaths. As a consequence, many people believe that the service that these young people gave to their country has counted for very little.

Alfie Manship was a 20-year-old young man from Ayr, who died on 6 April 1992. I pay a special tribute to Alfie's mother, Jan Manship Milligan, who now lives in the USA, but who has never stopped campaigning with instinct and determination to get at the truth of her son's death. Alfie's case was raised soon after his death by Phil Gallie, my predecessor in Ayr; he was not satisfied by the answer he received and he too believes that the case should be looked at again. For a long time, Alfie's mother thought—like a number of other families—that she was fighting an individual battle. She has, however, communicated with the other families and joined their campaign. She was stunned to hear about the more recent deaths. In her own words:

"Reading the story of Private Gray's death brought shivers to my spine. You see, on 6 April 1992 my son Alfie died in exactly the same manner and I do not just mean similar—I mean exactly. He had also been on guard duty, he had two gunshot wounds to the head, both of which would have killed him outright. However, only one bullet casing was found."

Alfie died in Osnabruck barracks, Germany, but just before that he had left what is now known as Deepcut barracks, where he was bullied to the extent that he needed treatment at Aldershot hospital. By the time that Alfie reached Germany he was in a far more relaxed state of mind. According to his mother, he was coping well and had put the bullying behind him.

Mrs. Manship Milligan was informed of her son's death by a police officer and an officer from the Territorial Army in Ayr, but they could not tell her about the cause of death. She spoke, therefore, on the telephone to an officer at Osnabruck, who told her, "One bullet, one body, end of story." It had already been decided that Alfie's death was suicide and a post-mortem was carried out before his mother was informed about his death. The Minister stated, in an answer to a parliamentary question, that an internal investigation into Alfie's death had taken two weeks. In Mrs. Manship Milligan's view, however, it was clear from the officer's words that the result was a foregone conclusion. That was not just a despicable way to speak to someone who had just suffered bereavement, it was patently not the end of the story.

There are various contradictions and inconsistencies in what has been said about Alfie's death, which I believe merit investigation. It was three years before the family saw a copy of the post-mortem report. Mrs. Manship Milligan obtained a copy of that report from someone who was unhappy with the finding of suicide. At the time of Alfie's death, the Army claimed that he had been depressed and drinking heavily. It is an alarming thought that, although the Army indicated that he was drunk, he had nevertheless been handed an SA80 and sent about his duties. The fact is that the subject's body contained no alcohol or other substances, according to toxicology tests performed during the post-mortem. His hands were also free and clean, indicating that there was no gunpowder residue.

In answer to another parliamentary question, the Minister stated that Sapper Manship died from a single gunshot wound to the head while on guard duty at Woolwich barracks, Osnabruck. However, the funeral director informed Alfie's mother that there appeared to be two bullet wounds: there was a hole in his cheek and under his tongue and there was an exit wound at the top of his head, which had also been mentioned by the doctor who declared that Alfie was dead. The pathologist had advised that there was also one at the base of his skull. It appears that Alfie's weapon was not checked to ascertain whether it had been fired.

I am dwelling to some extent on the details of this case, but I could say more if time allowed. The more recent cases are under police investigation and therefore it is not appropriate to comment on the details, or to try to pre-empt an outcome.

Alfie's mother was denied an inquest in 1992 because it was deemed not to be in the public interest. The procurator fiscal in Scotland will not hold a fatal accident inquiry if a death has not occurred in Scotland. Alfie's family did not get the opportunity for these contradictions to be raised in public. There was no police investigation. I have spoken at length to Alfie's mother: she knows that re-opening his case and examining it in the context of similar deaths will not bring Alfie back, but doing so may enable her to put her son to rest at last.

If there was a sinister cause behind any of these deaths, a thorough and independent inquiry may prevent the loss of other young lives, which is extremely important. At the very least, it might restore parents' confidence that they can send their children to the Army in the knowledge that they will be safe. My hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North referred in detail to the Army's duty of care. I was pleased to hear that the Defence Committee will carry out an investigation, and I look forward to welcoming its report at the appropriate time. However, there is a case for a public inquiry that would enable an in-depth and broad report to be produced, as outlined in my hon. Friend's remit.

I have 16 years' experience of supporting the victims of bullying and harassment. I know how the abuse of power operates. I know the isolating and secretive mechanisms that are used to make it impossible—especially for what are, essentially, captive victims—to protest. The victims are left with nowhere to go if they have no confidence that action will be taken against the perpetrator, and especially if they are not believed. The families of the victims feel that they have not been believed and that they have nowhere to go. This matter is important, and it must be addressed as there is widespread concern about it.

If any parent in this Room were to have any doubts about the circumstances of their child's death, they would leave no stone unturned until they received satisfactory answers. I look forward with optimism to the Minister's response.

10.6 am

Annabelle Ewing (Perth): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on securing this important debate. I had unsuccessfully sought a debate along similar lines, and I am therefore pleased that we are able finally to discuss this distressing and disturbing issue.

There is widespread concern at Westminster and among the general public about the worryingly high number of non-combat deaths at Army barracks over recent years. We have heard in detail about the matter from the hon. Gentleman. That concern is reflected in the fact that hon. Members of all parties wish to speak in this debate and have signed the hon. Gentleman's early-day motion 63. It calls for a full and independent public inquiry into the Army deaths at Deepcut barracks and elsewhere, and it has attracted 122 signatures.

I fear that public confidence in the Army and the Ministry of Defence has been badly affected by the concerns that have come to light about the deaths at Deepcut Army barracks of four young soldiers over the past seven years, and by how the Ministry of Defence has dealt with the issue. The alarming statistics with regard to the number of non-combat deaths of soldiers at UK Army barracks has added to this increasing public concern.

The concern is increasing in my constituency. I have a constituency interest in this debate because the family of a young soldier who was found dead at Deepcut in March 2002 reside in my constituency. Their son, James Collinson, was aged only 17 when he was found dead last year. I know that his family are listening closely to the debate because they, too, seek answers to what happened to their son and to all the other soldiers.

Hon. Members will be aware that there is a continuing investigation into the four deaths at Deepcut. I do not, of course, want to say anything that could impinge on the outcome of that investigation, but the significant concerns about how the Army and the Ministry of Defence have dealt with the deaths at Deepcut and elsewhere must be aired today.

I suggest that the Army's handling of these non-combat deaths has been entirely inadequate, and that the Ministry of Defence procedures for dealing with such deaths in Army barracks raise significant concerns that can be properly addressed only by a full and independent public inquiry. The James Collinson case is one example. The Army was quick to reach the conclusion that his death was a suicide. When his father had to contact Deepcut to ascertain the status of the investigation shortly after his son was buried, an official there told him, "What investigation? One bullet, one body—draw your own conclusion." That eerily echoes the information that was given to the family of Alfie Manship. It is a disgraceful way to treat bereaved families of Army soldiers.

The Army rushed to such a conclusion even though no proper investigation or forensic post-mortem had been conducted. There had been no securing of the crime scene, as evidenced by the fact that about eight to nine months later, James Collinson's cap badge was found in the Deepcut perimeter. It had somehow become separated from his cap, which was on his head at the time of his death. Something is surely wrong with a system that allows such conclusions to be reached without any proper investigation. There would be no proper continuing police investigation if it had not been for the efforts of the Collinson family and all the other families involved. That, too, is nothing short of a disgrace.

The fact that the Collinson family had to exhume their son's body in December last year to try to secure a proper post-mortem starkly illustrates the total inadequacy of the initial approach at Deepcut. That was shortly before what would have been James Collinson's 18th birthday. It is unacceptable that the Collinson family had to go through such an ordeal. I would be interested to hear the Minister explain to us all why that had to happen. Why was there no proper post-mortem in the first place? The Collinson family and others have had to fight tooth and nail to have the deaths of their sons and daughters properly investigated. Will the Minister explain why that was so?

The Collinson family and other families involved in this sorry saga had to deal with what they regard as the MOD's excessive secrecy. There have been disturbing developments over the course of their campaign to secure justice. The Minister will know that the Surrey police recently instructed Tayside police to visit the Collinson family home to sweep for electronic bugs. That arose from concerns expressed by the Collinson family and other families. The fact that the Surrey police acted on those concerns shows how seriously the Surrey and Tayside police forces took them. The results of the sweep appear to be inconclusive. The MOD's response, which appeared in a local newspaper, The Courier and Advertiser on 27 January 2003, is somewhat curious. Its report states:

"However, when contacted by The Courier an MoD spokesperson was quick to deny the suggestion. 'This is somewhat misguided', he said. 'The army do not go round planting bugs in houses. They are subject to the same laws as everybody else. The military would not bug anyone—only the Home Secretary can sanction such an activity.'"

I find the MOD's response, as reported in The Courier and Advertiser, somewhat ambiguous, if not curious. Will the Minister reassure the Collinson family and other families that no UK Department or agency under the responsibility of a UK Department has been involved in any bugging of phones?

The hon. Member for Hull, North rightly said that the MOD has a duty of care, particularly to young soldiers in its charge. Serious questions have been raised as to whether that duty has been properly exercised. The extensive concerns now raised can be properly dealt with only by a full and independent public inquiry. I, too, welcome the Defence Committee inquiry, but it is no substitute for such a public inquiry, which is the least that the Collinson family and other families—not to mention the public at large—deserve. Basic notions of justice dictate the necessary approach.

These young soldiers joined the Army to serve their country, and the military establishment has treated their families shabbily, which is a disgrace. The circumstances surrounding the deaths of these soldiers must now be properly investigated.

Mrs. Patsy Calton (Cheadle): I, too, shall highlight a particular case, which was brought to my attention only yesterday as a result of the publicity surrounding Deepcut. I congratulate the hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on securing this important debate. I had not realised until yesterday, as I said, that a family in my constituency was affected by a much earlier case.

Paul Stanley Lowith was training in the military police in Chichester in 1978. Aged 17, he was the youngest of five orphans. His sister, who was just 20 and had recently become a mother, was aware that he was unhappy, and she suspected that he was being bullied. She thought that his mood was strange because he was used to being away from home; like the rest of the family, he had been to boarding school.

All his sister knows is that one night, her 17-year-old brother allegedly took some live ammunition shells, went to the Army firing range and shot himself. The family was told that he committed suicide. His funeral was given full military honours and his military records were sealed for 30 years. The family requested a copy of the death certificate and the coroner's report, neither of which was made available to them.

I have already said enough for everyone to realise that several questions need to be answered. This was a young man without a mother and father, whose guardian believed that the Army would make him a man. Bullying may well have taken place, or perhaps the official version of his death is correct. The truth is that the family do not know, but no evidence was presented to support the official view.

I spoke to the young man's niece on the phone this morning. She is now in her 20s and spoke about the culture of secrecy. The Army, as an institution, must open up and fully answer the families' questions. The world has changed in the past 25 years. This family must know what happened to their brother and they need to have confidence in the information that they were given. For their own peace of mind, they need closure on the issue. Young men and women joining the Army need to know that it can deal with these cases openly, in a way that is subject to public inspection. They and their parents should have confidence that they will be afforded the care that we have heard about in the debate.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I welcome the opportunity to follow the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mrs. Calton), who said that things have changed in the past 25 years, as all of us recognise when we look at what is happening in society. Although there may be a place for measures to train young soldiers for what they may have to face, people will not accept bullying as part of that system.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on securing the debate. On opposite sides of the House, we often spar, but we are at one on this matter: we both want the best for our armed forces and their families.

Paul Robert Cochrane died in July 2001. I had a visit shortly afterwards from his senior officer, who assured me that there was no bullying in the forces. As I served in the Army cadets and have known a number of people in the services over the years, I took that with a pinch of salt. However, it must be put in the context of the publicity. As the hon. Member for Ayr (Sandra Osborne) said, we were told that a person was killed with one bullet, yet there was evidence that there were other bullets. That is the most remarkable form of suicide I have ever come across. These matters must be faced with much more realism than they have been.

I am the Member of Parliament for the constituency adjacent to that in which the Cochranes live. I have met them; they were in touch with me early in the proceedings. They continued the campaign with my colleague in the Northern Ireland Assembly, Sir Reg Empey, and with our defence spokesman, my hon. Friend the Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson). We must face issues, or we will not be able to give people satisfactory answers.

I have copies of Ministry of Defence answers to colleagues which remind me of a sermon that I read in my early ministry; it was well set forth, but there was no life in it. I discussed the sermon with some senior colleagues, including the man who delivered it, who said, "Yes, you missed the thunder and the lightning—the atmosphere." Those in the Ministry of Defence who responded to the letters missed the atmosphere of Mr. Cochrane's telephone conversation with his son, who told him about being bullied, which is on tape. Then came the sound of the shot, as the young man committed suicide.

The Ministry of Defence does not say that the young man did not commit suicide, but it wants to discover what drove him to such a situation, and there are no answers that will satisfy anyone. In one answer, it states that it cannot say anything because the Police Service of Northern Ireland and the Royal Ulster Constabulary were involved in the investigations. The nation of Northern Ireland has discovered latterly that there has been interference in police investigations; therefore, it is rather suspicious to say that the matter was investigated by the PSNI if no satisfactory evidence has been brought forth. Can the Minister tell us when the board of inquiry is likely to complete its investigations and say whether it has informed the Cochranes of its latest view? Unless there is a public inquiry into the pattern of the deaths, there will be no real satisfaction, and we will hinder proper recruitment for the Army.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We have 36 minutes left. It would be reasonable and equitable for each Front-Bench spokesperson to take no more than a third of that time.

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall): I shall not take long to make my remarks because it is clear that this morning there is unanimity across the parties, not only in the early-day motion, but in Members' contributions.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on securing this important debate, and I pay tribute to the families, whose perseverance and fortitude in ensuring that the issues are on the public agenda have enabled them to be addressed in the open way that we all want. It is now for the Ministry of Defence to respond in a similar fashion, as it must want to ensure that the deaths are properly investigated and that lessons are learned for the future.

The Army's equal opportunities statement declares:

"We have zero tolerance of any form of prejudice, harassment or bullying."

However, the Army's words do not always match up to its efforts. The MOD has a steep hill to climb when 43 per cent. of troops believe that bullying and harassment are rife and over 5 per cent. have been victims of such abuse. The focus of this debate has naturally gravitated towards the Deepcut cases. The issue is not just the questionable verdicts of suicide and the deaths of soldiers, but why questions were not automatically asked when such a high suicide rate among young soldiers at one Army base was recorded.

It is almost impossible to believe that that did not raise questions about the circumstances of the tragic deaths. Why was not better care taken of the young recruits? What resources, such as counselling and contacts with non-military welfare organisations, were available to them, if they needed them to cope with the stress of Army life? I welcome the investigation by the Surrey constabulary, but will the Minister assure us that all the evidence secured by the investigation will be available to the families and their representatives, so that they can draw their own conclusions?

The MOD reports that, over the past five years, there have been 93 deaths recorded with an open verdict or as suicide. The fact that the families of 40 of those service personnel are now threatening legal action surely reflects a huge dissatisfaction with, and distrust of, Army protocol and procedure. That must be addressed, and I am sure that the Minister will agree once again that perception matters. We need to ensure that the matters are fully investigated and the findings made public.

The position of the military police, the constabulary and the coroner must be clarified. I say that because in recent years there have been two questionable suicide verdicts in my constituency, although not, I hasten to say, at Army barracks or a military centre. However, those verdicts have raised many questions about the relative responsibilities of the police and the coroner and the way in which families are able to engage in the process with the coroner. When one adds the further significant contribution of the military police and the MOD to that already difficult situation it amplifies the need for clarification. I know that the Government are already examining coroners' courts. I hope that as part of that review they will take into account the issues surrounding these cases, and the way in which coroners' courts act in conjunction with the police and the military police. That is an area of civilian life that needs to be sorted out and clarified.

There should also be a review of the support services available to soldiers. Life is stressful enough, and when we recruit young soldiers, particularly those under 18, we have a particular responsibility to ensure that their welfare is looked after. Our soldiers must be in no doubt that the Army and the MOD are right behind them and will defend their interests in every circumstance. It is clear that many soldiers feel unable to discuss or even to raise issues of personal safety with anyone, and that they often suffer in silence.

I also recommend an urgent review of the way in which contact is made with families. We heard some distressing stories about the way in which families are advised of the tragic deaths of their loved ones. That seems to be done in a very cold-hearted way. Regrettably, that was also part of the clarification needed in the cases of civilian deaths that I spoke about earlier.

Families should be engaged at a very early stage. They have rights concerning attendance at post-mortems and what happens after a suspected questionable death, but many families do not realise that they have such rights. Unfortunately, many are not advised of their rights until much later, and by that time they cannot make a valid contribution or become part of the process. That situation needs to be urgently reviewed, so that when the fact of a death is relayed, families are counselled and made aware of their rights.

These are tragic cases. Many of the contributions this morning have been very disturbing. If average members of the public were here listening to the debate, they would want to raise many of the issues that the families are raising. I believe that the families and the general public want answers. Questions have been raised about what happens in our Army barracks and military centres, and the MOD should take the opportunity not only to give its answers through a public inquiry, but to ensure that real lessons are learned. It must ensure that the Army lives up to its statement, which I read at the beginning, that it has "zero tolerance of any form of prejudice, harassment and bullying."

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on his persistence in the matter, and on bringing it to the attention of the House. He is nothing if not tenacious. I also congratulate those hon. Members who have spoken, some very movingly, about the particular circumstances affecting their own constituents.

No one who has any knowledge of these matters can have anything but the deepest sympathy with the families, not just those who are in the public eye at present, but others who are grieving privately and quietly. There can be no greater tragedy in life than to lose a child who is just embarking on what would have been their career, and we take the matter very seriously. However, in a sense the debate is somewhat premature because, as has been mentioned, the Surrey police inquiry is under way. It is difficult for any of us to comment while that is so, although it provides us with an opportunity to put on record concerns, some of which have been expressed publicly, and some of which have not.

I come to the debate double-hatted, as I am both Vice-Chairman of the Select Committee on Defence and a shadow Defence Minister. For the assistance of the House, I shall mention what the Select Committee said about the matter in a press release last summer:

"The Committee is concerned by events at Deepcut barracks. We are aware, however, that police inquiries are continuing. We have no wish to cut across or interfere with those inquiries. We believe that there are grounds for a Defence Committee inquiry into conditions at Deepcut. We will decide on the scope and nature of that inquiry once the police inquiries are complete."

That, I hope, puts the record straight on what the Committee has decided to do about the issue.

It is important that the military recognises its duty of care to those in its charge. However, we should be quite clear that we are preparing young men and women to take their place in an army trained for combat. That means that training has to be rigorous, and that is more difficult in today's society than it was 20 or 30 years ago, or even, dare I say it, when the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Joyce) was enlisted in the Army. Fewer people live away from home today. On a recent visit to Catterick, we went to the rehabilitation centre, where those with broken bodies, leg injuries, fractures and so on were being rehabilitated, because today's young people are not the same as those who previously joined the armed forces. That is not a criticism of them; it just means that the Army has to adjust.

Lembit Öpik: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is not suggesting that a culture of bullying or impropriety would be justified on the basis that we needed to train our young people.

Mr. Howarth: I do not think that anything I said could possibly be construed in that fashion, and certainly that was not my intention.

It is important to put the statistics in context. Figures from the Library show that in 1994 there were 19 suicides in the Army. That is the equivalent, at a rate per million, of 154. That compares with an overall United Kingdom average among males aged 15 to 24 of 115. In the most recent year for which figures are available, 1999, the number of suicides in the Army had fallen to five, which equates to a rate of 45.6 per million. That compares with a UK average of 106 among males aged 15 to 24. The figures show that the Army is conscious of the need to address the issue, and has done so with some success.

The hon. Member for Hull, North mentioned the learning account initiative, which I understand is under way, in tandem with the police inquiry that has been undertaken. The police are giving the Army information from their inquiry to date, and they are telling it some of the things that they think it could usefully learn from the inquiry. The Army should examine two issues. First, it should consider the risk of bullying because it is completely unacceptable that a young person, or anyone, should be subject to bullying.

The Army must also consider the question of unhappiness. I was encouraged when I visited Catterick and talked to the young recruits. I asked whether they would know if one of their fellow recruits was unhappy and whether they would rally round. To a man and woman—boy and girl—they responded, "Of course we would." We should not underestimate young people's capacity to be aware of difficulties faced by their peers. I spoke to the brigadier in charge of the recruit centre at Catterick who said that the Army is trying to find ways of being more proactive in recognising the signs of potential unhappiness.

As other hon. Members said, the Army must consider who has unsupervised access to weapons. That is important, and the Army need not wait for the outcome of an inquiry but could undertake such consideration immediately.

The services need a better system of family liaison. Individual cases cited by hon. Members today show that there has been inadequate liaison between the Army and families after a tragedy. The Army must get to grips with that and ensure that there is better liaison. Part of the problem is that the Army Training and Recruiting Agency covers a tremendous number of young people. The hon. Member for Hull, North said that there are 9,000 recruits a year, which is a fantastic turnover. After the recruits have finished their training, they go to a regiment, corps or unit. They are nurtured, and an esprit de corps exists, but that is not prevalent in a large training establishment such as Catterick, so more needs to be done.

Mention was also made of the need to maintain barrack-by-barrack statistics to determine whether problems are clustered—I think that that word was used earlier—and whether specific problems exist at specific barracks. The Ministry of Defence said that it would be expensive to collate that information, but I find that difficult to accept. That is one step that could be taken to help to tackle the problem that we face.

Mr. McNamara: Would the hon. Gentleman accept that what made me pursue this course of action was the fact that the Ministry of Defence kept no records of how, why, where and when these events occurred that it was prepared to give to the House or hon. Members in answer to questions?

Mr. Howarth: The Minister will undoubtedly want to address that.

The Army has taken several steps, and I have described some. I understand that there has been much greater clarification of procedures to be followed in the event of a death in barracks. The original standing order was ambiguous, and I understand that there is a new one that clearly provides primacy for the local police force, not for Army investigators. That will be welcome.

I do not believe that the Army is uncaring. On the contrary, it has a vested interest in being seen by young people and their parents as a good employer that cares for those in its charge. Given the need to recruit 9,000 people a year, the Army must recognise that if it does not have a reputation for being a good employer and for caring about people's personal development, it will not get those recruits.

The Army has made it clear that it is recruiting people in a narrow pool. Thankfully, there is limited unemployment in this country, so it is having to compete against all types of employer for its recruits. The position could not have been put better than by my noble Friend, Brigadier Lord Vivian, when he wrote to Lord Bach in June last year:

"I believe that it is a matter of great regret on the part of all concerned for the good name of the Armed Forces that the Ministry of Defence and the Army have failed to respond to this series of incidents by volunteering sufficient and timely information in each case . . . This is the sort of case that can affect recruiting and retention, especially if the general public start to think that The Army is a poor employer and does not care for its men and women, which you and I know has no foundation."

That is why all of us have a vested interest in ensuring that the lessons are learned from the recent tragedies.

In a newspaper article in The Sunday Telegraph, an MOD official was quoted as saying,

"we will publicly accept mistakes were made in the way the tragic deaths of these soldiers was handled."

What plans does the Minister have to ensure that those mistakes are not repeated? Are lessons other than those to which I have referred being taken on board today? It has been widely reported that the Army has responded to the deaths with an investigation into how suicides can be prevented. Can the Minister confirm that? Have any preliminary conclusions been reached? Can he confirm that, from now on, the police will investigate all similar deaths?

I have received a letter from a Lieutenant-Colonel Tinckler, a consultant surgeon in the Royal Army Medical Corps volunteers. Mention was made earlier about the number of medics at Deepcut. I accept that today's debate is about not only Deepcut but other barracks, but the lieutenant-colonel was dismissed from his post as a locum after only two days of a one-month contract, without being given a reason. Does the Minister have any information on the matter which he can share with us? Can he say something about the provision of medical care at barracks throughout the country?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Dr. Lewis Moonie): I should make it clear at the outset that I have recently taken over all training, personnel and welfare functions from my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Defence, with the exception of the Deepcut inquiry. He has been involved in that for some time, so we both felt it appropriate for him to deal with it until the end of the investigations.

I am grateful for the chance given to me by my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) to make general points and reply to the debate. As Members are well aware, the Surrey police investigations into the deaths of the four soldiers at Deepcut remain ongoing and will not conclude until early March. I cannot pre-empt the results of those investigations, nor will I comment on matters that are related directly to them, other than to say that it is my belief that the Army has co-operated fully with Surrey police during the inquiries and continues to do so.

In addition, Mr. Frank Swann, the independent ballistics expert employed by the soldiers' families, has been given full access to each of the sites where the incidents occurred so that he can conduct his investigation. I assure Members at the outset that all their points will receive my careful consideration and, when appropriate, a written reply. I also assure them that any warranted changes in procedure will be made. I make no mistake about that.

My ministerial colleagues, the Army chain of command and I are well aware of the interest that has been expressed by the House, the media and the general public, particularly over the past 12 months, in the number of deaths of Army personnel resulting from non-combatant injuries sustained in Army barracks and elsewhere. While that has, understandably, centred on the deaths of the four soldiers at Princess Royal barracks, Deepcut, it is acknowledged that some concerns expressed have wider implications for the Army as a whole, as is illustrated by the cases that Members have raised today.

I recognise that every death in the Army, however caused, is a personal tragedy that has a devastating impact on the partners and families of those concerned. It is a sad fact of life that non-natural deaths occur in all walks of life. Non-combatant deaths in the Army, and indeed the armed forces as a whole, are no exception. The Army's approach is to be constructive and proactive—to minimise, through training, education and welfare support, the likelihood of incidents occurring that may result in loss of life, and to ensure that, when such incidents happen, lessons are learned to minimise the possibility of them occurring in the same way in future.

While parliamentary and media attention over the past few months has primarily focused on the incidence of alleged suicide in the Army, it must be placed properly in perspective. In doing so, I believe that it is rather arbitrary to make a distinction between the deaths of Army personnel in barracks and elsewhere. Not all deaths that occur in barracks are the result of suicide, as accidents and injuries resulting from training activities also make up a proportion of the total. Similarly, not all incidences of suicide among Army personnel occur in the barrack environment.

Statistical information provides the basis for analysing the number of Army non-combatant deaths due to injury. Substantial work has been undertaken over the past few months to refine that data and bring reporting in line with the Office for National Statistics. The most recently available statistics from January 2003 show that there were 1,763 deaths of Army personnel due to non-combatant injury from 1984 to 2001. That represents the total of deaths through injury, irrespective of how they were caused, where they occurred and whether the individuals concerned were on or off duty. Of that total, 276 were awarded a coroner's verdict of suicide. A further 49 were recorded as open verdicts and 41 still await a coroner's verdict. Of those 366 deaths, 29 individuals were aged 18 or under.

Comparison with the wider civilian population is complicated by the different age and gender mix of the armed forces. In particular, the armed forces have a lower proportion of females compared with the civilian population. That is allied to the fact that females have a lower propensity to take their own lives than males. Allowing statistically for those differences, published research shows that the suicide rate and deaths subject to open verdicts are broadly comparable between Army personnel and the population at large.

Mr. Breed: Does the Minister accept that the statistics are spread throughout the country on an averaged basis? Our concern is the number of deaths at a particular place. If they had occurred in a town or a village, it would have been recognised that something had to be done.

Dr. Moonie: Speaking as an epidemiologist, which I was in my previous incarnation, I should correct the hon. Gentleman's misconception on the distribution of conditions. It is natural for clusters to occur. If clusters did not occur, I would be suspicious about any condition. When checking information on vital statistics, it is important that we check them carefully against the experience in the rest of the population and that we use standardised methods, whenever we can. Only then can we honestly tell whether something is worthy of special note, as opposed to the attention that should be given to any case of non-natural death. With that proviso, it is important that we use the best available standard of scientific information. We have reallocated our cases according to nationally accepted guidelines.

The incidence of suicide and open verdicts in the Army is lower than in the civilian population in the 24-to-39 age group and broadly similar in the 20-to-24 age group, but higher in the 16-to-19 age group. Although the available figures permit a broad comparison with the wider civilian population at this time, the information must be treated with caution for the reasons that I have outlined. The Ministry of Defence is working with the Office for National Statistics, the General Register Office for Scotland and the General Register Office for Northern Ireland to produce a more detailed and refined comparison.

The Army Individual Training Organisation—now known as the Army Training and Recruiting Agency—has come under particular scrutiny as a result of the reporting of events at Deepcut. Fourteen soldiers undergoing initial training died within the categories of suicide and open verdict in the 21 years between 1982 and 2002. A further case—that of Private James Collinson, which has been raised—is still awaiting a coroner's inquest. The Army and the Ministry of Defence share the sense of loss that each of the families feel in such circumstances, and recognise that it is made more acute by the fact that many individuals concerned had been living away from the family home for only a short period.

It is also fully understandable that the families look to the Army to take care of their loved ones, and that they seek to understand all the circumstances surrounding such regrettable events. Nothing can take away the pain, grief and sense of loss that they experience when such things happen. However, the number of deaths must be put in context. During the period in which those 15 deaths occurred, 250,000 soldiers passed through basic training.

Broader concerns have been raised about initial training in the armed forces. On 17 October 2002, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State announced to the House that he had commissioned a special review of the initial training of all non-officer recruits in each of the three services. That work is being undertaken independently of the service and its respective commands, and my right hon. Friend will be in a position to make an announcement to the House on the findings of the review in due course.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North raised a further specific concern about the incidence of death in barracks as a result of injuries sustained from firearms. Although we are especially concerned about that—in particular, with regard to young soldiers on guard duty—the majority of deaths and suicides do not result from firearm-inflicted injuries.

Firearm injuries are responsible for under a third of all suicides and open verdicts, although the incidence of those in the Army is significantly higher than in the civilian population because of the ready access to weapons. The risk to the individual must always be balanced against the need for the Army to undertake operational and other security duties. We carefully examine such matters. We have been studying this one closely, and we will continue to do so to see whether other changes in procedure can be made that will lessen the chance of such deaths occurring.

Mr. McNamara: Will my hon. Friend undertake that no recruits under the age of 18 will be left alone with Army munitions or guns and so forth, and that that will not be left to the discretion of the camp commander?

Dr. Moonie: On that, I can say that I will take any action that is necessary to ensure that good practice is observed at all times, as I will with regard to bullying. We adopt an attitude of zero tolerance to bullying. A training regime may be felt to be quite harsh by people who come out of it and those who go into it from a domestic environment, but there is a difference between being harsh and rigorous in training to produce good soldiers and bullying, which is totally unacceptable to my ministerial colleagues and I, and to all the senior officers I have spoken to. Any further changes that need to be made will be made to maximise the chance of being able to report bullying and get rid of it, wherever possible.

As usual, time is catching up with me. In summary, commanders at all levels in the Army deeply regret all incidents that result in loss of life, however those might have occurred, and they take very seriously their duty of care towards those for whom they have responsibility, in respect of training and procedures. We have tried to enable soldiers to undertake activities while minimising the dangers involved.

Wild Birds

11 am

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): It is a pleasure to be here this morning, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

This debate started in an unusual way. I was shocked last weekend when Grace, my five-year-old—like all five-year-olds, she knows everything that there is to know about nature and wildlife—asked, "Daddy, what is a starling?" It occurred to me that she had never seen a starling. These birds were once regarded as pests and they were all over the place when I was a kid. However, it struck me that in our small garden at home in Nottingham we have seen neither a starling nor a sparrow, although wood pigeons, blue tits and robins have passed through, and we were thrilled to see a weasel last week. Birds that were common a decade ago seem to be disappearing, even from the acute radar screen of a five-year-old. Alarm bells began to ring, and I thought about the thrushes, blackbirds and many other species that are going missing. The purpose of the debate is to ask the Minister, "What can we collectively do about it?"

We have recently debated the common agricultural policy, and I would certainly hold the Minister tightly accountable on that issue. On this occasion, however, I look to him to give us a few lines on what we can do together to revive some of the species of urban wild birds. Wild bird numbers matter in their own right, but they can also be regarded as a thermometer with which to test the environmental health of the United Kingdom. To their credit, the Government are using breeding bird populations as one such thermometer, and it is obvious from reading it that the UK environment is running a bit of a temperature.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North): My hon. Friend will remember that five or six years ago my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister used starlings to monitor environmental pollution. Perhaps my hon. Friend will induce the Minister to tell us how that survey progressed. It was interesting that the starling was picked as a disappearing bird that could reflect what was happening to its environment.

Mr. Allen: My hon. Friend the Minister is well known as a starlingist in government circles, and I am sure that he will tell us about that survey.

During the past 30 years, the numbers of certain birds have drastically declined. The numbers of some thrushes are down by 57 per cent., skylarks are down by 52 per cent., great partridge numbers are down by 58 per cent. and some of our closest neighbours at home have suffered too—starling numbers are down by 71 per cent. and house sparrows are down by 62 per cent. These declines are catastrophic. If we were talking about white rhino or panda populations, everyone would rightly be up in arms. This is happening in the UK, and although the most recent surveys show a modest recovery of common birds since 1998, especially woodland birds, there is still a continuing downward trend in respect of farmland birds.

To pick up on the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), perhaps the Minister will take this opportunity to bring hon.

[Mr. Allen]

Members up to date on the state of research. What research is being conducted, what have the researchers reported and what is in the pipeline? We need to know why woodland and urban birds, and especially the house sparrow, have vanished from many of their former haunts. The decline in sparrow numbers has been so steep that many people have commented on the situation. The Independent, to its credit, ran a campaign to save our sparrows in order to bring the trend to the attention of the public. There has also been a lot of publicity in greater London that is intended to generate public awareness.

As far as I can tell, no one knows the reason or reasons for the disappearance of sparrows, although it is evident throughout the country from Liverpool to Glasgow, London and my own city of Nottingham. Many explanations have been proffered. Perhaps the Minister can synthesise the current thinking on which is the most likely and perhaps add some further suggestions. The current explanations are as follows: that pollution is killing off small insects and even young sparrow chicks; that there is predation by an ever greater number of cats and birds such as sparrow-hawks and magpies; that there is a lack of suitable nesting nooks and crannies in modern buildings—certainly the highest number of sparrow nests were in buildings and houses dating back to at least 1919—and that the use of pesticides by domestic gardeners, as well as those that we are used to being used on farmland, may reduce the availability of insects.

I spoke to Friends of the Earth this morning. Its representatives talked about a noticeable reduction in aphid numbers and, because of the use of slug pellets, a reduction in other bird foods that would normally be available in domestic gardens. As well as telling us what research is in the pipeline, will the Minister bring together some of the answers as to why there is a clear decline in the number of urban birds?

Dr. Gibson: I wonder whether we might induce the Minister to reflect and pronounce on articles that suggest that radiation from telecommunication masts may have some effect on sparrows. I do not see sparrows using mobile phones, so the masts must be the problem. It may sound trivial, but the environment can change rapidly and have effects on animal life. Does the Minister take this claim seriously?

Mr. Allen: Indeed. In a previous debate we touched on the common agricultural policy, which because of its subsidy regime has undoubtedly contributed to predation of bird populations throughout Europe, not only in farming areas but also in urban contexts. When the Minister goes invigorated—as I know he will be—from our debate to seek further reform of the CAP, I hope that he will feel that he has the massed ranks of bird lovers at his side as he tries to resolve some of the knottier issues. They do not affect only householders and farmers; they have a drastic impact on wildlife in general and wild birds in particular.

I hope that my hon. Friend will seek to use the good work carried out by him and his Department in respect of farmland birds and to point that effort also at urban wild birds. The Government have done a great deal—I commend them for that—and I am sure that he will give us a list of things that they are doing. A great deal is also being done by the voluntary sector. Perhaps I may focus on what is happening in my own county. In Nottinghamshire, the wildlife trust is working closely with farmers and the farming wildlife advisory group to advise them on how to manage their land more sympathetically given the current crisis.

At Attenborough in Nottinghamshire, the trust is creating reed beds for the endangered bittern. The Sherwood Initiative, thanks to a lottery heritage fund, is working towards restoring Sherwood forest as a stronghold for the woodlark and nightjar. The Nottinghamshire wildlife trust is working with a variety of farmers, local authorities and the Environment Agency to restore habitats along the Trent valley. Wet marsh land is being created for lapwings and waders, reed beds for bittern and marsh harrier, and shallow water to create habitats for thousands of wildfowl and waders.

This has knock-on benefits because we can combine enhanced amenities for birds with economic regeneration and the establishment of sustainable flood defences. That focus is clearly on farmland birds. I seek to draw the Minister not necessarily away from them but into a broader focus to encompass the urban bird population as well.

There are some greater problems that I do not have time to mention. Certainly, we should commend the Government's effort to slow and check global warming. If left unchecked, it will have catastrophic effects on all species, including human beings. However, in the medium term, we must plan for the impact of climate change, which is likely to alter the mix of species in the United Kingdom, with some habitats moving northwards and the complete loss of other habitats due to the rise in sea levels.

Bird habitats in the UK are highly fragmented and often isolated, which means that it is more difficult for species to shift naturally if their habitats migrate. The Government should consider that as part of their land use and development policies. The combination of rising sea levels and hard sea walls leads to coastal squeeze with habitats such as inter-tidal mud flats and salt marsh often being lost to the sea because they cannot move inland past artificial man-made barriers. In turn, that has an impact on the numbers of wintering wading birds such as red shank, curlew and wildfowl, including Brent geese and widgeon, for which the UK is internationally renowned.

Wildlife and wild bird numbers in the UK tell us much about the health of our environment. They also matter to those who elect us. I do not need to talk crude electoral politics to my hon. Friend the Minister because although it is part of his Departmental brief, his heart also in the issue. However, it may serve a purpose to remind Ministers and other Members that the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds has more than a million members, a figure for which any of the parties represented in the House would be most grateful.

Given the importance of the issue, can the Minister assure us that the Government will specifically investigate the plight of urban wild birds, especially the fate of the sparrow, to try to get to the bottom of the decline in numbers and to find solutions to the problem? Do the Government intend to use planning legislation to protect birds?

Rather than this issue being an aside in diary columns or a funny piece in newspapers, I hope that it is mainstreamed, which I believe is the Minister's intention. There should be a public campaign led by the Government to alert farmers and town dwellers about the problem of the decline in wild bird numbers and to recruit us all to assist with solutions.

I do not want to sound like a "Blue Peter" presenter, but we would welcome the Minister's advice on nesting boxes, the sort of food that householders can supply to assist bird populations and other hints of that type. I do not know whether I should embarrass the Minister by asking whether he has a bird box at his Department or in his garden, but, knowing him, he has several.

Advice on avoiding the use of pesticides should be given across the range to householders and gardeners who care about their environment but may unwittingly add to the problem. They need to grow more shrubs and trees to provide more habitats for the insects that birds feed on.

We are all enthralled when we see David Attenborough on television creating brilliant and beautiful documentaries about the global ecology featuring whales or primates, such as in Sunday's episode. They are riveting to us all. This environmental crisis, however, is literally in our back yard. I hope that the Government agree that this problem is one that they need to address. They need to gather all the different layers of UK society together into one family—farmers, ordinary householders, Members of Parliament and the voluntary sector, which is working so hard on the problem. The Government have some great ideas, especially about farmland birds. With a great public campaign, we may see the revival of some of the species that were once commonplace in our back yard.

11.14 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Elliot Morley): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) on securing the debate, and on the knowledgeable and enthusiastic way in which he presented the issue of bird populations in this country and the undoubted problems that many of them face, which the Government acknowledge. He is right that, with about one million members, the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds is the largest conservation body in Europe, which illustrates the wide public interest in issues such as birds and conservation.

Dr. Gibson: Will the Minister give credit to the work of the British Trust for Ornithology of Thetford in Norfolk, whose news is regularly distributed to many Members? It works in isolation, in some ways, although Norfolk is a great county—a mecca, indeed—for many birds. My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North has visited it several times to see the migratory bird life.

Mr. Morley: I am happy to compliment the work of the BTO, which works for the Department and undertakes a great deal of scientific analysis. Indeed, I shall say a few words about that organisation, as I had the privilege of launching a joint BTO-RSPB woodland bird study at Thetford not very long ago. I should say for the formal record that I am a member of the BTO, the RSPB and various other conservation organisations.

My hon. Friend raised the issue of the decline of starlings and house sparrows. They were once common birds, but their numbers have seriously declined over the past 25 years. The starling is now on the red list of high conservation concern. Its numbers declined by 65 per cent. between 1970 and 1998. Recent research by the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs shows that over the past 30 years, house sparrow populations have declined most in the south-east of England. Urban and suburban gardens have seen the most marked fall. In contrast, however, the good news is that they are thriving in urban and rural areas in Scotland and Wales, and there has been a slight increase in populations.

House sparrow breeding, however, has fallen from about 12 million pairs to fewer than 7 million. About 60 per cent. are found in rural and urban gardens. There is no doubt that a combination of factors account for the decline, such as food source and food availability, including for the young, and nesting availability. House sparrows, in particular, nest in old buildings. These days, farm buildings are much tidier and more modern, and modern houses are insulated and draught-proof. It is believed that insulation has denied nesting to house sparrows and starlings.

As my hon. Friend mentioned, pesticide use has had an impact on the availability of seeds and insects. Predation is also a factor, although separate studies of sparrow-hawk predation indicate that it is unlikely to have affected these populations, as sparrow-hawk populations and those of many other birds of prey declined significantly in the 1960s due to the use of pesticides. I am glad to say that many of these species have shown a recovery, but populations are much dictated by food availability. Interestingly, principal prey for sparrow-hawks, such as woodland birds, has increased over the same period, so there is no evidence that they are having a detrimental impact.

My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North asked about the theory of increased telecommunication use and telecommunication masts. I have heard that theory, and have discussed it with some of our scientists. It does not stand up to examination. In Paris, for example, the house sparrow population has not declined. I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that the French are no less averse to using mobile telephones in Paris than in any other city in the United Kingdom. They might, in fact, be a little keener. I do not believe that there is a correlation between mobile telephone masts and the decline of sparrows. It seems more complicated than that. A study is being conducted by several organisations. The BTO common bird census provides an invaluable database for observing trends in British birds. The Joint Nature Conservation Committee is examining the research and will produce recommendations on the problem of house sparrows.

Mr. Allen: I want to underline the Minister's personal reputation on, and commitment to, this subject, not only while he has been a Minister, but since he first walked through the portals of this place. Whenever we received queries about the subject, we always referred to him, even before he secured his current exalted position. I will not go into the stories of the Minister doing bird imitations in Committee, because I know that you want me to get on with my point, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

When does the Minister think that the committee is likely to report?

Mr. Morley: I do not have the details on that, but I will write to my hon. Friend. Indeed, he may want more details on what is being done about house sparrows, so I will arrange for that to be done, too.

My hon. Friend asked what the public can do to support birds generally, and house sparrows in particular. Many people feed wild birds in their gardens, which is important, especially during the winter as it means fewer mortalities and a larger potential breeding population in the spring. It is sometimes useful to provide food throughout the summer for supplementary feeding, and water availability is important.

It appears that nesting sites are a factor for the house sparrow. Many people are keen on nest boxes, and my hon. Friend asked what I do. I have a range of nest boxes in my garden—I think that I have seven. They are designed for a range of species including tits, and I have open-fronted nest boxes for robins and two colonial nest boxes that are designed for sparrows. I have my personal biodiversity action plan on tree sparrows in my garden, as I am trying to establish a breeding colony. I have established a wintering flock in a feeding station in my garden, and they are colonial nesters, so I have two boxes of three, which is like a little tenement block for sparrows.

The difference with house sparrows that most people do not understand is that they have a problem with nest boxes. Most nest boxes that people buy are for blue or great tits. That is understandable, as people like to see them in their gardens, but the holes are generally too small for sparrows, and if one wants to encourage breeding sparrows in nest boxes, one needs a larger entrance hole. The boxes are easy to make, and they can be bought. I have specialist boxes and know that as part of several studies into sparrows, suitable boxes have been erected with considerable success. I know that one farm has a line of them and, with it, a successful colony of house sparrows, so the boxes are significant for populations. I also have boxes for breeding tawny owls and artificial house martin nests. I have perhaps gone a bit overboard on boxes, but most of them are occupied and effective.

DEFRA has committed £600,000 to the woodland bird study, which has already received contributions from English Nature and the Forestry Commission. The study is being carried out by the RSPB and the BTO. It is a detailed examination of our woodlands birds, which is interesting in itself, as there appears to be a decline of certain woodland species. There is a decline in the south-east of England, which is strange because it is one of the better forested areas, but an increase in the midlands, including Nottingham. My hon. Friend will be pleased to know that. They are thriving in different parts of the country.

There are some issues that we have to understand about why certain species—the woodpecker and marsh tit, for example—have declined, while other woodland species, including most of the tit species and the greater spotted woodpecker, have increased significantly. There have also been increases in a number of wetland species. We have sites of special scientific interest, which are important protected habitat areas, and that protection has been strengthened by the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000. In the area of my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North, there are three SSSIs: Sutton and Lound gravel pits; the River Idle washlands; and the Welbeck estates, which are well known not least for the honey buzzards that nest there.

As my hon. Friend says, in many instances the numbers of farmland birds have declined catastrophically—the tree sparrow population, for example, has declined incredibly by 95 per cent. Much of that is linked to changing farming practices. These changes are not in any way malicious; they have been driven by intensification, trying to achieve outputs, economies and efficiencies. I have to agree with my hon. Friend that many of them have been driven by the common agricultural policy, which has had a negative effect on the way in which the inducements have encouraged intensification in certain farming practices which, in the longer term, may not be desirable or sustainable in relation to the climate and habitat.

It is likely that we will see changes over time. In the interim, we are arguing for changes to the CAP. We are also extending the countryside stewardship scheme and the environmentally sensitive areas scheme, which have been very successful. Schemes targeted at species in decline such as stone curlew and red kite have had considerable success in rehabilitating the populations. I was pleased recently to be in Derbyshire to launch the first RSPB's peak birds project annual report. Part of its purpose is to examine how to arrest the declining population of twite, which breed on the Pennines. I am confident that we will make progress on that issue.

Our new entry-level agri-environment schemes, as part of the reforms recommended by Sir Donald Curry, will have benefits in relation to the measures that we can implement in farmland areas. The organisation of our agri-environment programmes is undergoing its mid-term review. I know that concern has been expressed about the specialist schemes that can be targeted on species recovery. I would like to reassure my hon. Friend that in terms of future reforms there is no reason why we cannot continue to have specialist schemes designed to bring about species recovery within agri-environment programmes.

Mr. Allen: As time is running out, I am keen that my hon. Friend should refer to my point about wider public awareness and a possible campaign, not least on urban wild birds. Would it be possible, even arising from today's debate, for the Department to issue, if not guidelines, a press release listing some of the things an average person without a great deal of knowledge who wants to do their bit, as well as the farming community, can do to help?

Mr. Morley: That is a practical suggestion. We support the Farming and Wildlife Advisory Group, which works with farmers and landowners on conservation. English Nature does a good job with its range of leaflets and information on how people can support biodiversity and wildlife. It is the Government's main conservation arm, and perhaps the most appropriate body to deliver that advice. I shall speak to its representatives on how we can collaborate with non-governmental organisations and wildlife groups on the matter.

I recently took part in the national garden birdwatch, which is run by the RSPB every year. It is a good awareness raiser. I am glad to say that it was launched in No. 10, because it demonstrates our commitment as a Government to biodiversity, conservation management and the issue of wild birds. As my hon. Friend rightly stated, the Government have set public service agreement targets, both in terms of restoring farmland birds but also in relation to birds as a quality of life indicator, which is important.

I appreciate my hon. Friend raising this serious quality of life and conservation issue today. We take it seriously and I shall look closely at his helpful and considerate suggestions.

Flooding (Thames Valley)

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): I was lucky to be chosen to lead the debate, but the issue goes beyond party politics and my constituency all the way up the River Thames. Some hon. Members had worse experiences than mine, and they were at least as heart-rending.

I asked for the debate because I want help from the Government, not because I want to play the blame game or to point a finger, although it may come to that. We also need help from elsewhere, but that is not the subject of the debate.

I want help from the Government on three counts. First, I want to get the facts and the truth. Secondly, I want the Government to draw up plans for the future now that we know what can happen. Thirdly, inevitably—I am sure that the Minister guessed what I would say—I want to request money.

It may be self-evident, but the message time and again from people who have lived in my constituency for a long time is that they know about flooding, they have seen it before and they understand it, but this time something different seems to have happened. I keep hearing that; it is a subjective view, but we need to address it. Some have argued that there was more rain than there had been before, and some that there was less, but there certainly was rain, and the river rose rapidly. Some say that they have never seen it running so fast and we need to know about that.

The result, inevitably and predictably, was flooding. The flooding of land is inconvenient and a nuisance, but if open spaces flood, up to a point one can say, "So what? That is what open spaces are there for." However, it is the flooding of properties that hits the headlines and in that respect the constituencies of other hon. Members may have fared worse than mine. It surprises me how difficult it is to get the facts, but the best estimate is that between 100 and 150 properties actually had water inside them, but hundreds of others nearly did and the residents are worried about next time.

I do not suggest that people whose properties were flooded with river water and rain water did not suffer a huge personal crisis, but I want to concentrate on flooding with sewage, which is in an entirely different category; it can be linked with other flooding, but it can occur on its own. In some groups of houses in my constituency, the sewers were blocked because the pumps would not work, with the result that people had sewage all over their gardens or in their houses. They had to use a mobile toilet at the end of the road, whatever their age, and whatever the weather and the time of day or night. That was a horror above all horrors, and that is what hugely exercises my mind.

The overarching debate about flooding has two parts. First, what happens to the rain and river water and, secondly, what happens about the sewers? The first concerns the Environment Agency and the second Thames Water. The issues overlap, but they can be considered separately.

[Mr. David Wilshire]

I speak only for Spelthorne, and leave other hon. Members to say what happened in their constituencies, but in the most recent emergency the councils certainly came across as having learned from the flooding two years ago. Their response was better. I would not say that it was perfect, but lessons have been learned. The police have also learned some lessons, as their gold and silver command response appears to have worked better than two years ago. The fire and rescue services have similarly improved. I think that they have been buying boats, and I plead with the Minister to let them buy a few more. The emergency plans have been worked on, and I will say something about the need to improve them, but it would be churlish of me not to recognise that lessons have been learned since the last flood.

Before we say what we should do about the flooding, we need to understand the causes. I am the first to admit that I do not yet understand what happened.

Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): I thank the hon. Gentleman for securing the debate and apologise to hon. Members that I will not be able to remain for the full debate because, as they know, I am deeply involved in the subject that is being debated in the House.

I want to congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his tone of inquiry. The most important task is to find out why the flooding happened and what can be done in future. I am concerned by the speculation in and around Slough about whether the Jubilee river is the cause. The case is not proven, and I hope that in the debate we will be able to uncover what difference the river has made and the lessons that we need to learn.

Mr. Wilshire: I agree absolutely with the hon. Lady. Like her, I have many constituents who are convinced that the Jubilee river caused the flooding. My response is that it could have. I can see the argument that it was the cause, but I can also see the argument that it was not. As a layman, I do not know. That is why my first plea is for the truth, because only when we have it can we make plans. If the Jubilee river is not the cause, we will have wasted money spent on trying to improve it. If it is the Jubilee river, we must do something further.

We must get to the facts. Three themes and theories have emerged from my constituency about the river and rain flooding. The Jubilee river theory is the first. Some of my constituents are convinced that the Thames barrier was the cause, and other constituents believe that the flooding was caused by a lack of dredging. They believe that, and we have to give them enough information to work out whether their beliefs are right or wrong. We cannot just leave them with those assumptions. I hear regularly that Thames Water has not invested enough money in the sewers, has lacked interest in the problem and was incompetent during the emergency. I say that with some trepidation, because I do not believe any of that, but it has to be put in the open. It is being said, and if it is untrue, we have a duty to dispel the myth. If it is true, we must act on it.

I hope that the Minister will respond. The first question is whether the Government can help us get the facts. There is no point in having plans for the future based on fiction; we need them to be based on fact. We need to know whether the flooding was different and, if so, why. We have made some progress. During the emergency, the Environment Agency was available and frank, and I thank it for that. It has improved its response in the two years since the last flooding, and it was accessible at least to me. I defend it for having its priority as the emergency. Since that finished, it has been open. It has held two all-day public sessions, taken the abuse on the chin and said that it wants to find the facts, for which I applaud it. It is now conducting research and re-running the computer model used at the public inquiry, which had to happen.

During the emergency, Thames Water was overwhelmed, and there must be a lesson to learn from that. It was difficult to get hold of, although I accept that it had enough people demanding help without being annoyed by an MP. However, it has also been difficult to get hold of since the flooding. I am sorry to say that it has been a little coy, so perhaps we can work on it to be as open as the Environment Agency. It must tell us—the Government can persuade it if necessary—exactly where the real sewer problems are, as they are not always where they appear to be. It must tell us what needs to be done to solve those problems, and when it is going to take that action.

We also need independent verification. Understandably, when people face such difficulties, they tend to say, "Ah, well, how do we know that the body that we hold responsible is being open and honest when it does the research?" I applaud Spelthorne borough council, which is running Elmbridge borough council, by all accounts. It has jointly commissioned an independent expert to do some research to be compared with that done by the Environment Agency. That might sound wasteful, but I support it because people need reassurance. Will the Minister lend his support to that independent verification and reassurance, rather than merely saying that it is the agency's responsibility? There is a limit to how much local authorities can afford to do, but the Government have the power to make grants available. If they do nothing else, will they help to fund the exercise of reassuring local people and commissioning research to be compared with other research that is being done?

We must decide what we intend to do to protect people in the Thames valley against further flooding. Nature being what it is, I accept that there will always be problems, but what do we intend to do to minimise the risk and the damage? It would be churlish not to admit that there have been improvements. The Thames barrier and the Jubilee river stop flooding, whatever one might say about them. Whatever one might say about local issues, a scheme at Stanwell Moor in my constituency has prevented some 150 houses, which are regularly flooded, from being flooded.

Work has been done and progress has been made, but it is blindingly obvious that more must now be done in the light of what happened a few weeks ago. I accept the Environment Agency's argument that the recent floods were comparable to, but not as severe as, those in 1947. However, it also says that if we want a quick fix, we will have to double the width and the depth of the Thames to cope with the extra water that goes down the Thames past my constituency. I am not calling for that, as it would lead to the destruction of heaven knows how many houses and most of Staines town centre. It is not a solution. I mention it merely to indicate that quick fixes are not necessary available to us. We must consider how we can take immediate action, which means focusing on smaller schemes if necessary, as they can be designed and implemented quickly.

I hope that the Government will support the argument that a short-term solution would be to find ways of diverting the floodwater away from properties on to open land. We should try to find quicker and cheaper ways of taking limited action. There is a caravan park in my constituency that is right by the Thames, and I am told that it should be possible to send the water around it rather than through it. Such a measure would help. We could become locked in a debate about dredging. However, this is not such a debate but a request simply to clear the rubbish from the tributaries. My attention is regularly drawn to the fact that that work has not been done. All these measures are short term and easy to carry out if there is the will and the Government help.

There must be a commitment greatly to invest in upgrading the Victorian sewerage infrastructure. I look to the Government to help with that. Other practical measures need to be taken that do not cost money. The Minister will be pleased to hear that I shall leave the subject of money—the best bit—until last, although he will not escape a request for a cheque or two.

With regard to the planning guidance, much comment is made about inappropriate building in the flood plain. Planning policy guidance note 25, which was introduced in July 2001, is scheduled for review in 2004. Will the Government please review it now to see whether it is still appropriate in the light of what has happened?

I draw the Minister's attention to the Deputy Prime Minister's wish to build more and more houses in the south-east. My constituency has a quota to be met. We do not have much choice but to build on the flood plain because there is nowhere else left. Will the Government get rid of the ridiculous request to build more houses in Spelthorne?

Norman Baker (Lewes): The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. Is he aware that the current absence of regional policy means that houses are being built on the flood plain in the south-east, while in Hull 10,000 houses are being knocked down?

Mr. Wilshire: I would love to go down that route, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I have a great deal more to say about the Thames valley and I am not at all familiar with what is going on in Hull.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon): I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) is more about flexibility around housing targets than housing need, which in my constituency is very high. We have to find places to build houses, especially affordable ones, but I accept my hon. Friend's point that inflexibility leads to pressure for inappropriate development.

Mr. Wilshire: Exactly so. I do not want to go down that route. All that I am saying is that we do not want any more houses in our flood plain, thank you, whatever the debate about need. If there is a need for houses, put them somewhere sensible, not in Spelthorne flood plain or anyone else's flood plain.

The Minister might want to consider another practical and technical issue. Some roads in my constituency needed closing. The procedure for closing roads and keeping them closed does not work. The result was fisticuffs and the police became involved. The Government could deal with that issue.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge): Does my hon. Friend agree that a principal problem, which I also experienced in my constituency, was the lack of manpower available to Surrey police, which as we all know results from the swingeing cuts in grant to that force?

Mr. Wilshire: Absolutely right. I would love to have a debate about that too, but I might get a chance tomorrow afternoon to slag the Government off about the way they have treated my local police. For the moment, I shall stick to flooding.

I noticed in Hansard on 27 February last year at column 1351W that the Government said that they were reassessing the methodology governing their economic appraisals of flood schemes. Quite right too. Will the Minister tell us how that appraisal is going? Has he now changed the methodology? Will he also tell us what plans he has to get emergency plans revised quickly, and will he publish the results when he obtains them?

Financial matters are the key area in which the Government have a role to play. When we have plans to implement, when we have the facts and have done the design work and know what has to be done in the short term, will the money be available? Who will provide it? I hope that the answer is the Government.

The outcome of the floods in 2000 was that, as recorded in Hansard on 14 May 2002 at column 555W, the Government made available £16.35 million to meet the emergency costs and repairs. How much money will be available this time? The problems have been worse. Can we therefore assume that the amount of money will be greater, and, if so, by how much? Are the Government willing to help us meet the cost of independent verification?

My hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) spoke about police grant. The same is true of the fire and rescue services. The formula does not seem to take any account of the need to deal with such emergencies. Will the Government review their formula for funding fire and rescue? More boats are needed by the Surrey fire service and, I suspect, in Berkshire too. How much money will be received?

What will we be told about the flood defence committee grant? I understand that the Thames region grant in the year 2002–03 was £1.1 million, and that it has just been announced that for this year that amount has been cut to £300,000. What is it about the Thames valley that means that the same amount of money is no longer needed? If the Government are tempted to say that that is because the flood committee has balances of £17 million, I have a further question for the Minister. Why have those balances been allowed to build up when work needed to be done? The Minister cannot hide behind the issue of balances because those balances should not have been there. Why have the Government allowed those balances to develop?

My final question with regard to finance concerns what should be done about Thames Water. Thames Water has spent a huge amount of money on the priorities of the day, which are, generally speaking, Government driven. The amounts of money available for investment through Thames Water are determined by Ofwat in its settlements. I accept that a large amount of money has been made available for improvements to the sewers. However, the past few weeks have demonstrated that nothing like enough money has been released to Thames Water to carry out the work needed on the sewerage systems of my constituency and elsewhere.

What will the Government say to Ofwat about releasing more money into the system to make those improvements? I could go on at length. Sometimes, in a debate such as this, one has the wonderful opportunity to speak for an hour and to put the entire world to rights. There are many other things that should be said, and many other things that are important. However, I urge the Government to accept the debate in the spirit in which it is intended. This is a request for help and not for finger pointing. We need help to establish the facts, to develop practical solutions and to pay for those solutions.

I reiterate that this is not merely an academic exercise, nor is there a need for another report, another debate or a committee meeting. The image that I leave with the Minister is that of some of my constituents, who have had to walk around their living rooms with raw sewage up to their ankles. That sewage is still in their gardens and in the roads. This debate is about individuals in crisis and is a problem that cannot be ignored. I urge the Minister to accept that we need help now, and that action must be taken very quickly.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Edward O'Hara): Order. I remind hon. Members that the winding-up speeches should start at 3 o'clock. Hon. Members wishing to participate should gauge their contributions accordingly.

2.22 pm

Mr. Martin Salter (Reading, West): I congratulate the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire)—a place where I spent some time when growing up—on securing the debate. I remind him that the floodwater that passes through his constituency flows through mine a few hours earlier and through that of the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) a day earlier than that. It is a problem that we share.

I will adhere to your strictures to be relatively brief, Mr. Deputy Speaker, not least because I had prepared a speech on reform of the House of Lords, which would probably not go down very well in this Chamber. I have considerable interest, both as a Member of Parliament and as a fisherman, in the levels of the River Thames, and in some of the appalling devastation as a result of the floods this year and in 2000–01.

What is the cause of flooding? I shall come to the urban myths later, but primarily flooding is caused by the quantity and location of rainfall, which catchments are most affected, and the state of the aquifer at the time. That is the difference between the flooding in 2000 and the flooding that we have just experienced. The aquifer—the underground reservoir—was denuded during the exceptionally low rainfall in the late 1990s, and so was not fully charged as we approached the winter of 2000. Consequently, although there was a phenomenal amount of rainfall—some of the heaviest rainfall to be recorded in recent years—it was able to go somewhere before the rivers overtopped and the flood damage occurred. Sadly, that did not happen earlier this year. The aquifer was fully charged and the combination of heavy rainfall in the Thames catchment in Gloucester, in the Cotswolds and further down the valley resulted in the highest levels since 1947.

I shall describe what happened in a small part of my constituency called Purley on Thames, which is not well known. It has an interesting history but, sadly, as the hon. Member for Spelthorne said, it was built slap bang in the flood plain, and perhaps even in the functional water meadows.

The Environment Agency, which was responsible for providing flood warnings, did its job. On Tuesday 31 December, a flood warning was issued to local authorities and to the local population. The floodwaters did not begin to enter the properties in Purley until the evening of Friday 3 January, three or four days later, and 200-odd properties in my constituency were affected.

Purley is on a bend in the river, just below Mapledurham weir, downstream from Pangbourne and up from Reading. It was a camp site in the 1930s, which slowly transformed itself into a collection of shacks and riverside bungalows. I know it from the 1970s, when I drove there from west London—ironically from the hon. Gentleman's constituency of Spelthorne—to go fishing. I always thought that one day I would like to live in one of those little shacks, although I do not think that any more.

The shacks were developed, some without planning permission and intuitively, as people nailed cladding to the outside of temporary buildings and after five years established user rights. The community was not built by Barratt or Wimpey or to planning guidance. The ad hoc building activities in Purley would have caused a lot of problems, but Purley parish council, an organisation not renowned for its commitment to socialism, did its job diligently and spotted the problem, and in 1966 it produced local planning guidance. A datum level was established some 1ft above the 1947 high water mark. Some of the properties were built to that level and some were not. The question for the local authority is how efficient or effective was their building control and planning enforcement process.

What happened to the people I represent earlier this year? I received a call on the morning of Saturday 4 January from Mr. John Chapman, the Conservative councillor for Purley, for whom I have a high regard. John and I get on fine; we are both passionate about representing our constituents to the best of our ability. I provided John with a set of waders that I borrowed from the local fishing tackle shop and we spent that Saturday morning paddling round Purley.

We saw a good many distressed people who were angry because of the lack of emergency response. People who had just moved into the area and did not realise the house that they had bought was below the 1966 flood planning guidance level were livid. We looked along rows of houses, none more than 30 or 40 years old, and saw properties where the garden had flooded but the house had not. In others, built a foot or so lower—you do not notice that until the floods come—people were distraught and crying because their houses had flooded. One young woman had invested her life savings in a property and the local shop, and was completely flooded out. For the people of Purley on Thames, the planning regime might as well not have existed.

As one would expect in any flood-risk area, there was a compound that held sandbags. Despite a flood warning from the Environment Agency, West Berkshire council failed to provide sandbags. People in the know got the few remaining available sandbags and the rest fell apart in their arms, because despite being given four days' clear notice by the Environment Agency, it was beyond the wit of West Berkshire council to fill bags with sand and make them available for the council tax payers in the flood-risk area. I hope that the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) is listening, because West Berkshire is a Liberal-controlled council and it has many questions to answer about its conduct.

The emergency response, of which I am most critical, was mixed. I have nothing but praise for South East Berkshire emergency volunteer force, but the sad fact of life is that its members were the only people on site that Saturday. Did I see anyone there from the local council? In fact, the police were pretty tardy: not many turned up on time. SEBEV was there only because one of its prime co-ordinators happened to live in Purley on Thames. The organisation functions from Bracknell. I have repeatedly looked into this problem. There was no guarantee that it would have done such an excellent job of using its boats, evacuating people from property, liaising with the parish council and putting people in emergency accommodation had it not been for the lucky coincidence that one of its co-ordinators lives in Purley.

Yes, the Environment Agency did its bit. The flood warning went out. I advise constituents who live in flood plains to subscribe to the automatic flood warning system. It sends an automatic message to the telephone answering service. Sadly, the Environment Agency's website crashed. I see one or two people from the agency in the Room. I should like to receive assurances that that will not happen again, because people rely on such information. I would not be so forceful if it were not for the arrogant way in which it has behaved subsequently, but my most damning criticism is of West Berkshire council and its failure to trigger an effective emergency planning procedure.

Not only was there a lack of presence on the Saturday—apart from my good self, some volunteers and the local council—the West Berkshire council did not even set up an emergency incident point until the Sunday. People had been flooded for some 36 hours and were distressed. The icing on the cake was the e-mail from West Berkshire council. I am sure that hon. Members would not want a council that they have affection for to send such an e-mail. The council's emergency planning officer sent it to the volunteer chair of Purley parish council, Mr John Southall. Purley parish council has a budget of £46,500 per annum. West Berkshire council has a budget of more than £50 million per annum. We should bear in mind the fact that the e-mail was sent on Friday evening, when floodwaters were entering people's properties. It stated:

"Dear Mr. Southall . . . In view of the flooding situation in Purley I was wondering how you are holding out as I am always, especially concerned for the vulnerable people affected by the situation. Perhaps you could call me or email me on Monday to see whether we can help in any way."

The e-mail was sent by the assistant emergency planning officer of West Berkshire council, who is paid to send such garbage at council tax payers'expense. It said that "the Parish Council is the place to co-ordinate and organise the help on the ground."

Yes, of course it is, with its budget of £46,000. It went on to say that Mr. Southall's neighbours knew their requirements

"better than the council ever could. We do not want to take that responsibility off you but re-assure you, that we will do everything we can to make Purley as resilient as can be against flooding."

Presumably, that meant the Monday morning. Best of all is the closing line of the e-mail:

"Best regards and our hopes for a dry weekend".

My constituents pay their council taxes for that sort of stuff.

I attended a meeting the following Friday with Councillor John Chapman. Hon. Members should bear in mind the fact that I am a member of the Labour party and he is a Conservative. We were treated to a display of breathtaking arrogance from the Liberal Democrat party, especially from its chief executive, Jim Graham. In my presence, Councillor Chapman was told by the chief executive that he took a dim view of councillors criticising his council in the local paper, and that it is the job of a councillor to represent the interests of the council to the people of Purley, not the other way round. What a perverse notion of democracy.

I have vented my spleen long enough on West Berkshire council. I imagine that hon. Members have taken the point. I can assure them that, for all the nonsense that West Berkshire council has come out with in private, in public it has finally set up a review chaired by Councillor John Chapman into the reasons for the flooding and how the emergency response procedure can be improved. I give the councillors credit for that, but only with their hands twisted half way up their backs were they prepared to concede any point. The review should be completely unnecessary because lessons should have been learned from the floods two years previously.

What can we say now and what can be done to reassure my constituents? Some of the urban myths must be debunked comprehensively. I have heard it said—I am sure that it was also said in Spelthorne, Oxford and elsewhere—that the Thames flooded because the Woolwich barrier was not shut. Absolute nonsense. If that were the case, St. Paul's would have flooded regularly. The Jubilee river can have no effect upstream of the point at which it leaves the River Thames, because water does not flow uphill.

However, other measures can be taken. The civil defence grant available for England, Wales and Northern Ireland, which funds emergency planning officers, is about £19 million for the current year. My local authority in Reading receives only about £67,000 to fund its entire emergency planning operation at a time when we are at risk from not only flooding but terrorism. That paltry sum must be reviewed urgently. The Emergency Planning Society and the Local Government Association have suggested that £70 million is a more realistic budget for the civil defence grant.

Engineering solutions could help the people of Purley, and I hope that the Environment Agency is able to fund those. I want the Government to ensure that no local authority can hide from the fact that its emergency plan is not working as it should due to lack of support from central Government. That is a challenge to us all, especially to the Minister.

2.36 pm

Mr. Michael Trend (Windsor): The recent flooding of the Thames had severe consequences for many of my constituents, especially for the communities of Datchet, Sunnymeads, Ham island, Wraysbury and Hythe End. I visited those places, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) and the hon. Member for Reading, West (Mr. Salter), when the river broke its banks, and I saw the disruption and distress caused. People were understandably angry, but it is vital to point out that people performed many acts of kindness and helped their neighbours.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne said, it was clear from the start that local people blamed the new Jubilee river for the problems. Although there was substantial rainfall at the end of last year, most people did not think that it had been exceptional. They thought—probably intuitively—that they had seen rain just as heavy and continuous during recent years, but that that had not caused the dire consequences that they faced. One of my constituents wrote,

"the rainfall and the conditions were nothing like as bad" as the great flood of 1947. Moreover, some of the flooded houses had never flooded before. People asked themselves what had changed, and everyone thought that the difference was the new river.

I remember the inquiry into the Jubilee river well, and I often visited the scheme during its construction. There were remarkable civil engineering achievements. The river had to go under the old Great Western line, and engineers had to burrow under the M4. The environmental side of the project has been a great success.

However, important questions were raised from the start about how the scheme would work in practice and the effect that it would have downstream of the settlements of Maidenhead, Windsor and Eton, which it was designed to protect. I remember struggling with the complicated mathematic formula—the hydraulic model—that was used to show what should happen in different circumstances.

We were told that when the rivers met at Datchet, a certain volume of water would arrive faster than it otherwise would, but that the river level should not rise significantly. That should have meant that there would be no change downstream of Datchet, but given recent experiences local people who live there do not believe that. Datchet is significant because the Jubilee river rejoins the Thames at Black Potts, which is just above Datchet, to make one river again out of two. That is where the flooding in my constituency began. Hon. Members should also take note of the fact that there was unusual flooding above the point where the rivers bifurcate at Cookham, Bisham and Hurley. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) is concerned about that issue and is acting to deal with it.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe): Is my hon. Friend aware that some of my constituents in Marlow and Medmenham are convinced that they experienced similar problems to those encountered by my hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead? Is he aware that both they and I want to be associated with his comments on introducing an independent element to the inquiry?

Mr. Trend: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. I will return to that point in a minute. People who live upstream of the beginning of the scheme feel intuitively—I hope that this is not an urban myth—that there may have been a bottleneck effect.

The Environment Agency tells us that the Jubilee river performs the service for which it was designed, which is to protect Maidenhead, Windsor and Eton. That seems to be correct. From the point of view of people who live there, the scheme can be judged a success. Downstream, however, the story is different. The word "sacrifice" came up many times in talking to people and in correspondence. People downstream feel that their interests have been sacrificed for those of Maidenhead and Windsor. One correspondent wrote:

"It is quite clear that the residents of Wraysbury have been made sacrificial lambs."

Another referred to

"this sacrificial flood . . . Surely, shifting the problem from one area to another defeats the whole object of this construction."

One local inhabitant reached this conclusion:

"Maidenhead and Windsor have been protected at the expense of Datchet, Wraysbury, Ham Island and others downstream."

As my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne said, the central issue is about what happened. My constituents want to know whether the problem has been shifted rather than solved. What effect has the Jubilee river had downstream from Datchet? I agree entirely with my hon. Friend: we need to know the facts. An immediate independent inquiry is needed to test the effects of the new river. It is right that the Environment Agency should carry out its own review and re-run the model that it presented at the original inquiry. However, that is not enough. I was encouraged by what my hon. Friend said regarding the local authorities. They had independent professional advice at the time of the public inquiry, so they should get together and secure independent, expert, professional advice to check the Environment Agency figures and they should run their own model, if that is necessary. Only then will the local communities be confident that all that can be done is being done.

We must investigate how the Jubilee river was operated during the recent events, and we need independent professional advice on that. There have been many theories—some of them are surely urban myths—about the operation of weirs and sluices. I am not an expert on such operations. The December floodwaters were the first real test for the Jubilee river. It is important for its future operation that a judgment is made on how it behaved overall, and that a conclusion is reached about how it was operated.

The maintenance of the river must also be considered. The Environment Agency has told us about the dredging that has been done in the last half century, but we should consider urgently whether more dredging could be done. A constituent who lives on the river told me that jetties and landing stages may not have been constructed properly and they must be examined, as they may be causing obstructions. Ditching and drainage have been mentioned. There were some apparently isolated examples of water welling up some way inland from the river. That was perhaps due to a raised water table being compounded by poor drainage and ditching. That must be considered.

The flood warning system was not satisfactory. For example, the telephone system did not work well in my area. Good local plans must be in place, and I would advocate the return of sirens along especially vulnerable stretches of the river. I remember the old post-war civil defence siren system, which was tested every so often and people knew when it was going to be tested. As a child, I thought that that was wonderful. The people who lived on the banks would have been saved from a great deal of trouble if a siren had sounded when the situation became acute. The other systems did not work well.

I believe that the Government, the Environment Agency and local authorities should consider a range of questions relating to the management of the Thames and its flood plain. Much has been said about building in the flood plain and about terminal 5, which will surely have some effect on the Colne, Colne brook and the Thames. I support my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne in his comments on planning policy guidance note 25.

It is important that we reconsider the plans put forward during the original public inquiry for a further scheme to cover the stretch of the Thames from Datchet downstream. Much was made of those plans some years ago, but it has been lost sight of in the intervening years. When I inquired a few years ago, it was perfectly clear from the Environment Agency's answer that the plans had been dropped. A new scheme should be considered as a matter of urgency, and the Government have a role to play in that.

Key responsibility for the management of the Thames belongs to the Environment Agency, although some of the matters that I have raised, such as ditching, sandbags and cleaning up, will have to be dealt with by local authorities. The royal borough of Windsor and Maidenhead did well in that regard. However, some of the main issues can be pulled together only by the Government. I ask the Minister for a number of assurances. First, I ask the Government to play a part in the investigation into the effects and operation of the new river, which is a substantial public project of national importance. The Government have sources of expertise and experience that could be very helpful.

Secondly, a major review of the various factors that cause flooding throughout the Thames valley needs to be undertaken. That is clearly too large a task for local authorities, and I ask the Government to take overall responsibility for such a review. Thirdly, the Government should try to clarify where liability lies. If it can be shown that the problem originally faced by the towns of Maidenhead and Windsor has not been solved, but simply transferred to Datchet and places downstream, then surely there is an important question of liability.

Finally, I ask the Government to revisit the question of flood insurance for homes such as those belonging to my constituents which were recently flooded. As we know, a new system was introduced on 1 January. The Association of British Insurers speaks of using its best efforts for people living in areas liable to flooding, and has said that flood insurance "should continue to be available for as many customers as possible."

As we all know, that means that insurance will not be available for many households in future. If my constituents could not get insurance, the value of their properties would clearly be damaged, and that is not fair. The ABI has tried to pass on to the Government the responsibility for dealing with the problems of flooding. In my view, the Government will have to deal either with the problems or with the ABI.

People in my constituency who have suffered so greatly in recent weeks must know what happened, and why. I look to the Government to help us to discover the answers.

2.47 pm

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe): I shall be brief. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) for securing the debate, and for introducing it, and I join him in paying tribute to the work of the emergency services in combating some of the distress, anxiety and difficulty that my constituents in Marlow and Medmenham experienced during the recent flooding. They believe, rightly or wrongly, that the Jubilee scheme was either partly or wholly to blame for the exacerbated levels of flooding, but I agree with my hon. Friend that we do not know whether they are right.

The written answer that I received from the Minister on the matter last month is significant. It said that

"the Environment Agency takes the view that the Jubilee River has no impact, adverse or otherwise, on either community."—[Official Report, 15 January 2003; Vol. 397, c. 612W.]

The Minister will forgive me if I do not take that as a categorical denial; the agency merely "takes the view". I notice that the agency is also conducting its own inquiry into what happened. Trevor Goodhew of the agency was quoted to that effect recently in the Marlow Free Press:

"We do not know whether it worked"—

I believe that the "it" is the Jubilee scheme—

"as it was intended to but rather than look at it ourselves and be accused of prejudice, we are asking independent regulators to do it."

I understand that that independent element is a separate branch of the Environment Agency. Perhaps the Minister will clarify that.

[Mr. Paul Goodman]

In a further written answer, when I asked whether all the information gained by the EA about what happened would be published, the Minister replied:

"As with previous floods, there will be an analysis of what happened and the Agency will make available to the public lessons learnt from this information."—[Official Report, 28 January 2003; Vol. 398, c. 734W.]

My constituents feel that unless the agency is open and publishes in full information about what happened in January, an independent inquiry along the lines of the one suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor (Mr. Trend) is needed. Unless the Minister can persuade me otherwise, I am inclined to think that that is correct. The levels of flooding were so exacerbated that my constituents are right to ask for an explanation for what happened. I look forward to the Minister's response.

2.50 pm

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon): I would like to take this debate upstream but not necessarily upmarket from some of the excellent contributions that we have had, and talk about the flooding that occurred in parts of Oxford—in South Hinksey, Kennington and on the Botley road—just as it did two years ago. For the first time, there was flooding in a few properties in Old Botley and Abingdon, as a result of the River Ock flooding. Like the hon. Member for Reading, West (Mr. Salter), I spent much of my Saturday and Sunday seeing the problem first hand—working with the emergency services and council workers and trying to let people know what options were available. I fear that I was not as well equipped as the hon. Gentleman. I had no waders. I had only a pair of inadequate wellingtons that were too short. There is concern about whether the equipment provided for the workers was adequate.

We have heard about the impact of flooding, which can be set out in various ways. First, there is the stress from the fear of one's property being inundated, which is followed by the impact of the actual flooding. I do not recommend removing properties in the flood plain and building them somewhere else, so the only solution is the provision of adequate flood defences.

With the exception of Abingdon, all the areas that I mentioned are affected by the same tributaries to the Thames flooding over the flood plain, so the key question for the west Oxford area is whether there will be an adequate flood defence system. Without one, I fear that it will be difficult to overcome the problems of insurance. I entirely endorse the wise words of the hon. Member for Windsor (Mr. Trend) about insurance problems.

Mr. Salter: The hon. Gentleman and I have constituencies with a similar geological make up. A substantial gravel seam in the Thames valley runs from Reading upstream to Oxford. Does he acknowledge that one of the problems is that, as the aquafer rises, water can literally enter people's properties without overtopping the river purely as a result of the rise in the water table? It is important that we do not give false hope to our constituents by talking about flood defences that may not yet be technically feasible.

Dr. Harris: That may apply to a small number of properties, but the ones that I am concerned about could be improved by flood defences because they suffer from direct inundation from the street rather than from within. Flooding has an effect on house values and, therefore, the mobility of the population, because people find it difficult to sell their houses and move. The problems experienced by houses in the flood plain have been exacerbated by subsequent developments in the flood plain when those involved in the planning system should know better.

Guidelines could be toughened up in the review of PPG25. The Vale of White Horse district council in my constituency has a new policy. It not only treats the Environment Agency as a statutory consultee on developments in the flood plain, but never disagrees if the EA advises against planning permission for flood plain developments. That is not the case with other local councils, but such practice could be included in guidance to beef it up.

During flooding in the Oxford area, some things went well and some went badly. The emergency services performed well, particularly the fire and rescue services. They were there, they were available, they had their mobile phones and went from house to house when requested. Another thing that went well were some functions of the Environment Agency—their workers on the ground and the supply of pumps, which in many cases kept the water at bay.

I pay tribute to Innes Jones, Geoff Bell and Peter Collins, the engineers, who were on the ground with me on those days. They made themselves available to see the situation at first hand and helped to deploy their facilities. Council staff worked hard and the supply of sandbags was better. The flood defences that had nearly been completed in Kidlington were not called into action, but at least people in that area were not as stressed as they feared that they might have been in view of the 1998 floods. Another thing that worked well was the action and initiative taken by local people, such as Mr. Andy Webber of Earl street, and Mr. John Mastroddi of Kennington road in Oxford, who took matters into their own hands by alerting their neighbours and getting stuck in with the deployment of pumps.

What did not work well, according to a council debrief that I attended, was the command structure, which was not up and running quickly enough and was not centralised enough. Road closures were not clear. The Botley road should have been closed; the wave effect from large vehicles going down it directly exacerbated flooding and it was not clear why the police did not close it earlier. The warnings were inadequate. Websites are there to be updated and they can be specific. They can warn, "People in Botley road in Oxford ought to know that flood waters are not predicted to peak until tomorrow, so even if one thinks it is getting better, please do not remove the precautions." It would have been better for us to have had loudhailers, because that would have got across the message. Some hon. Members perhaps do not need loudhailers in the Reading area, but they would have been a boon, because they would have got the information directly to the people who needed it.

Thames Water did not work well. We have heard about the sewage problem. There will always be sewage contamination of the highway drainage and vice versa, but Thames Water has since got its act together and has set out a second stage study. It will take six months to complete, at a cost of £25,000. In a letter of 29 January, Thames Water states:

"Whilst we hope that this study will help us identify a solution to the flooding problem, we must make the best use of our resources and, with this in mind, I regret that I cannot confirm that funding will be available for any suitable scheme."

That question has already been raised by the hon. Member for Windsor.

Finally, we must consider the performance of Railtrack in dealing with the culverts for which it is responsible under the railway line at Kennington. It has delayed and that is still considered to be a problem by people in that area. Therefore, there is a great deal for the agencies to do and I look forward to the Minister's response.

2.57 pm

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) on securing the debate. I want to express sympathy to my constituents and my thanks to the Surrey fire and rescue service and Runnymede borough council for their sterling efforts during the crisis. My hon. Friend said that we are not in the blame game. Everybody here will understand that the initial reaction of people whose houses flooded just two years after what they thought was a once-in-a-lifetime event is anger. As that sentiment subsides, cooler heads are prevailing and, as my hon. Friend said, people want to make sure that they find out what happened, so that there is a firm base of evidence to build on in planning for the future.

Hon. Members have mentioned the maintenance of water courses, the contribution of the Jubilee river; and the operation of weirs and barriers on the Thames. There is a huge need for an independent element in the analysis of those problems. The Minister was shaking his head earlier, when my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne was talking about the lack of independence in that one department of the Environment Agency audited another. However, I think that the Minister will accept that there is at least a problem with the public perception that the Environment Agency is both the promoter of major infrastructure projects, such as the Jubilee river, and the regulator that ultimately has to assess whether those projects are working.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Elliot Morley): I will deal with that in my reply. First, the EA schemes are subject to independent assessment by Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs engineers—who are not part of the EA. As for the Jubilee river, which I will look at in detail, the assessment was made by a completely independent consultant who is not part of the EA.

Mr. Hammond: I am grateful to the Minister. If he can elaborate on those remarks during his reply, it would be helpful. As my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne said, Runnymede, Spelthorne and Elmbridge borough councils have immediately taken the initiative in appointing an independent hydrologist. He will review the events, so that they can talk to the EA on a qualified basis, rather than retelling residents' anecdotes, which is important, but not definitive. I join my hon. Friend in asking the Minister whether he can help with the funding of that initiative by councils.

There are questions about the effect of the Jubilee river, other man-made influences and river maintenance, but there is also a willingness to recognise that the end result of the analysis might be that climate change is ultimately responsible for what occurred. If that is the case and we must accept that such events will happen more frequently, given that river defences in London were improved 30 or 40 years ago to good effect—there has been no flooding since—are the Government prepared to support the major expenditure on infrastructure that would be required to take that approach further up the Thames to secure the defence of areas such as Chertsey, Egham and Staines? We know that the Government propose to abandon the flood defences of several rural areas, but I hope that the Minister will assure us that the flood defences of urbanised areas will remain a Government priority.

May I suggest to the Minister that if climate change is responsible for the floods, there would be no more appropriate source of revenue for the funding of flood defences than the climate change levy? When that was announced, it was supposed to be revenue neutral, but the Government have since reneged on the reduction of employers' national insurance contributions that made it revenue neutral.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are talking about flood defences.

Mr. Hammond: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but the financing of flood defences is an essential part of the issue.

If it turns out that heavy rainfall and climate change are the root cause of the problem, we shall look to the Government for investment in effective management in order to allow those of us with constituencies along the river to live with the changed situation. That will mean making necessary resources available to the Environment Agency and other bodies.

Tomorrow, the Deputy Prime Minister will announce his communities plan to the House of Commons. The Government recognise that development in the south-east is inevitable and necessary in order to maintain national economic growth. The policy will be hollow if the Government do not address the significant investment that will be required to protect vulnerable areas of south-east England from coastal and fluvial flooding over the next decades.

3.2 pm

Norman Baker (Lewes): First, I congratulate the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) on securing the debate and on the way in which he presented his case. May I offer my sympathy to his and other hon. Members' constituents who were affected by floods? My constituency of Lewes was severely hit in 2000 and I am only too aware of how severe and traumatic floods can be for individuals who are caught up in such unfortunate events.

I understand from a parliamentary question answered by the Minister earlier this month that the flood was the third worst in the Medmenham and Marlow areas since records began. The flood was worse than that in any other year except 1894 and 1947. We know that 645 homes were flooded during the new year holiday period, and we have seen on our televisions that this is the anniversary of the terrible floods of 1953. Floods are sadly always with us, and they will always be with us. There is nothing that any Government—not even this Prime Minister—can do to stop floods from occurring. We can try to ensure that we put in place measures to minimise the impact of floods on our citizens and the Government can put in place measures to slow down climate change, which several hon. Members rightly mentioned.

Climate change is undoubtedly occurring. The Thames barrier has been mentioned, and hon. Members might be aware that in 1982, it was planned that the barrier would last unchanged until 2030. It was anticipated that there would be 10 closures per year in this decade and 30 closures per year by 2030. However, there were 24 closures in 2001 and there were 19 closures this winter. It already seems that the Thames barrier is under increasing pressure, which must be caused by climate change.

I understand that the Environment Agency has a £4 million project to plan for flood risk management in the Thames estuary. It would be useful to know what progress has been made on that and what further expenditure the Minister anticipates along the Thames to protect London, which is key to our national position.

In the context of climate change, it is important that we put in place measures that minimise the requirement for flood defences to try to solve the root problem rather than deal with the sore that arises as its consequence. It is interesting that building is now taking place on flood plains, although the Government are taking steps to stop it. However, we have an overheating of the south-east compared with almost dereliction in some parts of the north, because the Government fail to have a proper regional policy. It has been predicted that carbon dioxide emissions from air travel will double between 1990 and 2010, the Government are abandoning road traffic reduction targets, and the amount of energy generated from renewable sources went down last year from 3.3 to 3.1 per cent. There has also been an international failure to ratify the Kyoto agreement by some of the key players, not least the Americans and President Bush. All those factors, which may seem a long way away, have an impact on the Thames valley, as they do on my constituency and all others in the country.

The Minister can do his best to erect flood defences, but it will not solve the problem unless his colleagues in Government take the necessary steps to deal with climate change, and I am sad to say that they are not. However, there are steps that the Minister can take to improve matters in his own Department as well. We are seeing an increase in the money allocated for flood defences, to which the Minister will doubtless refer. However, we have not yet seen any Government action to sort out the bureaucratic and shambolic arrangements that have been in place for so many decades, if not centuries, in this country to deal with flood defence. So many bodies are involved. All have powers, but none has a specific duty to get on and do something.

When a flood occurs, after we have tried to deal with the immediate aftermath, the question is who is responsible. Is it the Environment Agency, the water company, the Highways Agency, the county or district council, the internal drainage board, Railtrack or the riparian owners? The Government need to get grip on that and ensure that a clear, workable structure is in place. By putting money into flood defences, the Government have put more fuel into the car, but they have not dealt with the fact that it is barely roadworthy. Until they do that, we will continue to struggle.

We need to ensure that we do not always leap to the assumption that the best solutions are always hard engineering measures. It may be that they are the best option for individual towns, but I do not think that sufficient attention has been paid nationwide to the opportunities presented by soft measures. We could examine the use of farmers' fields for flooding and riverbank heights to the north, south, east and west of towns. Those measures have a role to play, but the Environment Agency seems to look to hard engineering measures first, just because it has always done that. I will stray briefly to the subject of Lewes. The Environment Agency has been able to come up with a complicated plan for Lewes, but it has been unable to reach agreement with half a dozen farmers south of the town to use their fields for flooding if necessary. If that is replicated in the Thames valley and elsewhere, something is wrong with the system.

The hon. Member for Reading, West (Mr. Salter) raised the question of West Berkshire council. I thought that he was uncharacteristically acerbic in his presentation, and I wonder whether he would have been like that if it the council had been Labour run. I am sorry that he brought a party political point—

Mr. Salter: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Norman Baker: I have barely raised the matter, so perhaps the hon. Gentleman will let me finish it.

I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman brought into the debate a party political point that had been happily lacking in other contributions. I also think that he was wrong to refer to an officer of the council in critical terms rather than a councillor. Those officers are not elected, and it was wrong to say that he had a party allegiance.

Mr. Salter: Hansard shows that I was critical at Prime Minister's Question Time of my own party's lack of financial support for the civil defence grant. I had some stern words to say to Reading borough council about its sandbag policy. Even in this debate, I did not shrink from drawing to the attention of my hon. Friend the Minister the inadequacies in the emergency planning funding regime. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that I have been anything but partisan.

Norman Baker: I am grateful to hear that. I always have time for the hon. Gentleman and that helps to put the matter in context. I am always wary of attacking individual councillors and others in Westminster, when they are unable to answer back effectively. I could say many things about my own county council, which is not Liberal Democrat, but I usually restrain myself for those reasons.

Finally, I want to speak briefly about the planning of flood defence schemes for individual towns. Evaluation of properties is an important issue: they are often grossly undervalued, so the cost-benefit ratio of what can be achieved in a particular town is sometimes out of line. More proper calculations are necessary and we should also examine the Environment Agency's requirement to apply cells to specific towns. Again, they often fail to provide a townwide solution and leave some areas unprotected, causing conflict in the communities. Some of those undesirable aspects of the problem apply nationally, so when plans are brought forward for the Thames valley and elsewhere, I hope that the nationwide problems will be addressed as part of the process.

3.10 pm

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) on securing this timely debate and on the tone of his speech, which was greatly in the spirit of inquiry. He made some thoroughly practical suggestions and sparked off useful contributions from other hon. Members.

This year we commemorate the 1953 flooding disaster when the North sea took England by storm. On the night of 31 January 1953, wind speeds of 125 mph were recorded before the tidal flood descended on the east coast. Three hundred and seven people died, 24,000 homes were damaged or destroyed and more than 30,000 people were evacuated. Nearly 200,000 acres of land were inundated and 100 miles of road and 200 miles of railway were seriously damaged.

Speaking on 30 January this year at the 1953 floods conference in Norwich, the Minister assured his audience that the Government were committed and on track to meet the challenges of flood and coastal defence for today and tomorrow. He contrasted 1953 with today, stating:

"We do live in different times—not least because we are better at warning people. In 1953, there was no national warning service. Emergency plans were hampered by poor communications."

In the light of the flooding disasters of Christmas and new year 2002–03, the Minister might be accused of a certain wishful thinking. Despite 136 flood warnings, 645 properties were flooded, some in my own constituency. Many were left stranded and without communication when the Environment Agency's website crashed due to over-use. Apparently, the problem was 40 times worse than in the year 2000 and, as we have heard, the Thames valley was particularly affected—not just by river water, but by overflowing sewers bringing the most stinking of consequences.

I am concerned that the consultation of the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs on the flood and coastal defence funding review explicitly excluded from its scope

"emergency planning and emergency funding arrangements".

If the Minister acknowledges that flooding is a natural phenomenon that cannot be eliminated, and admits that the risk to people and property can be managed, why were contingency provisions omitted from the consultation? I recognise that it is also a Home Office problem, but we are told that we have joined-up government.

Mr. Morley: The answer is simple: the Home Office is carrying out its own review on emergency planning, dealing with some of the issues raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West, particularly in respect of funding and organisation.

Mr. Sayeed: DEFRA is the lead Department. It is extraordinary that DEFRA's consultation paper, "The Flood and Coastal Defence Funding Review", did not deal with emergency planning and emergency funding arrangements. Will the Minister tell the Chamber when the conclusions to that consultation will be published? I have asked the Minister that question several times and have yet to receive an answer.

Flooding is often mentioned in the same breath as admirable terms such as sustainability, strategic approach and integrated management, but how much of them did we see in relation to the flooding in the new year, and how far have they been put into practice in the Government's long-term vision for flood and coastal defence? Operational responsibility for flood defence rests with the Environment Agency, the internal drainage boards, the local authorities, the maritime local authorities, the water companies, the riparian owners, and so on. That is hardly conducive to an integrated strategic and streamlined approach that would have the flexibility to recognise and react to specific local needs.

There is a case for a statutory duty for operational authorities to carry out flood and coastal defence activities rather than their current permissive powers. Will the water Bill, which is due to be published very soon, include powers to rationalise the two-tiered flood defence committees? How will the Government ensure that decision making does not become too remote from local interests? What consideration has been given to the establishment of a single executive operating authority, possibly the Environment Agency, funded by a central grant, that would require action to be taken in the event of an emergency and apportion responsibility and costs afterwards in order to prevent a problem from becoming a disaster? Such decisions could be subject to an appeal system, and should be monitored to ensure impartiality.

When will the Government realise that flood plains contain areas that provide general economic and environmental benefit to the greater community, not for capital gain by the development and building industries, but as water-absorbing land that can reduce the risk of flooding elsewhere? Some 27 per cent. of new property by value throughout England and Wales, including £80 billion of property in and around London alone, is built on flood plains. How many more millions of households are to be exposed to increased flood disasters, lack of insurance cover and a drop in property value that renders homes a worthless asset? Why are the Government putting more people at risk of flooding while planning to introduce taxes to pay for more, crucial flood defences? Why are more than one in three applications to build homes on flood plains being approved while the advice of the Environment Agency is ignored?

Last year, the Government approved 288 of the 758 planning applications that the Environment Agency objected to on the grounds that they would mean building on flood plains. One in five of the rejected applications were then passed on appeal, against the agency's advice. The Deputy Prime Minister's regeneration scheme for the Thames Gateway region would put another 1 million people at risk from flooding.

Will the Minister confirm that he is considering a new tax on property developers to pay for the erection and maintenance of flood defences on flood plains? Will local authorities also be expected to top up the flood defence funds in addition to all the other burdens that central Government places on their shoulders? Who will be required to pay for the increased drainage costs? Will it be the existing shareholders who, by and large, do not want even more urban sprawl? Will it be local authorities, which are usually opposed to building on flood plains? It may be the water companies, which will then pass on the costs to their existing customers, who do not want the development in the first place. Those costs may include the cost of new, otherwise unnecessary main drainage systems. How much of the money for flood defences promised by the Minister on a year-by-year basis has been spent on, or earmarked for, flood defence plans agreed by the competent authority? If there has been an underspend, how large is it, why has it occurred and what are the Government going to do to remedy the situation?

Surely it is time that the development of flood plains was capped. The Minister should spend more time and energy researching soft defences—sustainable farming practices that assist water retention and the streamlining of responsibility in view of the increased risk of disasters threatened by climate change and rising sea levels. The exercise of the forces of nature is out of our control, but the minimisation of their impact lies in the hands of the Government. The delivery of a policy that looks beyond sandbags to a long-term preventive strategy is essential before the next disaster catches us as unprepared and underfunded as we were in 1953.

3.21 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Elliot Morley): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) on the way in which he has raised the debate. He made a number of pertinent points. I regret that in the 10 minutes available to me it will be difficult to answer all the points made by hon. Members. We have had some good contributions from my hon. Friends the Members for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) and for Reading, West (Mr. Salter), and the hon. Members for Windsor (Mr. Trend), for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman), for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris), for Lewes (Norman Baker) and, of course, for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed).

I have every sympathy with those, in the Thames valley and elsewhere, who were affected by the floods over the new year. It is very unpleasant to have one's property flooded. I want to place on the record my appreciation for the Environment Agency staff, who worked long hours throughout the holiday period, the local authority staff, the emergency services and the volunteers, who, as my hon. Friend the Member for Reading West stated, gave their time willingly and freely.

I echo the point that this is the anniversary of the devastating 1953 floods, which affected my constituency when the Trent burst its banks. Even though north Lincolnshire is quite a long way inland, the floods reached the edges of Scunthorpe. The hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire asked many questions, which I cannot answer in 10 minutes, but the Government are going to arrange a three-hour debate on flooding this month, which will be an opportunity to go into the details in greater depth.

I point out that the hon. Gentleman might have arranged such a debate in his own party's time. This subject is of interest and there are serious issues at stake. We are confident that we are on track to reduce risk. We are not complacent. One can never entirely remove the risk of flooding, as hon. Members have acknowledged, but we have done a great deal in the past few years. There will be an opportunity to discuss the details of the funding review in the debate, and during proceedings on the water Bill, which I expect to be published around that date, we will be able to answer some of the questions raised by the review.

Although the January floods affected about 600 people, for whom I have every sympathy, they were comparable to those of 2000 as there were similar groundwater levels. In some parts of the country the water levels were higher. In the Thames area water levels were at their highest since 1947. In 2000, 10,000 properties were affected. In 2002, 600 were affected. That is no consolation to those involved, but it shows that steps are being taken progressively to reduce the risk.

The 1947 figures for people affected in the Thames region are dramatic. I must qualify them by saying that there are differences in every kind of flood, and the 1947 flood was caused largely by snow melt, whereas this year's flood was caused by intense rainfall over a short period. The way in which the tributaries behaved in 1947 also differed, although some of the tributaries were higher in 2003 than they were in 1947.

I will give hon. Members some indication of the scale of the problems in 1947, although I am surprised at the figures because there has been a lot more building since then. In January 2003, approximately 120 properties in the region of the Thames from Windsor to Teddington were affected—the figures are not yet exact because information is still being received—whereas in 1947 the number was 6,956. We do not have information on whether all the properties in 1947 suffered from internal flooding.

In Surrey, which includes the Thames, Bourne and Wey, 231 properties were affected in 2003, as against 333 in 2000 and 7,015 in 1947. In the area from Spelthorne borough, which involves the Thames and the Colne, the figure for 2003 was approximately 60 properties, whereas in 1947 it was 2,114. Those figures are evidence of the huge investment in flood defence made by successive Governments.

I shall struggle to respond to all the questions that I have been asked. I shall respond first to the hon. Member for Spelthorne, since it was his debate, so he has perhaps a greater entitlement to answers.

I do not often do this in such debates, but I shall agree to the three points about which the hon. Gentleman asked me. First, he wanted the facts, and we are keen to provide those; secondly, he wanted the plans to be examined in an attempt to minimise the risk to his area, and we are happy to agree to that; thirdly, he asked about funding, and I can assure him that funding will increase year on year.

Mr. Wilshire: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Morley: I have only four minutes remaining, but I will do so.

Mr. Wilshire: Year on year will not do. I want to know how much and when.

Mr. Morley: The actual details are published by the regional flood defence committee, and it has strong reserves to deal with the legitimate issues concerning contractors and land purchases which may arise from the plans. The committee has a very good record.

I shall comment briefly on the Jubilee river, because I know that it is of concern to hon. Members. I should make it clear that, based on the information that I have seen, I am satisfied that the Jubilee river did not have an impact on the properties on the Thames which were flooded.

The Jubilee scheme protected approximately 400 properties from flooding and a further 1,000 properties from disruption by the floods. I understand that people may be concerned about the scheme, which is new. However, its details were examined by a public inquiry in 1992 which concluded that the downstream effects would be minimal.

This year, the water levels rose very fast, faster than in 2000, both upstream and downstream of the Jubilee river. The impact of the Maidenhead flood release scheme on peak water levels upstream was also negligible. The water levels downstream were measured using the best data available from the gauges on the tailwaters of the weirs; the readings of the peak flood levels from those weirs cover all major floods since 1894. If the Jubilee river were causing downstream levels to rise, we would expect to see evidence of that at the gauges downstream of where the Jubilee river re-enters the Thames. However, there is no such evidence.

Mr. Wilshire rose—

Mr. Morley: I have only two minutes, and I want to deal with the independent aspect. I will then give way if I have time.

I may be able to reassure the hon. Gentleman about the reviews. The Environment Agency has commissioned Gibb Ltd., which is an independent engineering consultant. That is why there is no case for funding further independent reviews, although I can assure the hon. Gentleman that the Environment Agency and DEFRA will be happy to co-operate with any sort of review. Gibb Ltd. was commissioned to re-run an updated hydraulic model, using the 2003 flood data, to determine the impact on downstream flood levels. That model was run with and without the flood alleviation channel.

The preliminary findings presented to the Environment Agency showed no significant difference between levels in the Thames just downstream of where the Jubilee river joins it, with or without the flood alleviation channel. Residents will, of course, be invited to examine the data that have been collected, and to speak to staff about their origin and the analysis. In due course, when the full data are produced, they will be made available to all interested parties.

I hope that in the three-hour debate there will be more chance to talk through the details, but I make it absolutely clear that although I understand residents' anxieties, and we will take steps to reassure them, the Jubilee river was not responsible for the recent flooding.

Alzheimer's Disease

3.30 pm

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole): First, I pay tribute to my constituent, Mr. Mervyn Richardson, who brought the issue to my attention and who has been campaigning on behalf of his wife, Beryl, who has Alzheimer's. Much of what I shall say is personal to him, but I will make general points.

There is no question but that the three Alzheimer drugs, which were reviewed in 2000 by the National Institute for Clinical Excellence, enhance the cognitive skills of Alzheimer sufferers as well as the quality of life of the sufferers and their carers. It is important to remember the carers, too.

My constituent made a video called "A Sweeter Pill to Swallow—Beryl's Story", which emphasises the improvements that can be achieved. It should be remembered that Beryl started her galantamine—Reminyl—treatment with a mini-mental state examination score of 11. The NICE recommendation is a minimum of 12. By June 2001, within a month of reaching the full drug, Beryl's MMSE score had increased to more than 17. It fell off to 10 in March 2002 and, in accordance with NICE guidance, Beryl was taken off her Reminyl treatment when her cognitive skills fell dramatically.

Beryl was put pack on the Reminyl treatment, at my constituent's instigation, when her skills improved. She was then administered 150 per cent. of licensed dose and she again improved. Her MMSE in November 2002 was recorded as 17. The fact that Beryl was able to contribute to the video made in October 2002 says a great deal about the benefit of the treatment with Galantamine.

All three drugs, Aricept, Exelon and Reminyl, cost about £1,000 per annum, as does memantine—Ebixa. Alzheimer's disease is a major killer in the developed countries; some put it as the third most lethal. My constituent feels strongly that it should be given a much higher priority, as are cancer and heart disease.

All those three drugs inhibit the acetylcholine esterase. In addition, galantamine via the nicotinic receptors enhances the production of more acetylcholine, the brain chemical messenger, on which brain cell to brain cell communication depends. Hence, Galantamine is far more cost-effective than the other two NICE-approved drugs.

In October 2002, a fourth Alzheimer drug, Ebixa, was licensed in the United Kingdom. It works differently from the other three. Ebixa decreases in the brain the level of glutamate, which leads to neuronal disfunction. It has been successfully used in Germany for 10 years and in several other EU states for a varying number of years.

Ebixa is reported to be of value for sufferers with more severe Alzheimer's disease than the other three drugs, and my constituent is concerned that it has not been referred to NICE for consideration. In a parliamentary answer, the Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Redditch (Jacqui Smith), made it clear that that would not happen yet.

Monthly Index of Medical Specialties, in announcing Ebixa, does not refer to it having to be prescribed initially by a specialist, as is the case for the three other inhibitor drugs. Some 60 per cent. of sufferers benefit from the use of the three inhibitor drugs. For some like Beryl, the improvement is dramatic. Some sufferers who do not benefit may not do so because their carers have not been adequately trained in how to deal with the side effects.

The cost of all four drugs is about £1,000 a year, which is good value for money if it delays the onset of the disease and saves up to £20,000 that may be needed to keep somebody in care. As cancer drugs are prescribed in combination, there is an excellent reason for Ebixa to be prescribed in combination with one of the other inhibiting drugs, especially Reminyl. My constituent would like that to be considered as part of treatment in future.

The problem in Poole—there is the same problem in Bournemouth—is that the primary care trust has declined to prescribe Ebixa because its drug budget is about £1 million overspent. Although Andrew Morris, the chief executive, whom I saw at the weekend, said that a much bigger provision is being made for next year, there is a real problem for many primary care trusts, as the Minister will understand.

My constituent is concerned that mismanagement of drug budgets means that pressure is placed on some more expensive drugs, such as those for Alzheimer sufferers, and their not being delivered. His view is that people on prescriptions should be subject to blood tests to ensure that they are taking the medicine. There is a problem in ensuring that people who pick up repeat prescriptions take the drugs. We all know examples of people who do not. I suppose that there are civil liberty worries about that. Nevertheless, we need to manage the drugs budget much better if we are to provide more expensive drugs to Alzheimer sufferers.

In the case of Alzheimer sufferers, drugs need to be used under the supervision of a responsible carer. Hence, the likelihood of an Alzheimer drug being administered as directed is far greater than for any other drug, especially for an aged out-patient. In many cases, the progressive nature of Alzheimer's leads to incontinence, which is degrading to sufferers and carers. The onset of that can be delayed by the administration of, for example, Reminyl. Incontinence pads are expensive and cost many thousands of pounds. My constituent was concerned to learn recently that Dorset health care trust has an 18-week delay before it can assess whether people should receive incontinence pads. Such delays will cause hygiene problems for sufferer and carer, and there is greater likelihood of depression and, sometimes, suicide.

It is important that drugs are prescribed at the earliest possible stage. In times of obvious economic stringency in the NHS, my constituent fails to understand why primary care trusts are permitted to prescribe Aricept and Exelon when it has been clearly demonstrated that Reminyl has double action, and that its effects are greater and last longer.

It is extremely unreasonable of Poole primary care trust to refuse to allow the prescribing of Ebixa when the signs are that that well-tried drug is effective for those in the far more advanced state of Alzheimer's. Additionally, far too many patients who qualify for inhibitor drugs are experiencing delays in referral by GPs. There are delays in assessments and, if a scan is required, the delays are even greater. As inhibitor drugs slow down the onset of the disease, such delays may have a real impact on their performance when they are finally administered.

There is a difficulty with postcode rationing. Hampshire has a different regime from Poole, and there is a worry that people are treated differently throughout the country. If we study diagnosis and the treatment rate for Alzheimer's throughout Europe, we see that France, north America and Spain have a far higher rate of diagnosis and administration of the drugs than us. I wonder whether the disease has high enough priority in the United Kingdom.

My constituent is concerned that he has had a long fight for the drugs that his wife requires. He is a chemist who has a list of qualifications as long as my arm. He knows what he is doing, and he worked for the United Nations for many years. His worry is about not only his case, but the cases of others who have to fight for drugs on behalf of their loved ones. The important point is that the sooner an assessment is made and inhibitor drugs are administered, the better the patient's chance of at least a good 12 months before the onset of more serious problems. We must bear in mind the consequent quality of life for them and the carer as well as the savings for the national health service.

My constituent is extremely keen on the World Health Organisation's comment that every country, no matter what the constraints on its resources, can do something to improve the mental health of its people. The courage and commitment to take the necessary steps are required. He wants to hear from the Minister that that disease has the highest priority, that there will not be postcode rationing, that the drugs that have an appreciable effect in slowing down the disease are being delivered and that we can improve quality of life for people who face trying circumstances, sometimes towards the end of their years. Occasionally, however, young people suffer from Alzheimer's. It is not exclusively suffered by the elderly.

I welcome the support of my constituency neighbour, the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mrs. Brooke). I am sure that our constituencies on the south coast have a high proportion of pensioners, that such problems occur regularly and that the Minister's response will be dear to the heart of many of my constituents.

Mrs. Annette L. Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing the debate. The issue is important, because our constituencies contain a high proportion of pensioners.

One of my constituents contacted me today, and I would like to ask the hon. Gentleman whether he has heard of similar cases. She wants her husband to get the best possible care, so she works in a café at lunchtime to earn the £110 a month it costs for drugs that are not available locally. She is heartbroken that those drugs are available in neighbouring areas.

Mr. Syms: The hon. Lady makes a powerful point. As I said—I hope that the Minister responds—the drugs cost about £1,000 a year. Problems can arise if primary care trusts are under budgetary pressures. In such circumstances, people sometimes have to spend their own money on their loved ones. One can understand that, but it is difficult and annoying when people see that neighbouring primary care trusts take a different view to theirs.

I have said enough. I have a great regard for my constituent, and for his caring and campaigning for his wife. I hope that the Minister clearly sets out Government policy on the issue.

3.40 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Ms Hazel Blears): I congratulate the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) on securing this important debate. He has raised issues of wide interest and concern to people throughout the country, not just in his own constituency. I am aware of the campaigning work of the hon. Gentleman's constituent, who has produced a video—which was met with some acclaim—that highlights some of the issues, and I pay personal tribute to the work that he has done in caring for his wife.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the importance of carers and families at the start of his speech. We should all be aware that although such work is often expressed as being a burden, many people care gladly for their families. We must ensure that we put in as much support as we can for people who take on such responsibilities.

Alzheimer's disease affects a large number of people in this country; it involves not only the patients, but their families and carers. Although drug treatment is important—the hon. Gentleman has concentrated on that and I will refer specifically to those issues—care for such patients revolves around a series of health and social care interventions as well as the available medical drugs. It is important that we try to give as much holistic support as we can. Because the disease is so widespread, there is intense interest in new drug treatments that are being developed to alleviate or delay the progression of the disease and which may eventually result in a cure.

It is estimated that there are about 600,000 people with dementia in the UK. About 5 per cent. of people over 65 have dementia, rising to about 20 per cent. of people who are over 80. The number of people who live to a more advanced age is rapidly increasing, so the number of people with dementia is also increasing, and we expect that increase to become significant in the coming years. It is estimated that by 2026 there will be 840,000 people with dementia, rising to 1.2 million by 2050. That is on the horizon, and it will become an area of increasing concern. Many people of advanced years have a wide range of medical conditions, which means that caring for them is a complex task.

It is estimated that Alzheimer's disease causes up to 60 per cent. of dementia cases; the figures that I mentioned earlier are for dementia cases as a whole. Alzheimer's is characterised by a widespread loss of mental function, and features memory loss, difficulties with language, disorientation and, sometimes, a change in personality, which can be difficult to cope with. People with dementia and their carers need high-quality services to ensure effective diagnosis, treatment and wide support.

We recognise the importance of meeting the mental health needs of older people—the hon. Gentleman outlined the World Health Organisation's statement on mental health needs—and that is why we have made it a priority. It is one of the eight standards in the older people's national service framework, which shows that it is one of the Government's clinical priorities. The NSF was published in March 2001 and covers a range of issues for older people such as rooting out age discrimination. That is important because age discrimination should not influence the way in which primary care trusts exercise their policies on the prescription of drugs.

The NSF also contains a specific section on mental health care for older people. The standard says that older people with mental health problems should have access to integrated mental health services provided by both the NHS and local authorities which ensure effective diagnosis, treatment and support for them and their carers. That is a wide description of the Government's priority and the way in which requirements should be met locally.

Standard 7 sets out a detailed service model that states what older people with mental health problems are entitled to. It also contains a series of milestones to allow us to monitor progress. They are due to be introduced in 2004, and we are gathering information about what local communities are doing to ensure that they comply with the milestones in the service model. The framework is pretty rigorous and the mental health services that older people receive in the future will not be hit and miss; they should be able to rely on the framework wherever they live.

That is important because the hon. Gentleman made a great deal out of the postcode rationing of drugs, although we were all well aware of that several years ago, before the advent of the National Institute for Clinical Excellence, when postcode rationing of services was just as much of a problem. The introduction of the NSFs will do for services what I genuinely believe that NICE did for new drugs and emerging technologies.

Anti-dementia drugs are only a small element of the range of health and social services that older people with dementia need, but it is fair to say that they are becoming increasingly important. Three main anti-dementia drugs are available; their proper names are donepezil, rivastigmine and galantamine. They are used as part of the treatment for people with mild to moderate Alzheimer's, and although they cannot cure the disease, they can delay the onset of more serious symptoms.

In January 2001, NICE recommended that the three drugs should be available on the NHS as one component of the management of people with mild to moderate Alzheimer's disease. We provided that the NHS should be under a statutory duty to make drugs available after a ruling from NICE, and the statutory duty has bitten on the service. People are entitled to expect the three approved drugs to be available when they are deemed to be clinically suitable. If people with Alzheimer's disease meet the criteria for requiring the drugs, they should be able to access them on the NHS.

We are aware that there has been a steady increase in prescribing since the NICE judgment. When NICE considered the issue, it estimated that the total cost of the three drugs was likely to rise to about £42 million a year, but it would take at least three years to reach that level because people would need to go through an assessment and it would have to be determined how the drugs could help with the holistic care of people with Alzheimer's.

Data for 2001–02 indicate that about £13.5 million was spent to meet the cost of dispensing the three anti-dementia drugs as a result of primary care prescribing. Prescribing has continued to increase during 2002–03, although we do not yet have figures for the full year. However, hospitals prescribe a considerable amount of Alzheimer's drugs and that is not included in the PCT prescribing budgets, which means that we do not have the figures on that. We expect prescribing to increase at a steady rate as more PCTs prescribe the drugs. Almost 100 per cent. of PCTs are prescribing the first of the drugs, and about 87 to 95 per cent. are prescribing the other two. Clinicians are finding the drugs an increasingly useful way in which to manage people with Alzheimer's.

The situation is different for the new anti-dementia drug, memantine. It was launched in the UK in October, so it has not been around for very long. Because it is the only drug for moderate to severe Alzheimer's, there is inevitably great interest in its availability. We do not yet have any prescribing data with which to analyse its availability, but we know that some people are obtaining it on the NHS and some are obtaining it privately.

The state of affairs is clear. NICE has yet to assess memantine for clinical and cost effectiveness, so for the moment NHS bodies across the country have to access the publicly available evidence and determine local policies for the drug's use. The same applies to any treatment that has not yet been approved by NICE; that is an established position, and it is for PCTs and clinicians to decide locally on their policy.

We can perhaps anticipate what the hon. Member for Poole will ask next. The question now, obviously, is when will NICE appraise memantine. We are considering including an appraisal of the drug in the next—and eighth—wave of NICE's work. Announcements should be made about that wave in the next few weeks, so hon. Members will not have to wait months for it. Submissions for the appraisal are currently before Ministers, and NICE will then determine its timetable for the next wave. As I say, the drug came on to the UK market only in October, and some five months later, we are considering putting it before NICE for its next wave of work. That is a sign of the importance that the Government attach to the issue.

I recognise that even that period is disappointing for those who think that memantine should immediately be available to all people with moderate to severe Alzheimer's, but we must recognise that there are enormous pressures on the NHS, and particularly on PCTs and their prescription duties. It is therefore essential that we assess the clinical and cost effectiveness of a drug before making it generally available on the NHS. We now have a statutory duty, once a drug has been before NICE, to make sure that we follow through and enforce its decisions.

The hon. Members for Poole and for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mrs. Brooke) both mentioned postcode rationing. Before the introduction of NICE, there was a free-for-all as to which patients could obtain which drugs. The introduction of NICE has led to a much more rational and coherent system of drug and technology use. I am sure that, as a result of the spending review settlement, both hon. Members' local PCTs will experience a real-terms significant increase in investment over the next three years. That increase will probably be in the region of 7 or 8 per cent. a year for most PCTs.

I recognise that there are still pressures on budgets because PCTs have so much to do, and the expectations of their communities are so great, but, to be fair, hon. Members, should acknowledge that significant real-terms extra investment is going into the NHS at every level and in every community in the country. The Government have decided that it is right to make that investment to make sure that we can get not just drugs, but services and facilities for patients, wherever they may be.

I am pleased to say that, in Poole, the PCT is able fully to implement the NICE guidance on the three Alzheimer's drugs that have already been approved. People can get referrals to the psychiatrist for older people, and are then able to access the drugs, despite the fact that there is immense pressure on Poole's budgets. I am also informed that the PCT has done an excellent job of managing its prescribing, and it provides some very good services.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the importance that his constituents attach to proper medicines management, and he said that there needs to be good, tight control on which medicines are taken. Obviously, that is an important subject for the Government, both in terms of being cost effective and ensuring that drugs are not wasted, and in terms of ensuring that patients take their drugs properly. One of the biggest reasons for admission to hospital is people not taking their medicines properly and having severe interactions between medicines. That causes extra cost and distress.

I am pleased to say that, in Poole, 82 per cent. of GP practices have implemented annual reviews of medication for people aged 75 and over. GPs sit down with patients, go through all their medicines and see whether the prescription is up to date and which drugs are no longer needed. They actively manage the medicines that people are taking. That is happening throughout the country. Bournemouth PCT now has a multidisciplinary group that covers medicine management. High priority has been given by PCTs to ensuring that medicines are managed extremely carefully so that money is not wasted and patients get appropriate care.

I understand that recent research suggests that we are getting much closer to finding the cause of Alzheimer's disease, and to working out methods of early diagnosis and of preventing its development. It is an exciting time for people working in the field. Although the drugs that are available provide only temporary respite, the future looks brighter than it did a few years ago. The theme of the Alzheimer's Society awareness week this year will be new treatments in the future.

I wish the society and researchers in the field well in their work. I hope that, over the next 10 years, they will be able to produce more new drugs significantly to improve the quality of life of people with dementia. The new drugs approved by NICE have had a significant effect on the quality of some people's lives and those of their carers. We do not devalue or denigrate that important work. However, when we authorise the use of drugs nationally, we must ensure that we make the right decisions based on proper evidence put forward by NICE and that those decisions can be followed up in every part of the country.

I was interested to hear that the hon. Gentleman's constituent thinks that Reminyl is more effective than the two drugs approved by NICE. I will make further inquiries, because I was not personally aware of that information. There may be other research projects going on to examine the most cost-effective use of the drugs already approved.

It is fair to say that improvements have been made to the care of people with Alzheimer's in the immediate vicinity of the hon. Gentleman's constituency—in the availability of medicines and the health and social care supported by the local council. Those improvements are mirrored in many different communities throughout the country. It may be accurate to say that Alzheimer's was a neglected disease, but as people are living longer, the problem will increasingly become all too apparent to hundreds of thousands of families who may have to live for a long time with Alzheimer's sufferers. Research, good drugs, good support and care for carers will therefore be extremely important.

I am pleased to say that the carer's grant, which was introduced in 1999, was extended in July 2002 for a further three years until 2005–06. During that time, it will more than double to £185 million to provide extended care and 130,000 further breaks to carers. That is a significant step towards recognising the work of carers in looking after members of their family and friends who unfortunately suffer from Alzheimer's. We have also implemented the invalid care allowance, which will be renamed the carer's allowance, to ensure that people have some independence and some financial recompense for their caring work. That will ensure also that there is an individual assessment of the carers' needs, as well as those of the people being looked after.

The framework shows sufferers from the disease and their families that the Government take this work extremely seriously and that we will continue to assess and evaluate each new drug and development. We are also interested in making sure that people have access to the highest quality care on the most equitable basis possible throughout the country. I thank the hon. Gentleman for raising this issue today. I know about the work of his constituent, who has done an extremely good job in caring for his wife in these circumstances. I undertake to ensure that this issue is kept at the forefront of the Government's thinking and that it remains a priority for us.

Severn Barrage

4 pm

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore): I am grateful for this opportunity to initiate a debate on the vital topic of renewable energy in the United Kingdom, in particular on the potential of the Severn barrage. I want to thank the World Wildlife Fund and the Severn tidal energy group for submitting their thoughts, which have informed my views from different perspectives.

The Severn barrage is a mythical creature, seemingly lost in the mists of time—or lost in the mists of the Severn estuary on a dank winter day. It is now a legendary apparition, somewhat akin to the Loch Ness monster, occasionally sighted rearing its curious form along the banks of the Gwent levels. Does it really exist? Is it just a fable from children's tales or—if one takes a different view—a nightmarish vision designed to send children quivering in fright to bed along the shores of Severnside? On the contrary, it is real—or, at least, it could be. In fact, it is like something in a fairy tale—a Peter Pan. If enough people believe in it—in particular, those strange people known as Members of Parliament and Cabinet Ministers—the Severn barrage could live again. It could return from folklore and become a part of a living, breathing, modern Wales and United Kingdom.

The first proposals for a Severn barrage were made in the 1840s, so it could be argued that if it has not happened by now, it never will. However, the first proposal for the channel tunnel was in 1802—so you never know.

My background has given me a special interest in this subject. More than 10 years ago, I was a student at that excellent seat of learning that is Swansea Institute of Higher Education, a leading light in vocational and applied education in south Wales. That is sufficient praise to satisfy my lecturers and former colleagues. As part of my MSc in European leisure resource management, I assisted peripherally in research in a European project known as the Esturiales study with my former professor and close friend, Graham King. The study involved a detailed analysis of several major estuaries in Europe, including the Severn, in an attempt to put forward proposals for estuary zone management.

The study was complementary to my MSc, rather than an integral part of it, and although I was extremely grateful for the opportunity to work closely on such an important project and to travel to some interesting places in Europe, I still remember saying to Graham—who was also my dissertation tutor—nine months into the 12 months of my course, "Don't you think that it is now time to start on my dissertation?" His response was non-committal, and we turned our minds back to more important matters, such as the European project that we were engaged upon.

One of the prime aspects of EZM is conflict resolution in marine and coastal environments that recognises the special contribution that estuaries make to biodiversity. Although the Severn is not identical to the Tagus, for example, it is a splendid exemplar of the many conflicts that exist in such environments. There are shipping movements, leisure craft, special marine habitats, wetlands, sand dredging and commercial fishing, historic sites along the tidal reaches, and, not least, it is an attractive leisure venue for walkers and tourists. In short, like all great European estuaries, it is a marvel of nature.

However, it is also a marvel of the influence of mankind and womankind. It is a living, working, thriving animal that has co-existed with, and been modified by, humankind since historical records began. Ports and jetties have altered the shape of the coast. Extraction—currently a controversial issue—has fed the economic development along its shores. Farmers have helped to shape the coastline. Roads have skimmed its surface on bridges that link the Celtic homeland with the land of its former inheritance across the water, and rail tunnels burrow beneath it.

The English and Welsh communities that inhabit the coast of the Severn are separated by a vast pool, but in many ways they have shared a common past, living with and off the bounty and beauty of this powerful stretch of water. Like many intimate relationships, it has always been about power to some degree. We have ever been the submissive partner, recognising that the Severn is a mistress of immense power. It is the second largest tidal reach in the world after the Bay of Fundy—where, by the way, tidal power is operational. We are, in effect, a houseguest, and we take what we are given and are grateful. The issue now is whether the long-term houseguest reasserts its rights and takes a greater share of what is on offer. If so, can the two live happily ever after? That is the great conundrum of sustainable development. The puzzle is never more illuminating than in discussions on the Severn barrage, which while offering huge potential benefits, has a direct impact on three sites of special scientific interest, a special protection area under the European birds directive, a Ramsar site and a proposed special area of conservation. Therefore, proposals for the barrage should not be taken lightly.

In 1989, the Severn barrage project general report derived from the tripartite studies examined the feasibility and impact of an ebb-tide electricity generating barrage stretching from Brean down near Weston-super-Mare to Lavernock point near Cardiff. It rapidly ran into confrontation, especially over costs and environmental concerns.

Paul Flynn (Newport, West): My hon. Friend's speech deserves support for its literary merit alone. Powerful environmental groups that could generally be described as friends of the mud spoke out against the ambitious Severn barrage. They made a strong case and stopped it. Does my hon. Friend consider that the best practical way forward would be the more modest proposals of islands that would use both the power of the tide and that of the wind to generate electricity, but in a way that would not be environmentally disruptive?

Huw Irranca-Davies: My hon. Friend makes an intelligent point. I do not believe that either proposal should preclude the other at this stage. My sole purpose in having the debate is to ensure that all options are discussed. I agree that technology and the principle that small is beautiful have moved on substantially, but that should not make us too cautious about large-scale projects. Environmental concerns, as he rightly pointed out, are more significant in such estuaries than in other areas. If we fail to discuss adequately a major proposal such as the Severn barrage, with all its pros and cons, we are probably doing a disservice.

After a brief sighting of the mythical barrage creature in 1989, it disappeared under the waves. It is a shy creature, so why is it back? Why has it been sighted once more off the shores of Barry and Weston-super-Mare? I shall explain. The conditions have changed markedly to make the barrage at least worth discussing. I shall highlight the significant factors that make it necessary to discuss this issue, and I shall explain why it must feature in the forthcoming energy White Paper and why it must receive a considered and balanced hearing. The changes are outlined in the recent report that was commissioned by the Department of Trade and Industry, so it must believe that they are worth examining, and will be carried out by the Severn tidal power group.

The three main factors of the report are the reductions in the cost of capital through such mechanisms as project finance, the expanding post-Kyoto market in renewables and greenhouse gas emission savings, and the possible role of the barrage in alleviating the forecast challenges of habitat erosion through global warming. I shall first deal with financial viability. A project of such scale can either cause sleepless nights or break ministerial careers. If 2001 prices were applied to the 1989 energy report, the staggering cost would be £10.3 billion to £14 billion. However, the reduced cost of capital of up to 40 per cent., the restructuring of capital funding for major projects, including public private partnerships, project finance, bond issues and reductions in construction and design costs since 1989 all combine to make the project more financially manageable in terms of capital costs.

Billions of pounds can be psychologically damaging to Ministers and Back Benchers who can feel like rabbits caught in the headlights of an oncoming juggernaut. Surely the money could be spent better elsewhere. However, there is potential under a PPP and project finance approach to give the financial risk to the private sector, with a probable 25-year project cost payback against the backdrop of the Government's assurances on premiums for the energy created during that period. Depending on the financial restructuring, the barrage could be returned to Government at the end of 25-year payback to produce an estimated further 95 years of renewable energy with the minimum of maintenance.

We should consider the forecast costs of the 2012 Olympic games, which official estimates put at more than £2 billion and others at more than £4 billion. No matter how fast the Olympic athletes run or how high they jump, they will not produce 6 per cent. of the electricity needs of England and Wales. The final cost of the channel tunnel was estimated at between £12 billion and £13 billion, but the chunnel does not offer electricity or protection against the effects of global warming, such as flooding and sea-level rises. We should also bear in mind the fact that the lifespan of the electrical dynamo is 120 years of low-maintenance, free energy, so balancing the admittedly huge initial capital cost against a 120-year cycle makes the project not quite so daunting.

Tidal power by barrage has been used with success for 35 years at the 240 MW La Rance range at St. Malo. The Severn barrage could produce an estimated 8.6 GW of electricity, which is 36 times that of St. Malo or, in simple terms, 6 per cent. of the total electricity needs of England and Wales. It is not difficult to see what the 6 per cent. would do for the Government's ambitious targets on renewables, and it would move us away from reliance on carbon-based fuels. Whereas the original EP57 study suggested a capacity of 1.1 GW, the new, more ambitious figure reflects a more efficient use of the tidal energy and augments the overall viability of the project.

The financial considerations are further supported by the fact that the project could be part of new Government thinking on project funding. However, such a project, with an estimated payback of 25 years, would attract private sector backing only if Government offered some surety of the premium for the electricity. Understandably, the private sector wants to reduce the risk in exchange for investing so massively. The cost of such a project is so vast as to be frightening, but the rewards—financial and otherwise—are so constant over the long term and the financial risks in proven technology so easily dealt with that the Government should not be scared. The project is not necessarily a monster; it could be, to coin the name of one of my children's favourite characters, a big, friendly giant.

I emphasise the conditional—the "could". The WWF has kindly noted:

> "While a Severn Barrage presents an exciting project for engineers and politicians that could provide a major contribution to our renewables in future, it would be a large, costly and permanent construction that would alter the environment of the whole area with major ramifications for the ecology and behaviour of the estuary as a natural system."

Like those who live along the Severn, it has genuine concerns that prevent support for the Severn barrage at present. Those concerns include restrictions on fish movements, the impact on designated wetlands and mudflats, and the impact on coastal birds, sand movements and beaches. There are also questions about the barrage's impact on shipping, especially any future demands by Bristol for larger shipping and dredging.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones (Cardiff, Central): Does my hon. Friend share the perception that whenever schemes that have an ecological impact are proposed, people focus on the negative ecological impact and rarely examine the potential positives? I examined the project at university and noted that it would increase the amount of biodiversity in the land beyond the estuary, so it would have a net benefit on biological creatures living in that area.

Huw Irranca-Davies: My hon. Friend is correct. Although I do not intend to go far down that line of argument, the full cost-benefit analysis and environmental impact assessment of such a large project should take into account not only the possible negatives, but the possible positive externalities on the environment. Creating a stable water platform behind the barrage, with the increase in biodiversity that has been suggested, is a benefit and needs to be taken into account.

These and other concerns must be investigated further. However, they will not be explored unless the barrage features in the energy White Paper. This is a case in which a few printed words can open a debate or stifle it before it has begun.

[Huw Irranca-Davies]

The other potential benefits include the significance of areas of change in the post-Kyoto targets on renewables, which now create a viable market for renewables and for savings through reductions in greenhouse gas emissions. The barrage could reduce emissions by up to 18 million tonnes a year or 3 per cent. of the United Kingdom's carbon-based emissions. The Government's own forecast suggests that the UK could be a net importer of gas by 2006, and could source up to 90 per cent. of our gas demand beyond our shores by 2020. In strategic terms, it is clearly in the UK's interests to explore methods of reducing exposure to non-UK sources and, as we all intend, of reducing our reliance on nuclear energy.

DEFRA reports that the annual cost of flood damage in the Severnside region is £120 million a year. That is estimated to rise to an incredible £4 billion by 2075. If a barrage can mitigate those costs by managing the extremes of tide and flood, that should be included in the debate. In the absence of a barrage, the existing shoreline plan anticipates that the rate of coastal erosion through climate change will increase and lead to the loss of the habitat that we discussed earlier, but—it is a big but—much of the prevailing thinking on the marine energy contribution to sustainable development focuses on the smaller scale, such as tidal pools, small-scale barrages and wave energy.

There is something of the Schumaker "small is beautiful" argument here. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Paul Flynn) mentioned, there is a corresponding danger of piecemeal development and an incremental creep towards targets that are never reached and that recede into the distance. If we are firm in our intentions on renewable energy, all options, large and small, should figure in the discussion. That is not so much blue-sky thinking as blue-water thinking. Let us not rule out any options.

Why should I be interested in the subject as a representative of Ogmore? That is not Ogmore-by-Sea, by the way—that delightful coastal village—but Ogmore, the thoroughly land-locked constituency. The potential benefits that I outlined could be good not only for the people along the Severn, but for the people of Wales, the rest of the UK and all the nations whose signatures embellish the Kyoto treaty, as well as those that regrettably do not.

These arguments make further examination worthwhile. If the barrage is viable, we should be courageous in our support. If it is not, we should rule it out and focus our energies elsewhere. It is time to see whether the mythic Severn barrage, like the channel tunnel, can be made real, or whether it should be consigned to folklore for evermore.

Alan Howarth (Newport, East): I shall be brief, as we want to hear the Minister's response.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies) made an important, elegant and eloquent speech. As he said, the subject has been discussed for a very long time—longer, even, than the discussion on the reform of the House of Lords. We know that we need security of energy supply and a reduction in our CO_2 emissions. Unless a new generation of nuclear power stations is to be built, which we do not want, we also know that we must find environmentally sustainable sources of new energy.

Nuclear power will make a smaller contribution to our overall energy supply. It will, as my hon. Friend noted, be risky to depend increasingly on imported gas, and we should not look the tidal gift horse in the mouth. There is an enormous potential source of energy for the harnessing. Of course the wider environmental impact must be considered very carefully. As my hon. Friends noted, there are pluses as well as minuses to the environmental impact. The matter is complex, but we must consider it.

There will clearly be problems in financing such a vast project. However, we famously have the lowest long-term interest rates in a very long time and have gained the experience of public-private partnerships, so we can finance projects such as this if we decide that it is the right thing to do and if we have the will to do it. I join my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore in hoping that the energy White Paper will include a commitment thoroughly to study the feasibility of the Severn barrage and the arguments for and against it. My hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West will agree that those living on the shores of the Severn are not frightened of open-minded and intelligent analysis of the project. Responsibility will straddle the UK Government and the Welsh Assembly, just as the barrage will straddle the Bristol channel. That provides an additional challenge, but there is no reason why the work should not be undertaken.

4.19 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Don Touhig): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies) on securing the debate. He has long taken a keen interest in renewable energy and, in particular, the proposals for the Severn tidal barrage. I had planned to say more about renewable energy, but time prevents me from doing much on that front. Members will be aware that the Minister for Energy and Construction cannot be here, so, as Wales Office Minister with responsibility for green issues, I am responding on the Government's behalf.

The UK has spent considerable sums—£20 million in all, of which the Government provided £12 million—in evaluating the potential of generating electricity from tidal barrages. The scheme, part of the new and renewable energy programme, ran from 1978 to 1994. Tidal barrages use well-established technology. Several locations around the world have been studied, but relatively few projects have been constructed. The first and largest, with a capacity of 240 MW, is on an estuary near St. Malo. When I paid a visit, I was greatly impressed by what I saw.

The UK programme included a detailed study of the Severn and the Mersey barrages, as well as less detailed studies of the Wyre, the Duddon, the Conwy and the Loughor. As assessment of the overall UK potential was also undertaken, together with an underpinning programme of generic studies, largely addressing environmental issues.

In July 1993, the Conservative Government nnounced the programme's closure. Energy Paper 62, Government evaluation of the prospects for renewable nergy published in 1994, estimated the total accessible esource at about 50 TWh per year—about 12 per cent. f our current electricity supply. Ninety per cent. came rom eight larger sites and the rest was distributed across bout 30 smaller sites around the country. Of the total, ess than 40 per cent.—19 TWh a year—was available at ess than 10p per kWh at 1992 prices, using an 8 per cent. iscount. At the time, it was not seen as attractive as ther options. Potential non-energy benefits were seen s relatively small, as was the potential for reducing osts.

The Severn was the largest potential project studied nd the total cost of the Severn evaluation programme vas £8 million, of which the Government provided £4.8 nillion. With a capacity of nearly 9,000 MW and an utput of 17 TWh per year—more than 4 per cent. of otal current UK supply—the Severn barrage would be ne of the largest civil engineering projects in the world nd by far the largest renewable energy generation cheme in the UK. It would mean building a 10-mile arrage between the Severn estuary and the Bristol hannel, just downstream of a line between Cardiff and Weston-super-Mare, enclosing about 140 miles of oastline.

At 1994 prices, the cost of generation was estimated t 7.5p per kWh at an 8 per cent. discount rate, rising to 7p per kWh at a 15 per cent. discount rate, excluding rid reinforcement costs. As with all such capital-ntensive schemes, generation costs are highly sensitive o the discount rate.

In July 2001, the Government commissioned the Severn tidal power group, an industry grouping that co-sponsored the earlier programme, to undertake a short study of the project to establish whether developments since 1994 justified a more substantial review of the project and to define what issues such a review would need to cover. The report was published last month, making it clear that significant changes have occurred that would affect the scheme, though not all point in the same direction.

Since 1989, the cost of power generation has gone down and the completion of the second Severn crossing has reduced the potential benefits of a road crossing over the barrage, while existing and planned increases in the size of shipping using the Bristol channel and the Severn estuary could have a significant impact on the scheme, throwing into doubt the size of the shipping locks in the earlier design. Any restrictions on the port of Bristol would have severe commercial consequences. We have also, of course, become much more aware of environmental issues, as other Members mentioned earlier.

There is no doubt that, with the loss of approximately 65 per cent. of the inter-tidal area, a barrage would have a major effect on the ecosystems of the Severn estuary. Constructing the barrage would result in the loss of the unique tidal nature of the estuary and cause major problems for migratory fish such as salmon. The Environment Agency believes that substantial environmental loss to conservation and biodiversity would be likely.

However, the study group pointed to the likelihood of increasing flood damage in the Severn estuary due to global warming, and therefore pointed out the possible additional benefits of the barrage in protecting the Severn valley. I should note, however, that although the barrage would afford protection against tidal surges, the Environment Agency believes that that would be a very expensive way to provide flood protection.

The study estimates that the cost of the scheme would be between £10 billion and £14 billion at 2001 prices. Pre-construction activities, including a £30 million environmental assessment, might cost £300 million over five years, and construction would take a further five to seven years until barrage closure, with full power generation about two years after that. Those are significant sums by any stretch of the imagination. However, peak employment during construction might reach 30,000 to 40,000 people, about half of whom would come from the Severn side.

The report suggests that the project might be financed by the private sector through the bond market over 40 years or more at a cost equivalent of about 6p per kWh. That would, however, be about twice the amount of UK sterling project bonds issued to date, and it would require a high degree of security in terms of the future income stream from the project. The study group suggested that that could be achieved by a public-private partnership contract let by the Government or by underpinning obligations for the purchase of the output. In effect, the private sector would underwrite the construction risk, but the Government would underwrite the future income stream needed to secure the project's financing.

Huw Irranca-Davies: I am sorry to intervene in such a time-limited debate. Will the Minister acknowledge also that the nature of the project is such—it involves proven technology—that there is less long-term risk? It would not be like other PPPs or large schemes such as the channel tunnel, because it does not have that element of risk.

Mr. Touhig: That would depend on when the project started, were it to go ahead, and on design costs and the market. If there were to be a public-private partnership, we would have to make a commercial judgment on that matter. It is clear, therefore, that the project would not proceed on a fully commercial basis in the private sector.

On the basis of the study, the group concludes that a more substantial reappraisal of the project would be needed. The Government have not yet reached such a conclusion, but plan to set out their policy towards large-scale tidal barrage developments in the forthcoming White Paper, which will be music to the ears of my hon. Friend.

The further studies recommended by the report would cost about £3 million, although, as has been made clear, much larger sums would be needed for a complete environmental appraisal. We are considering whether that would represent good value for money. Clearly, I cannot pre-empt the publication of the White Paper, but in reaching our conclusion we will take full account of the report and of the views expressed in the debate.

I conclude by emphasising the Government's commitment to renewable energy. We have set ambitious targets, and believe that this is an exciting time for renewables. The Government are determined to push forward on that agenda. Our task in meeting the demanding targets that we have set requires the vision to carry forward our objectives and to turn that potential into reality. There are many barriers in our path, but the rewards are immense—reliable sources of clean energy, a reduction in carbon emissions and a developing renewables industry will be crucial to our country's future. We all need to work together to achieve that.

I commend my hon. Friend for securing the debate, and I am grateful to him and to other Members for their contribution. I am sorry that there was not sufficient time to give a fuller reply. We must await the White Paper's publication to see whether it sheds any light on my hon. Friend's ambitions for the Severn barrage.

Question put and agreed to.

Gulf War Illness

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Ainger.]

9.30 am

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): I am grateful for this timely opportunity to raise the issue of Gulf war illness. My purpose is simple: I want to ensure that our troops are not exposed to any unnecessary risks to their health, as they were in the 1991 Gulf war, if and when they are engaged in hostilities in or near Iraq. I hope and pray that such a war never has to take place, but if it does, I would never forgive myself had I not drawn attention to the lessons of the last war. I know that I speak for many others. I am a member of the Royal British Legion Gulf war group, and am only too well aware of the suffering of so many veterans in that conflict. I am delighted that the hon. Member for East Hampshire (Mr. Mates), who is also on that group, is present, as are several hon. Members from all parties who share my anxiety.

Clearly this is an appropriate moment to pay tribute to that group and to the veterans' associations. I must especially thank Colonel Terry English, chairman of the group and Royal British Legion director of welfare, and Professor Malcolm Hooper of the university of Sunderland, for their help in bringing together so much evidence for the debate. I also pay tribute to Lord Morris of Manchester, who has been a determined and persistent supporter of all Gulf war veterans. Recent ministerial answers to his questions in the other place have increased, rather then dispersed, our concerns.

Why should we be worried, because surely the Ministry of Defence is capable of managing the inoculation programme, the application of pesticides and any other possible threat to the long-term health of our troops? I hope so, but frankly the omens are not encouraging. Organophosphate pesticides are extremely dangerous chemicals, as the House knows. They were originally developed by the Nazis in the second world war. From my long-term involvement as chairman of the all-party organophosphate parliamentary group, I am aware that they are now supposedly subject to rigorous controls. However, it was not always so.

Despite ever louder warnings from medical and environmental scientists, it was only in the late 1980s that the Health and Safety Executive issued a comprehensive advice sheet on the dangers. In the early 1990s, I established that other Departments were totally unaware of the serious risks of both acute and chronic health hazards. Even farmers, who were forced to use them for sheep dips by the then Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, were left in the dark.

Guidance note MS 17, which has been updated since the 1980s, provides the following succinct and official description of the signs and symptoms of acute OP poisoning. They include "those related to excessive activity of the autonomic nervous system: miosis (pin-point pupils), blurred vision, lacrimation, excessive salivation, cold sweats, bronchorrhorea, cardia arrhythmias/badycardia with decreased cardia output and hypotension; ... those related to over-reactivity of voluntary muscle: tremors, impaired co-ordination; and ... non-specific symptoms: headache, giddiness, loss of appetite, nausea and diarrhoea."

There are other signs, too, which I need not go into. My point is simply that a great many of the signs and symptoms have been found among troops suffering from Gulf war illnesses. Some are chronic, some are long term, and they are very serious.

As information about the 1991 conflict became available to parliamentarians, I was concerned to know how many of our troops were exposed to OPs, in what conditions and with what precautions. I asked the then Minister for the Armed Forces a parliamentary question. I shall quote his answer extensively because it is extremely important. He said:

"I am aware of only 10 British service personnel who would have been involved with organ-phosphorous pesticides used by United Kingdom forces during the Gulf conflict. These 10 were members of a medical team involved in delousing some 50 Iraqi troops with a dusting powder containing 1 per cent. malathion at the prisoner of war enclosure at Quaisuma. Malathion is recommended in standard therapeutic textbooks as a treatment of choice for lice infestation and several preparations are commercially available in the United Kingdom, including body lotions and shampoos.

No clinical evidence indicative of exposure to organo-phosphates has been found among the service personnel who have come forward with concerns about their health related to service in the Gulf. No specific research into organo-phosphorous has therefore been carried out in relation to the alleged Gulf war syndrome, though evidence from all relevant sources is closely monitored."—[Official Report, 3 November 1994; Vol. 248, c. 1237.]

Amazingly, two years later, at the beginning of October 1996, after an intensive inquiry within the Ministry, the very same Minister had to make an abject apology to the House and to me because he had been completely misled. He said:

"It has become clear, as the House now knows, that organophosphate insecticides were used more widely in the Gulf than we had been led to believe. I regret that the information given to the Defence Select Committee and to other hon. Members in the past few years has proved to be incorrect."—[Official Report, 15 October 1996; Vol. 282, c. 680.]

Many hundreds of our service personnel were exposed to dangerous chemicals in the Gulf, and it was not reassuring to learn about Ministry of Defence lack of competence and transparency, but worse was to follow.

Claims that OPs were used only by trained operatives, with proper precautions and protective clothing, have been specifically challenged by Sergeant Tony Worthington, who has clear photographic evidence. He has shown that operatives were exposed to massive doses of OPs and other pesticides in vapour form. We still do not know whether those OPs, apparently bought locally in Saudi Arabia, were of a type that was banned for use in the UK. We can be sure, however, that any warnings and instructions for use were in a language that was unintelligible for those unsuspecting service personnel. It is not surprising to note that Professor Cherry's research found an association between exposure to pesticides and symptoms of Gulf war illness. Parallel research in the USA is equally alarming.

After that dreadful experience, surely the Ministry of Defence learned its lesson. On 7 January, just a few weeks ago, I tabled a parliamentary question that was answered by the current Minister with responsibility for the armed forces. My question was:

"To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will take steps to ensure that British service personnel are not exposed to organophosphate pesticides when on operations in the Middle East."

In view of the 1991 disasters, I expected a promise to avoid such risks. Instead, he replied:

"The use of pesticides remains an essential component of force protection against the threat of insect borne disease. It is the policy of the Department only to procure pesticides approved under the Control of Pesticides Regulations 1986 or to seek approval from Pesticides Safety Directorate (PSD) of the Health and Safety Executive (HSE) to store items in United Kingdom, for use in overseas locations.

Those pesticides are only supplied to and used by trained personnel, who are fully equipped with the appropriate personal protective equipment."—[Official Report, 7 January 2003; Vol. 397, c. 79W.]

I thought that that would be enough, but decided to make absolutely certain that there would be no risks. So I tabled further questions for answer this week, in which I asked the Secretary of State for Defence what training and guidance is being given to British troops and hygiene units in the use of organophosphate pesticides in any potential conflict in Iraq, and if he will make a statement. I also asked the Secretary of State whether adequate protective equipment is available to British military units using organophosphate pesticides, and if he will make a statement. As of yesterday, all I had received was a holding answer saying that he will answer shortly. Having already drawn attention to the problem, I expected a direct and firm answer to reassure our troops.

So let us get to the truth of it. I have a number of questions for the Under-Secretary. If he cannot answer them all today, I hope that he will write to me. What OPs have been shipped to the Gulf—full names, please—and are they all approved for use in the UK? Will only fully trained operatives be used in the spraying and swing-fogging of any pesticides? Will protective suits and other precautions be employed? What studies of the effect of strong Gulf sunlight on the conversion of malathion into more toxic compounds have been undertaken? What other pesticides have been supplied and are intended for use? Has lindane been supplied, with all its inherent dangers? Pyrethroids are known to be nerve poisons that have a powerful synergistic action with OPs.

Will DEET be issued to troops? It also has a synergistic effect with other pesticides. In 1991, much stronger solutions of DEET than those used in holiday packs were issued. Will those be issued again? What consideration has there been of the cumulative effect of OP exposure and administration of nerve agent pre-treatment set—NAPS—tablets, which attack the same target enzymes in the blood? What assessment has there been of the findings of Mackness and others that Gulf veterans have greatly depressed levels of para-oxonase in their serum? What steps have been taken to prevent repetition of the problems this time? British troops serving their country—serving us—have every right to expect their Government to take all precautions to avoid unnecessary risk, but the evidence is not encouraging.

Another controversial aspect of the preparations for the 1991 hostilities was the inoculation programme. Many Gulf veterans who have since developed serious illnesses have given us evidence of administration of vaccines that was at best slap-happy and at worst downright irresponsible. The combination, in quick succession, of a cocktail of vaccines, quite outside the normal protocols, seems absurdly ill-considered and out of control in many units.

I am no medical expert: others in the Royal British Legion team are far more qualified that I am to deal with such matters. Indeed, other hon. Members in the Chamber have relevant experience, and I hope that they will contribute. The best that I can do is to refer to the submissions made to the United States congressional hearings that we facilitated in the House of Commons last July. For example, the evidence given to those hearings by Professor Graham Rook contained this summary:

"The Hypothesis that we put forward in 1997 was that long-term changes in the balance of the immune system could be caused by multiple vaccinations. This would be exacerbated in psychologically and physically stressed individuals and also by the chemical exposures and this could lead to a diverse range of symptoms including mood changes. So, I am going to show you that five new types of information have come forward to show the hypothesis was not as crazy as it was thought originally and it is within the epidemiology and the immunology done ... it is important because it was saying that giving a massive load of vaccines in the Gulf War could have systemic effect on their overall immune systems for many years after."

I must remind the Under-Secretary of the moving evidence given by Samantha Thompson, widow of Nigel Thompson. She said of her late husband:

"Nigel was a Petty Officer in the Royal Navy Fleet Air Arm and served in the Gulf War in 1991. Shortly after returning from the Gulf he started displaying the symptoms of Motor Neurone disease. Nigel always believed his terminal condition to be attributable to his active service in the Gulf. Right up to his death he fought tirelessly on behalf of Gulf War illness. Nigel also repeatedly called for an independent public inquiry into what went wrong during Operation Desert Storm that left so many military personnel ill or dying."

The failure of the Ministry of Defence even to acknowledge the existence of specific Gulf war illnesses has been especially scandalous, showing a level of cynicism and lack of sensitivity when the US authorities have been much more sympathetic. As long ago as January 1995, the United States Government accepted the need to compensate those suffering from Gulf war illnesses, and I understand that Congress subsequently ordered compensation in the order of $60,000 per veteran.

Meanwhile, the indefatigable Shaun Rusling, who leads the National Gulf Veterans and Families Association, has identified a series of official decisions recognising Gulf war illness despite Ministry of Defence obstinacy. I quote just one. Mr. Alex Izett, a former Royal Engineer, was accepted to have been damaged by the vaccinations by a pensions appeal tribunal just last December. The tribunal found:

"We accept you were vaccinated and we looked at the MOD letter 24.01.01. We note the posity of the vaccination date: we therefore accept the evidence Autoimmune induced osteoporosis caused by vaccines."

That is absolutely specific. I believe that the case may not be contested further by the Ministry. Perhaps the Under-Secretary can confirm that.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South): I have been involved in Mr. Izzet's case, and I understand that he has received a letter from the Ministry saying that it will not contest the decision, but for 12 years it has contested his case. Mr. Izzet has said more than once that he has been close to suicide, which he has attempted at least twice, because of the perilous state that he is in. Indeed, he no longer lives in the United Kingdom because he is so depressed about how he has been treated.

Mr. Tyler: I know that my hon. Friend has been a valiant champion on behalf of not only that veteran, but others as well. It shows the seriousness of many of the cases. Mr. Izzet's case may have a happy ending. I certainly hope so. Perhaps the Under-Secretary can confirm that.

Has the Ministry of Defence learned anything from that muddle and the potentially damaging consequences? Again, the omens are not good. Just a few weeks ago, batches of anthrax and other vaccines were washed up on south Dorset beaches. I asked the Secretary of State for Defence to explain where they came from, expecting him to say that it was nothing to do with the Ministry and that the UK Government did not know the source of the vaccines, as mislaying them at such a sensitive time and in such apparently incompetent circumstances would be peculiar and too mind-boggling to contemplate.

To my amazement, the Under-Secretary replied:

"The anthrax vaccine found on the South Dorset coast is from a batch produced by the centre for Applied Microbiology and Research and purchased by the Ministry of Defence in February 2001. Because ampoules from the batch were issued to a large number of units it has not yet been possible to identify how they came to be in the sea. As far as we are aware, this is the only vaccine found, although a number of other pharmaceutical products, including drugs, have been recovered. Investigations into the source of the items found are continuing."—[Official Report, 27 January 2003; Vol. 398, c. 635W.]

That is pretty peculiar. What is more peculiar, however, is that no one has taken the trouble to tell me the result of those investigations.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury): A few wags in the press have suggested that the crate of anthrax vaccine on a south Dorset beach might have something to do with the fact that HMS Ark Royal reputedly steamed past that beach a short while before it was discovered. Does the hon. Gentleman think that the fact that the uptake of the anthrax vaccine in the Navy has only been 28 per cent., compared with 78 per cent. in the Army, might have something to do with it?

Mr. Tyler: The hon. Gentleman has professional qualifications and more information than I have on that matter. I am grateful to him for his comment.

The critical consideration is that the Ministry of Defence knows that the anthrax vaccines belong to that Department, but it has no idea how they got from A to B. That does not give me much confidence that it knows what it is doing to its service personnel. I want to emphasise that it is our troops who are being treated in such a way. It is extraordinary. No wonder they are losing confidence in the political direction and overall command.

The Ministry does not know what it is doing. To paraphrase the Duke of Wellington, "I don't know what effect our Ministry of Defence will have on Saddam Hussein, but, my God, they terrify me!"

Other hon. Members wish to contribute, and I hope that I have made my central point. The sorry saga of the suffering of the 1991 Gulf war veterans is an appalling reflection on the way in which successive Governments have treated them. Even worse than that would be a failure to learn the lessons and to avoid repeating them now. As I said, I hope and pray that Iraq and its dictator can be brought back to their senses without military action, but if British troops are deployed on our behalf it would be truly scandalous if they were also exposed to an unnecessary risk to their health by their own military planners in the Ministry of Defence. It would be the chemical equivalent of friendly fire.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is advisable to remind the House that it is customary in 90-minute Adjournment debates to commence the first of the three winding-up speeches 30 minutes before the end. We have 41 minutes before that time and six right hon. and hon. Members are present who wish to speak, only three of whom have given prior notice. I appeal to all concerned to make their remarks pertinent, concise and to be brief when receiving or making interventions.

9.49 am

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East): I congratulate the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) on securing this timely debate. My interest in Gulf war illnesses has arisen as a result of a constituency case, like that of so many other right hon. and hon. Members. Also, like the hon. Gentleman, I want to ensure that if we go to war again in the Gulf we do not make the same mistakes that we probably made in 1990–91.

A few days ago, on 20 January, it was admitted in the other place, in a written answer given by the Under-Secretary of State for Health, Lord Hunt of Kings Heath, in response to a question from Lord Morris of Manchester, that the current recommendation from the Centre for Applied Microbiology and Research at Porton Down, which manufactures the anthrax vaccine, is that it should be used alone, not in combination with other vaccines. That information is included in the product summary that is provided to doctors with the vaccine. The patient information leaflet also asks patients to inform their doctor if they are taking other medicines.

[Dr. Brian Iddon]

My concern is that, as has been admitted, members of the armed forces were given more than one vaccine at the same time, as well as other medicines such as pyridostigmine bromide, an acetylcholinesterase inhibitor used as a nerve agent pre-treatment medicine. The question is, what limitations are placed on the administration of other vaccines and medicines and, if such limitations exist—especially if they existed at the time of the Gulf war—are they, or were they, taken into account? It seems strange that we went to the Gulf war in coalition with all our allies and yet, while the Americans seem to have accepted that new illnesses have arisen as a result of that conflict, the Ministry of Defence cannot entirely share those views.

On 25 June last year, the United States research advisory committee on Gulf war veterans illness produced an interim report, which pointed out that there is increasing objective evidence that a major category of Gulf war illness is neurological. The US Government at present support 224 research projects, which involves $213 million.

On 28 October, the honourable Leo S. Mackay, Deputy Secretary of Veterans Affairs, reported to that committee that Dr. Simon Wessely's research group in London had concluded, in an article published in the British Medical Journal, that the ill health suffered by Gulf war veterans cannot be explained by stress or other physiological disorders. That is certainly the conclusion that many British Gulf war veterans have obviously reached.

On page 5 of the American report, we find the statement:

"Most important, we want to send a message to veterans. That science is finally beginning to unravel the mysteries of Gulf War illnesses. That this Administration is committed to pursuing new science, medical breakthroughs and new treatments. And that, finally, there is reason for hope".

I shall examine in more detail the scientific evidence that American scientists have unearthed to support their views. Epidemiological studies have shown consistently that between one in four and one in five of US veterans who served in the Gulf war are ill, suffering from health problems beyond those that could be explained by stress or psychiatric diagnoses and over and above the control population used in the studies.

Professor Bob Haley of the university of Texas has described three Gulf war syndromes, for which he has provided evidence from his research and that of other scientists. At least one category of Gulf war illness appears from the evidence available to be neurological in character. Magnetic resonance spectroscopy suggests a loss of neurons in selected brain areas in ill veterans, in particular in the brain stem and basal ganglia. The same veterans show cognitive problems and/or joint and muscle problems.

The Americans have provided evidence that ill veterans who drive vehicles are significantly more at risk of being involved in road traffic accidents than others. Significantly, the Ministry of Defence recently admitted to me in a written answer to a parliamentary question—it can be found in Hansard, 7 November 2002, column 455W—that that is also the case in the United Kingdom.

The heart rate measurements of US Gulf war veterans show dysregulation of the autonomic nervous system. They suffer from amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, ALS, at about twice the expected rate. They demonstrate an increase in the cold sensory threshold. Audiovestibular tests show abnormalities of central vestibular function and they exhibit elevated dopamine levels in the brain.

Ill US veterans have low levels of an enzyme called paraoxanase in their blood. The Ministry of Defence has admitted to me in another written answer that that is also the case with British Gulf war veterans who are ill. That enzyme is responsible for breaking down organophosphates. Interestingly, those veterans who worked side by side with those who have become ill, but have not become ill themselves, have normal levels of that enzyme in their blood stream.

As has been demonstrated, organophosphate insecticides were widely used during the Gulf war, for example, to spray the tented areas and the troops themselves—they were issued with insecticide sprays. More importantly, an estimated 100,000 of our troops were exposed to organophosphate nerve agents, mainly during demolition of the Khamisiyah ammunitions depot. There is some evidence that the symptoms suffered by some Gulf war veterans are similar to those of others— for example, farmers who regularly dip sheep have been exposed to substantial amounts of organophosphates.

Let us compare the American conclusions—please note that these were obtained by several research groups—with those of our Government-supported Gulf war illness research unit, which has concluded that many thousands of British veterans who are suffering from illness cannot attribute that illness to agents such as the organophosphates that they encountered during the Gulf war. The Sunday Times covered that subject in a story of 24 November.

The MOD-funded researchers at Guy's, King's and St. Thomas' school of medicine in London, however, studied only 49 Gulf war veterans with neurological symptoms and compared them with 29 without problems. While the general health of those who were ill was poorer than that of other ex-servicemen, no brain damage could be detected.

Professor Simon Wessely is quoted as saying:

"In the past we have shown incontrovertibly that Gulf War veterans are sicker than similar groups but what this study shows is that the health effects are not associated with neurological problems".

Professor Malcolm Hooper at Sunderland university, however, said:

"I find this research frankly astonishing, unpersuasive and"— this is the important thing—

"statistically insignificant".

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Dr. Lewis Moonie): What are Professor Hooper's qualifications for commenting on a clinical study?

Dr. Iddon: I know Malcolm Hooper well because I worked with him at the university of Durham for some time. He was trained as a professional organic chemist.

Who is right? That is the big question now. I suggest to the Government that they should combine their research efforts with those of the Americans and, perhaps, those of other scientists worldwide, to seek the truth. I was pleased to learn from the Ministry that Professor Bob Haley has been invited to Britain to discuss his work with other British scientists.

We are not spending enough in the United Kingdom on unearthing the truth, whereas the Americans have taken the problem far more seriously. Recently, the Government have involved the Medical Research Council in research, but that effort comes a bit late, especially for those Gulf war veterans who have died, possibly—I stress "possibly"—as a result of their illnesses. I must admit that enhanced mortality is not yet proven, although enhanced morbidity rates are. At present, however, I am inclined towards believing the American results merely because the Americans have not fixed their minds and have invested considerably more pro rata than we have in research.

It is becoming clear that we have made mistakes in preparing our armed forces for the Gulf war. With the precautionary principle in mind, will my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary assure us that the same mistakes will not be made again if we go to war again in that region?

Finally, I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as I will have to leave a few minutes before the end of the debate at 11 am, as I am chairing a session of a conference in Church house.

9.59 am

Mr. Michael Mates (East Hampshire): I shall be extremely brief. First, I congratulate the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) on the timely way in which he introduced this debate. I serve with him on the Gulf war veterans' disease committee of the Royal British Legion and I acknowledge that the Ministry of Defence is trying, slowly, to get to the bottom of the matter.

I do not yet convict the Under-Secretary of some of the lack of sensitivity and urgency that some of his predecessors have shown, as I believe that he is trying hard to proceed with the matter and to get the facts. I hope that he is as frustrated as we are at the snail's pace with which progress is being made. I do not expect him to say so, but I hope that by urging him to get a move on and to bring this long and sorry saga to a conclusion he will start to throw his considerable weight about at the Ministry of Defence and to urge people to move a little faster.

The real point of my brief intervention is this. There is no doubt that there was a certain amount of shambles the last time that we went to war in the Gulf. There is no doubt that there were reasons for that—we were in a new area and we were not properly prepared, or expecting, to put our troops into the sort of dangers that chemical and biological weapons can cause. There was an explanation for the shambles, therefore. This time round, 11 years later, there can be no excuse, and I hope that the Under-Secretary will give us an unequivocal assurance that all the plans have been properly made, all the research done and all the best opinions sought as to how to protect our troops, should they have to face such dangers—of course, we all hope that they will not. Without that unequivocal assurance—this is a good time for the Minister to give it—our troops should not be sent in to face such dangers.

10.1 am

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Hull, North): Like the hon. Member for East Hampshire (Mr. Mates), I shall be brief. First, I congratulate the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) on obtaining this debate. It is timely, and it gives the Government an opportunity to state what precautions they are taking if our troops in the Gulf are engaged in warfare, and what steps they will take to prevent any such war having a history similar to that of the previous Gulf war.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall and my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) have set out the scientific facts. I did not know that many of the words that they used existed. I am aware, however, of the effects of the use of chemicals and vaccinations on Gulf victims.

I have the good fortune to have the headquarters of the Gulf Veterans Association in my constituency. Shaun Rusling is one of my constituents. In the past decade, the correspondence that I have received from him and from others in my constituency who are associated with the GVA has become a small mountain—a mountain that expresses despair and frustration. They despair because they wonder what they have done wrong. They feel that they are victims. Why have they been let down by the Ministry of Defence? Why are their claims that they are now very ill, but that they were not before they went to the Gulf, not being treated seriously and effectively?

In the early stages, correspondence from the Ministry of Defence on the subject almost showed indifference. I hope that that is changing. There seems to have been a change in atmosphere in the past few years. The soldiers thought that they were forgotten. They had or had not got pensions. It was almost as though the Ministry view was, "Sad. We don't know what's happened and we're not really too worried about it." It was due only to the public pressure of Shaun Rusling and others that the Ministry was forced, tardily, to take an interest and to take tentative steps to find out what had happened.

Hon. Members have compared the situation here with what the United States Government have done and the way in which they have treated their veterans. The same comparison has been made with Canada and France. A very different picture emerges here than in those other countries.

I hope that we will get two things out of this debate. I know of the interest that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary takes in the matter and of his professional experience. I hope that there will be a further push and a greater sense of urgency from the Ministry of Defence. As the hon. Member for East Hampshire said, I also hope that none of our troops will face the same shambles if they are engaged in a war, that they will be properly protected and have full knowledge of what is being done to them and that full records will be kept. One of the greatest crimes is that there are no adequate records of what was given to the troops, and they do not always know what they were given.

10.5 am

Annabelle Ewing (Perth): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) on securing this important and timely debate. I am aware that he and other hon. Members present have been assiduous in pursuing a campaign for justice for Gulf war veterans.

[Annabelle Ewing]

I concur with the hon. Member for North Cornwall in his condemnation of the shabby way in which successive United Kingdom Governments have dealt with the veterans of the 1991 Gulf war conflict. I understand that 500-plus veterans have died post-conflict and that many thousands are ill and suffering from debilitating illnesses. Many of them are deteriorating daily, which is obviously upsetting for them, but also for their families.

What has been the Government's response? They have stalled, procrastinated and refused to recognise the problem and to deal with it properly. To deal with a problem, we must first recognise its existence. The Shaun Rusling case is undergoing an appeal and is sub judice, but I wrote to the Minister on 20 November 2002 to ask what budgetary estimates had been made as to the cost of appealing. Unfortunately, I have not yet received a response. Perhaps I shall get an answer today.

Hon. Members who have spoken have mentioned research. The money allocated for research is unsatisfactory. An unfavourable comparison has been made with the amounts being spent in the United States, for example. Will the Minister state for the record whether he is satisfied with the level of funding? Will he explain what the level is for 2003–04 and say what percentage that represents of the entire Ministry of Defence budget?

No proper compensation is available to Gulf war veterans. There is no specially targeted medical support. The pleas of the Royal British Legion for a full, independent public inquiry have been ignored to date, which is unfortunate. The issue is of key importance, as the Ministry of Defence may be about to make exactly the same mistakes again, which would be unacceptable and unforgivable. I and other hon. Members hope that there will not be another conflict in the Gulf, but the Prime Minister seems to be set on that path irrespective of what the United Nations may do. It is not clear that the Government have learned lessons from the 1991 conflict and intend to pursue different measures. Indeed, it seems that they remain complacent. I and other hon. Members want to hear what they are doing differently, in particular on organophosphates and vaccines.

A debt of honour is long overdue to Gulf war veterans. Indeed, a Government who send soldiers to war have a duty of care towards them. It was not exercised in the first Gulf war conflict. That was compounded by the fact that the UK Government have refused since then to take real measures to help those veterans. This time round, I hope that the Government will do the right thing by our troops. I hope that they will have learned the lessons and will act upon them. Surely it is not acceptable for any troops to be subject to the same shabby treatment as the veterans of the 1991 Gulf war conflict.

10.9 am

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North): I, too, am pleased to take part in this debate secured by the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler). I have a feeling of déjà vu, as my first Adjournment debate in 1997 was on this subject. The issue has not progressed very far in terms of our understanding of the causes and uncertainties associated with these illnesses. At the last meeting of the Liaison Committee a few weeks ago, at which, of course, the Chairmen of various Select Committees met my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, my right hon. Friend was asked whether the necessary precautions had been taken to protect troops being deployed to the Gulf from these illnesses, and the answer received was a rather curt yes. I, too, would like to be reassured that we are learning the lessons from the past.

Reference has been made to the work that is going on in the United States. I have studied the epidemiology, in which other hon. Members are also interested, as we have had these debates many times. Epidemiological evidence must be taken seriously, and it is often hard to prove: let us remember how long it took to prove the associations of tobacco and smoking through epidemiological technologies. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) has also referred to the work that has gone on in the United States on the symptoms, the illnesses and the diagnosis of veterans. Multi-symptom illnesses are associated with each veteran, which makes it difficult to associate one particular illness with one particular cause. There is no doubt, however, as has been admitted for years, that Gulf war veterans are ill and have problems. Although we cannot work out the cause or multiple causes, that does not mean that we should not take the matter seriously.

The United States seems to be ahead of us in this area. The Institute of Medicine, which is part of the National Academy of Sciences, has recommended the setting up of a national centre of war-related illnesses and post-deployment health issues, recognising that many veterans from many conflicts require a unit to examine these problems intensively and not in a piecemeal way.

If I may make an aside, a reference was made to Malcolm Hooper during an earlier exchange. In a letter submitted to The Lancet, which I have been asked to review, his title is emeritus professor of medicinal chemistry and his address is given as the school of sciences, university of Sunderland. Although that is true, it is also true that he is chief scientific adviser to the Gulf Veterans Association. I hope that we will not let the initials after our names get in the way of this debate, as we should be examining the evidence. We can all score points in relation to who is a greater expert in a smaller and smaller field.

My final point is about the depletion of uranium, of which there has been no mention whatever. A document on the health effects of depleted uranium munitions has been produced by the prestigious Royal Society in this country. Those munitions were used in the 1991 Gulf war. It is known that they produce harmful radioactive contamination in the battlefield environment, and they contaminate troops who have the insoluble uranium oxides in their systems for a long period, if not for life. It is alleged that the Iraqis learned only 12 months after the war ended that DU—depleted uranium—had been used on them and that no advice was given to troops in the United States or here of that use. UK Gulf veterans have been found to have DU in their urine, although it is difficult to quantify levels of that internally. Other sorts of cancers are alleged to be associated with it, and epidemiological studies are ongoing.

Dr. Moonie: As a respected scientist, will my hon. Friend tell us what are the differences between the likely clinical effects of depleted uranium and those of ordinary uranium?

Dr. Gibson: If I knew the answer to that, I would have a Nobel prize. Studies are ongoing in that area, and we do not know the nature of what happens to uranium oxide.

Dr. Moonie: Will my hon. Friend accept that there is no chemical or medical difference whatever in the effects of isotopes of a substance?

Dr. Gibson: We do not know that. I am not prepared to get into a scientific debate about the origins and what happens to a compound once it gets in the body when research is ongoing in that field. We need a staged study, and we need to know how much of the substance has been taken in, where it goes and so on, which is admitted in the Royal Society document. In Iraq, for example, depleted uranium levels are associated with cancers in children and birth defects in the Basra region, where levels are three times higher than in Baghdad. Many other birth defects have been associated with that, and finer and more intense research is needed, as there are serious implications of using those compounds. If events in Iraq proceed, and depleted uranium is used, it will end up causing many health effects, about which our troops need to know.

To finish on an anecdote, this weekend I met a young person in the Norfolk area who is going out to Kuwait today to serve. That person had to purchase their own uniform, and many of their associates had not been issued with chemical combat uniforms. That is alleged, but I have no reason to believe that it is not true, and that person is in the eye of storm. The Minister has a job to do to convince many of us that we have learned the lessons and that some of the problems that have been associated with Gulf war illnesses will not happen again.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South): Like other Members, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) and the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon), both of whom made excellent contributions. They are demanding assurances that are being sought by all of us in this Chamber today, and, more importantly, by the men and women who will go to the Gulf area on our behalf, and by their families.

Historically, many people will be going to the Gulf for the second time. I met a young man—he is not so young now—who went to the Gulf the first time round and was there for only a matter of days. He received a cocktail of immunisations, and within five or six days, he was medivac'd out of the area back to Germany, where he was in hospital for some time. When he made a claim, he found that not one record had been kept of him having had the injections and having suffered a bad effect, despite the fact that there was a record of him being medivac'd back to Germany. There was no indication of what he had been given or of the cause and effect of the illnesses that he suffered, and his military career was put on hold for several months.

That man has now gone back to the Gulf—his unit was part of the logistics unit that is already in the area—but he was very nervous about what injections he would be given and he wanted assurances. I sent him a copy of the evidence given by the Minister to the Defence Committee with the hope that that might provide him with assurances that, this time round, proper records would be kept, and that service personnel would be informed in advance of what they would be given, when they would be given, and who would be responsible for the record keeping. We know from evidence that the Minister has given to the Defence Committee that our past performance in relation to keeping medical records is lamentable. To his credit, he has assured the House, the Defence Committee and the armed forces that that situation has been turned around. I hope that that turns out to be true.

As other Members have said, historically the Government's commitment to tell the truth on these issues is poor—it has had to be forced out of them. The answers given have been changed, and apologies have been given. Shaun Rusling and the Gulf Veterans Association have sought three things, which the Government have failed to give them. The first is recognition of the issue that they are trying to raise, the second is for the truth to be told, and the third is for justice to be granted to them. The hon. Member for Perth (Annabelle Ewing) was right to imply that there is a moral stain on this country because of the way in which we have failed to address the historic issues that we have faced.

Excuse after excuse has been put forward for why numbers of these young men and, in certain cases, women, have died. I remember visiting the United States as a member of the Defence Committee, and encountering the argument about the number of young people who have died in horrific accidents or extreme sporting activities. The excuse used then was that that was fairly normal after having returned from war, because they had been excited by the experience and had had an adrenalin rush, and, for a period after coming home, felt that they needed continuous excitement and thrill in their lives. That does not persist for 10 years, however, and people are still dying in those circumstances. The answer that was given as to why so many young people had died in horrific accidents or in suicides has now been virtually ruled out by the Americans. We must therefore return to address those issues.

My hon. Friend the Member for North Cornwall raised the issue of protection for people who might use organophosphates in the Gulf on this occasion, but that is not the only question. Will those troops who follow them be properly protected and warned about what has gone on in advance of their move into an area? Are we absolutely sure about what substances our allies will use in any action? One of the difficulties in the previous conflict was the difference of opinion about whether the Americans had told us what they were using at different stages.

[Mr. Mike Hancock]

Those Members in this Chamber today could repeat long lists of their experiences in relation to Gulf war veterans in their areas, but the case of Mr. Alex Izett is a classic one. For 10 years, the Ministry of Defence denied all of his claims. It fought tooth and nail, and letter after letter went from this country, via me and other Members, to Mr. Izett at his home in Germany. He won his case, and received recognition with a vaccine damage award, and within days of that award being given the Ministry of Defence wrote to say that it would not contest it. Why did he have to go through such a traumatic experience? Why was his family life destroyed when, 11 years on, we have recognised that we owed him a debt? Is it so much to ask that those individuals and their families whose lives have been destroyed should be dealt with properly and fairly?

The Minister's outburst today seemed to be an over-reaction to what Members were saying. To be critical of the qualifications of someone who is advising the Gulf veterans was beyond him.

Dr. Moonie: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hancock: No. The Minister will have nearly 15 minutes to make his reply, and I will stay to listen as I have listened to his other comments.

Dr. Moonie: Pathetic.

Mr. Hancock: No, not pathetic. Your outburst against your colleague today, when he tried to address the issue, showed me once again that this issue touches a raw nerve as far as you and the Ministry of Defence are concerned. I do not know why, because you were not responsible—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair was not responsible.

Mr. Hancock: I am delighted to absolve you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, from any of that responsibility and from any implication that I may have hinted at. Just as you were not responsible, the Minister was not responsible, and I cannot understand why current Ministers in the Ministry of Defence will not do what many of them promised to do when they were in opposition, namely to sort out the matter and give support to the Gulf veterans, which is what they asked for, and were promised, six or seven years ago. How sad it is that, today, we are firing warning shots to make sure that our service men and women will be properly protected this time round. I hope that the lessons will be learned, but it is sad that, 11 years on, we are demanding justice for men and women who have not had even an inkling of light in their campaign so far.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury): I must declare an interest. As recorded in the register, I am an ex-service man and a current reservist, and I am a member of the Royal British Legion. I also have relatives serving in the Gulf, so this debate is germane to me, and I welcome the opportunity of contributing to it.

I retain an open mind on Gulf war syndrome and illness. I must confess, however, that having been employed in the Royal Navy in the early 1990s, I recall feeling that we were doing less than we might to take seriously the concerns of service men, and particularly that our record was comparing unfavourably with that of the United States in relation to its service men. It was clear at that time that the USA was taking the travails of its service men and ex-service men a great deal more seriously than we were of our people in the UK. In mitigation, it was probably drawing from its experience in the Vietnam conflict which, fortunately, was an experience that we were spared.

Nevertheless, I was concerned at that time because of the poor record keeping to which other Members have alluded and the general lack of urgency in relation to putting in place research to try to clarify exactly what was going on. The hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) put his case well, particularly in relation to record keeping, and I hope that the Minister will assure us that measures are now in place to ensure that proper, meticulous records are kept of the state of health of our service men and of exactly what they are exposed to.

As I said, however, I remain of an open mind on this issue, and it is important, in what is evidently an emotive subject, to bring some scientific clarity and light to it. It is important to quote the British Medical Journal of February last year. Members who take an interest in this matter will recall that Guy's, King's and St. Thomas's school of medicine has taken a particular interest in Gulf war syndrome and illness and has conducted studies on it. If I may paraphrase the British Medical Journal—time is short—it said in relation to illness following war that no single presentation is common to all modern wars, that variations seem to be determined by the nature of combat, contemporary medical knowledge and important health beliefs and fears, and that illness related to the Gulf war does not stand apart from that of other conflicts. That is important because the study considered post-conflict illness from the Boer war to the present day. While no one denies that veterans of the Gulf war are ill, that needs to be examined in the context of other conflicts going back to the beginning of the previous century.

We need to be clear, however, about what we are dealing with this time. I hope that the Minister will assure us in a few minutes that we will put in place the research that is necessary to study that to which our people are being exposed, and that we shall keep adequate medical records. We risk doing the same again because we are exposing our people to much the same risks as in 1991, and potentially more of them. We need assurances that everything has been done to reduce the risk that they face.

I accept that Ministers have put effort into ensuring that we do not have multiple vaccination as we did in the early 1990s, but there is some way to go to win over the hearts and minds of our service men and women. The vaccination rate among our service people is very low: it is less than 50 per cent., as the Prime Minister reiterated in an oral answer to me a couple of weeks ago. The figures are 28 per cent. in the Navy, 46 per cent. in the RAF and 78 per cent. in the Army. To a great extent, that is related to perceived risk—there is no doubt about that—but it would also be interesting to know what the differential is within the Army. If these differences are due to perceived risk, I would expect those units in the front line—the teeth elements of the Army—to be vaccinated at a higher rate than those in the support arms. I would be grateful if the Minister could comment on that.

Time is short, so I shall wrap up with the words of Colonel Terry English, who has criticised the Government by saying that "a much earlier investigation of this whole issue would have given today's soldiers the confidence to take inoculations."

The figures suggest that that battle has not been won. I would be extremely grateful if the Minister were to say what he is doing now to ensure that the uptake of necessary vaccinations is going ahead a little more successfully than it has hitherto.

10.29 am

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall): Like other hon. Members present, I am experiencing a certain déjà vu, because within weeks of being elected in 1997, I accompanied my constituent, Major Christine Lloyd, on a visit to the Minister with responsibility for the armed forces. Major Lloyd had vaccinated troops and had been vaccinated herself, and had suffered certain effects for a considerable time. We were promised then that the incoming Labour Government would be open and honest in all their dealings with the Gulf war veterans, but, some six years later, the Ministry of Defence's persistent quibbling over terms such as "syndrome" and "illness" and its behaviour in cases such as those of Shaun Rusling and Major Christine Lloyd fall far short of those promises and of the responsible attitude that the Department should adopt.

Although it is accepted that there is no single clear cause or symptom of Gulf war illness, the MOD must acknowledge that the various ailments suffered by veterans are neither mere coincidence nor psychosomatic. Shaun Rusling, the head of the National Gulf Veterans and Families Association, has called for an independent medical programme and investigation into the whole issue of Gulf war illness, taking it away from the MOD and from any possible bias or perceived bias towards its interests. We would support that. By broadening the scope of the medical assessment programme, all soldiers who have served in action would have access to an impartial and expert medical advice centre separate from the military alternatives.

Although the MOD has published figures to show that there is "essentially no difference" between the mortality rates of Gulf war veterans and other service men who were not deployed to the Gulf, they do not take into account the severity and nature of the ongoing illnesses that are being suffered. The widespread suspicion and anxiety about this issue is detrimental to the morale of veterans and of other service men, particularly in the current climate.

I also support the documentation proposals, because we want to know what steps the MOD has taken to ensure that better records are kept of the substances—such as organophosphates—that are being used, or are intended to be used, and what vaccines are being administered to troops, how they are being administered, in what order and according to what timetable. The US Government have made efforts to improve medical record keeping in theatre, and we must do the same. Furthermore, veterans and their GPs must be given swift and uninhibited access to medical records, and more strenuous efforts must be made to keep a better record of all service men when they leave the forces, so that their mental and physical health can be properly monitored.

The seven-year rule for applications for war pensions must be waived in the case of Gulf war veterans. The MOD cannot and must not duck its obligation to make provision for soldiers and civilians suffering ill health as a result of time spent in theatre by focusing on the terminological niceties of these collective ailments. I want to know what lessons have been learned from the last Gulf war—that has not really been spelled out—and how they have affected preparations for possible action in the area in the coming months. We know that the MOD claims not to be administering vaccine cocktails any more, but will that make any difference if the vaccines are still the same ones? What is the medical evidence to support the new action? Have there been any alterations to the protective kit issued to troops and non-military personnel in the light of those lessons? In Saif Sareea, there were not enough NBC—nuclear, biological and chemical—protective suits to go round. I hope that we have now had confirmation that alterations have been made.

The current situation with regard to voluntary vaccinations is difficult to understand. When my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch) visited our troops in the Gulf recently, that was clearly their No. 1 concern. United States troops have been vaccinated against anthrax, yet ours are offered such vaccinations as an option. One can forgive them for thinking that the MOD wants to avoid further costly law suits, as it has not yet determined the cause of Gulf war syndrome or illness. Either the vaccination is safe or it is not, and the Government should make a proper recommendation.

Dr. Murrison: Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that anthrax vaccination should be compulsory for our troops?

Mr. Breed: It should not be made compulsory, but people should be given clear advice and the Government should give a clear recommendation on whether they believe that the vaccination should be given.

Dr. Murrison: I hate to rise in defence of the Government, but, to be fair, their advice is fairly clear.

Mr. Breed: If the advice is clear, that has certainly not been communicated to the troops.

Dr. Moonie: Yes, it has.

Mr. Breed: I am grateful for the Minister's confirmation that the Government's recommendation to the troops is entirely clear. Perhaps he will explain just how it has been communicated.

The Government must not shirk their responsibilities or place service men in an impossible situation. Their vaccine policy as it currently stands could be interpreted as an abdication of responsibility.

Dr. Moonie: In what way?

Mr. Breed: In the way that I have just described.

[Mr. Breed]

As for the discovery of batches of vaccine on the Dorset beaches, it is totally disingenuous to suggest that the Ministry cannot determine where those batches came from. There are clear scientific methods for calculating exactly where material from ships emanates from, using tides and so on. It is a well-tried scientific means of explaining these things, and it is used for environmental purposes all the time—to decide where oil spills come from, for example. We could easily determine from exactly which ship those batches of vaccine came.

Yesterday, we were in this Chamber discussing tragic deaths in Army barracks. Today, we are talking about Gulf war illness. Does the Minister accept that there is a growing view that the MOD appears to follow a clear strategy when dealing with these problems? First, it denies everything. Secondly, under pressure, it apparently agrees to a review. Thirdly, it strings out the process, prevaricates and tries to convince everyone that there is nothing in the allegations, despite mounting evidence to the contrary. That does nothing to enhance the reputation of the Government or of the MOD, and it seems to many people that the Government will spend whatever is necessary to defend themselves against any action or any claim for compensation from anyone at any time.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk): I also congratulate the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) on raising this subject. He has long experience of and dedication to the cause of the Gulf war veterans, as do many of the hon. Members here today. The purpose of this debate is to address the concerns of the Gulf war veterans and their families, especially as British troops are being deployed for a possible conflict in the Gulf even as we speak.

I spent a large part of my professional career as a military historian, writing about the first and second world wars and interviewing thousands of veterans of both. Their experiences were the same as, and often far more traumatic than, those of the veterans of the Gulf war. I was also a special adviser at the Ministry of Defence in the lead-up to and during the Gulf war. I am only too aware of the decisions that had to be made very quickly and often with inadequate information, and, in the case of vaccination, with the most appalling option of difficulties. That is offered not as a defence, but merely as an observation.

Mr. Hancock: The hon. Gentleman has just told the Chamber that he was present during those deliberations. Will he explain why the decisions about inoculations were taken in such a rush, when the planning was several months in the making? It would appear that he is now suggesting that the decisions on what inoculations service personnel would have was rushed through without proper information being available.

Mr. Simpson: No, I am making two points. First, Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait and a decision had to be made very quickly to deploy British troops, so many of the actions taken had to be rushed. Secondly, we were aware at the time that Saddam Hussein had chemical and biological capability. That represented an option of difficulties. It is never easy to make such decisions, as anyone who has experience in government will know. I hope that if the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) becomes a Minister one day, he will realise what the consequences of his decisions may be.

Tens of thousands of Gulf war veterans in the United States and the United Kingdom, and their families, are convinced that there is such a medical condition as Gulf war syndrome. The debate that we are having today covers five points. First, is there a definition of Gulf war syndrome or illness? One of the things that has come out of this debate, as well as all the previous debates and the medical evidence, is that there is no agreement on this. The Ministry of Defence genuinely believes that there is no such thing as a syndrome that is unique to the veterans of the Gulf war. However, the pensions appeal tribunal last year accepted the term "Gulf war syndrome", finding that the condition was attributable to a veteran's service. So there is major disagreement on this matter.

Secondly, is it possible medically and scientifically to identify a specific Gulf war illness or syndrome? Again, there is mixed evidence. There is disagreement between the MOD and the veterans over its origins and over the specifics. There is even disagreement among the medical and scientific experts and those with a background in this field. That has been displayed today, given the backgrounds of the Minister and the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson). These are major problems, and they are not simply academic. They go to the root of the question. My hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison) has referred to the fact that the United States Department of Defence's war syndrome study found that Gulf war syndrome was a manifestation of established post-combat syndrome, which arises out of all combats. That is rejected by many Gulf war veterans.

Thirdly, have the Gulf war veterans shown medical symptoms and levels of mortality higher than the control group? We have just had the latest MOD figures for the period from 1 April to 31 December 2002, which showed that 571 Gulf war veterans had died, but 574 people in a control group of service personnel had also died. So, is there any real difference? We have to get into the specifics, and a number of hon. Members have done so. A recent study in the United States showed that US military personnel who served in the Gulf were twice as likely to contract motor neurone disease as others. That study must be reviewed by an independent scientific panel. The United States Department of Veterans Affairs—a very powerful organisation, which has money and political clout—immediately offered disability and survivor benefits to veterans with the disease.

Fourthly, has the MOD shown a willingness to investigate this issue, to be transparent and to consider awarding further compensation when necessary? There is no agreement on this. Colleagues who have spoken in the debate so far have accused the Ministry of being slow, ignorant and more concerned about financial compensation, and said that information has to be dragged out of it little by little. I am a little more sympathetic, having been inside the Ministry and seen that it is often more a question of cock-up than conspiracy.

Mr. Tyler: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Simpson: I am trying to give the Minister more time to speak, but as the hon. Gentleman initiated the debate, I will give way to him.

Mr. Tyler: The admission of a former senior adviser in the Ministry of Defence that a cock-up could have caused this problem just as much as a conspiracy is amazing. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that.

Mr. Simpson: With respect to the hon. Gentleman, we are perhaps becoming a little hysterical. I am saying that when it comes to administration, it is more likely to be a cock-up than a conspiracy. The logistical problems involved, with the medical records and everything else, are absolutely enormous. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury, I conclude that the onus is on the Ministry of Defence. It must now recognise that not only Gulf war veterans but many independent observers no longer automatically believe what it is saying, and that we may have to have, at the very least, an independent review of the evidence available from the Ministry and from the Gulf war veterans.

I want to give the Minister as much time as possible to respond to this debate, so I shall make my final point. As hon. Members have said, there is no doubt that the information that is available from the last conflict should be considered rationally, and that the onus should be on the Ministry of Defence to provide that information to the military personnel who are now being deployed to the Gulf, and to their families. If there are any major problems or weaknesses, it is right and proper that they should be identified. Equally, those of us who have relatives or friends about to be deployed to the Gulf will know that it does not help them or their morale if issues are raised for which there is no scientific or medical background. A fine balance has to be struck, but I accept that the onus of responsibility lies with the Ministry of Defence.

10.45 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Dr. Lewis Moonie): It is difficult to know exactly where to start when winding up a debate such as this. I am certainly grateful for the opportunity to set Members' minds at rest, although I suspect—I shall check my records—that all of them have at one time or another received one of my eight-page letters on Gulf war veterans' illnesses or on depleted uranium. If any hon. Members have any questions of any kind, or if there is anything that they do not understand—which, I am afraid, seems clearly evident from their contributions today—my door is always open. They can come and see me to discuss it. They can tell me their concerns and I will discuss them frankly and openly. I do not want to get involved in a qualifications parade, but as someone with higher qualifications in psychiatry and in public health, I am probably uniquely qualified in the House to talk about many of these subjects, with the possible exception of the hon. Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison), with his medical background.

I want to dispose of the argument about depleted uranium as quickly as possible. Depleted uranium has exactly the same effects as ordinary uranium. No scientist in the world could provide any basis for suggesting anything else. There is no difference in the chemical effects of isotopes. There are differences in the radiological effects of isotopes, because some decay more quickly than others and produce more radioactivity. Depleted uranium—as its very title would suggest to anyone with even modest intelligence—has less radiation in it than ordinary uranium.

Dr. Gibson: My hon. Friend is very distinguished and promotes himself very well, but has he read the Royal Society report, which accentuates the measures that I suggested should be taken on the different isotopes, what happens to them in the human body, whether they are filtered out, and so on? A huge area of research needs to be done on this subject, and my hon. Friend has no right to say that we know anything, when an august body such as the Royal Society says that we need to put more time and effort into this research and to find new methodologies to assess what isotopes—

Dr. Moonie: That is quite long enough, I think, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If my hon. Friend wants to send me any documentation, I shall be happy to look at it. In fact, I shall read it with great interest, but, frankly, anyone who tries to suggest that there are medical differences—other than those due to radioactivity—between the effects of isotopes is talking out of the back of his head.

I have a passionate desire to get to the bottom of any problem such as this one. It is utterly abhorrent to me—it is anathema—to think that we might be ignoring any medical effect that could be taking place as a result of anything that we have done. I would not for a moment countenance the Department in any obfuscation, any delay or any attempt to push this matter under the carpet. It would be unthinkable to do that.

I hope that the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) will accept that there is a recognition that people are sick. There is no denial of that whatever. There may have been in the past; there is none now. I believe that if we talk about a syndrome, it is incumbent on us to show that there are scientific reasons for saying that such a syndrome exists. So far, no evidence whatever has been produced to back that up. I cannot find any reputable medical source that will accept that a separate syndrome exists. To me, it is unthinkable that one should call it that. There is no medical reason for doing so. That is not to say—

Mr. Tyler: Will the Minister give way?

Dr. Moonie: No. I do not have time.

That is not to deny that people are sick—of course they are. That is not to say that they should be denied treatment for their illnesses when we can find something to give them—of course they should be treated. That is not to deny that they should be compensated if they are disabled as a result of their illness. So far as I know, anyone who has a disability, irrespective of what it is labelled as, receives the compensation due to them. If they have not, they must come forward and check with the—

Mr. Tyler: Will the Minister give way?

Dr. Moonie: No, I will not.

Those people must check with the veterans' agency or through the Department to see what else can be done. If they are disabled, under our regulations, they should be compensated for the disability in exactly the same way as anyone else is.

Mr. Tyler: The Minister will have noted that I very carefully asked for a debate on Gulf war illness, not syndrome, so I am with him on that. Will he give an explicit assurance, in response to the points that were made earlier, that if anyone takes any vaccination, the Ministry will take full legal responsibility for any consequent illness that may occur?

Dr. Moonie: May I cover vaccines as I go through my text? Otherwise, my speech will get even more disjointed. I take due note that the hon. Gentleman has used the term "Gulf veterans' illnesses". I think that it has been used by everyone today and that is correct.

Mr. Hancock: Will the Minister give way?

Dr. Moonie: I do not have time to give way again. I want to cover as quickly as I can the points that have been raised. Many hon. Members have rightly referred to the arrangements for current deployments. I stress that the well-being of the personnel whom we deploy is of the greatest importance to us. We have made some important improvements since the 1990–91 Gulf conflict. We have made improvements in medical record-keeping through the introduction of a new operational medical record form, which is now in use. That should ensure that health events while on deployment are recorded much more systematically than in the past.

Again, like any other record, it is up to those in the field to maintain records properly. That is something over which I have much less control. I cannot look over everyone's shoulder when they are conducting a medical examination, much as I would like to occasionally, but we have strengthened the central administration of our medical services appropriately. That strengthening and the recognition by the vice-chief of the defence staff of the importance of medical issues have ensured that the chain of command has been left in no doubt as to the importance of maintaining accurate historical records of deployment, where people go, what they are given and what happens to them. I hope that that will work much better than it did at the beginning of the 1990s.

The Gulf conflict revealed shortcomings in medical preparedness. A number of personnel were not up to date with their service standard vaccinations. The standard of vaccinations is the same as the standard of vaccinations given to everyone in the population. An adequate body of literature shows that, in general use, those are absolutely safe. One can never give a 100 per cent. guarantee on anything, but the widespread use of normal vaccinations is well documented. It is no different for our people. What we have ensured this time is that forces that are being deployed have had all the routine vaccinations that they should have. There should be no requirement this time to give anyone a cocktail of vaccinations in the Gulf.

I cannot give a 100 per cent. certain answer on that. We have a voluntary programme. Although I and my colleagues have agonised over this, I still think that we should retain a voluntary programme, despite the difficulties it gives us with differences in uptake, particularly on anthrax. We have maintained the voluntary programme.

When vaccines are administered, informed consent is given. There seems to have been some doubt in people's minds as to whether they have recently been asked to sign a waiver in relation to any effects that might arise. That is not the case. They have been asked to sign a form saying that the effects of the vaccinations and the reasons for giving them have been made clear to them and they have refused to have them. A proper record of that should be kept. People may get to the Gulf and change their minds, in which case they may be given inoculations more quickly, and they ought to be. It should be a tiny percentage of the people being sent there.

We have greatly improved the briefings that are given to personnel on health-related matters. Up-to-date medical intelligence briefings are now routinely commissioned for the area of the world where it is judged that our forces might operate. Personnel deployed in operations receive pre-deployment and in-theatre briefings on health and hygiene matters based on the assessment of the conditions that they may meet. The briefings include information on things such as protection against biting insects, personal hygiene, how to acclimatise, operating in arduous environments and malarial prophylaxis, which is important.

There are also briefings on the nature and management of combat reactions and other psychological stresses of conflict. Arrangements are made to try to limit the effects of post-traumatic stress disorder in the armed forces. We have been trying to do that for many years. I have no idea yet whether that will be effective, but we are aware of those effects and are trying to make progress in the light of what is still very limited medical knowledge of how to prevent them.

Health and safety instructions have been issued to the crews of vehicles loaded with depleted uranium ammunition and to the units that support them. Those instructions make it clear that the risks from DU are far lower than those from other hazards arising from military operations, but they include advice on procedures for minimising contamination by use of respiratory protective equipment, protective clothing and other procedures, particularly for those who may end up going into a vehicle that has been struck by a DU round.

I should mention in passing that 35 United States soldiers have fragments of depleted uranium buried in them as a result of friendly fire during the last Gulf conflict. They have been followed up ever since, and not one of them has shown any signs of heavy metal poisoning, which is what one would expect as a result of such contamination. It is amazing how little effect a relatively large amount of the substance can have. One would expect heavy metal poisoning, which as everyone knows is usually characterised by effects on the kidney. So far, they have found no effects on the kidney whatever.

On anthrax vaccines washed up on beaches, I must admit that that would be a monumental embarrassment to any Government. I assure hon. Members that there is nothing I would like better than to find out who was responsible for it. Until now, despite strenuous efforts by my Department, we have been unable to do so. I assure hon. Members that those efforts are continuing and will continue until we get to the bottom of it, if we ever do. However, I cannot work out why that would imply a dereliction of duty towards our soldiers. It is not a case of the Navy throwing the vaccines away rather than administering them. As a former commander in the Navy said, it is much more likely that sailors do not think that they are exposed to those risks on board ship, so they are much less likely to take up the vaccine. We have noticed that the uptake of anthrax vaccine among strike units that are likely to be deployed is very high compared with other units. Perceived risk in a voluntary situation is always likely to lead to a higher uptake.

Anthrax should be administered alone. The procedures that we have introduced should have ensured that it has been. Again, I cannot say that that will be done in 100 per cent. of cases, but if it is administered alone in the vast majority of cases we can set our minds at rest.

Anthrax vaccination will be given alone. It is fairly extensive: four injections over six months. Full protection is not achieved until the end, but significant protection is achieved with the first dose. It is important to realise that there has never been a case of a serious reaction to our anthrax vaccine. Although it is voluntary, if personnel feel that there is any chance of their being exposed to anthrax, they should certainly take the vaccination to get protection.

It was argued that research is being carried out at a snail's pace. Indeed, the research has been very slow. That is not in our hands. We have no control over the speed of research. If people come to me and suggest any line of research that we should follow up, and there are good scientific reasons for doing so, we will fund it. I give that absolute assurance to hon. Members today.

I recognise the strength of feeling about this matter, and the depth of feeling among veterans. We will do whatever we can. If hon. Members have any constructive suggestions to make to us, we will consider them with the same care as we are examining Professor Haley's work from the United States. We have asked the Medical Research Council to review that work and to see whether any further research can be done. Good research must always be properly—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): Order. We have arrived at the time when we must move on to the next topic for our consideration, which is agriculture in West Dorset. I regret to say that the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the hon. Member for Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), is not in his place to listen to the debate. Perhaps some of his colleagues might transmit that news to him. [Interruption.] He has just arrived, to my great relief.

Agriculture (West Dorset)

11 am

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset): I assure you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that your relief on seeing the Minister arrive is nothing as compared to mine. For the purpose of the record, he is indeed prompt, just. It would have been sad had he not been present, as the purpose of these debates is to bring matters to the attention of Ministers.

I am somewhat in the position of Dr. Martin Luther King, who once had a dream, which I am glad to say has been almost entirely fulfilled. My position differs from his, because I have a dream that is almost entirely unfulfilled. My dream is that there may come a year when I no longer need to ask for a debate on agriculture in West Dorset, because it is in good condition. The previous years have not been such years, and this year is not such a year.

I hope that the Minister will already have heard many times everything that I say today, because it is certainly true of many other parts of rural England. I hope that the Minister is so well aware of the problems that he is already tackling them, but in case some of them have escaped his attention, I shall explain again the problems that currently afflict my farmers.

The first is straightforward: it is lack of profitability. It has been a problem for many years. I say a problem, but for many of my farming constituents with small and mid-sized farms it has ceased to be a problem and has become nostalgia. Many of them are no longer in the business. For others, it is a daily struggle, and many of them are on the point of giving up.

Of course, the lack of profitability is most striking in West Dorset in the dairy sector. It remains afflicted by pricing that neither the Minister nor I, were we currently in the business, would be able to sustain, except with the most monumental efforts. He must be as aware of that as I. Although there is no doubt that there has been a significant effort to push the supermarkets into increasing the prices that they pay, the effect on the farm-gate price of milk is limited because only about 50 per cent. of production is going into liquid milk. For dairy products, I regret to say that there is little sign of improvement.

That is a long-running sore. If that were all, and if there were no side effects and no noise going on that caused additional problems, I suspect that the Minister's task, my task and indeed that of my farmers would be much lighter. A series of items that goes beyond the fundamental economic malaise is addressable, and I hope that the Minister will tell us that he is addressing those problems.

The first relates to the reform programme, so-called. The Minister must have tracked, as I have over some years, the thoughts and tergiversations relating to modulation, digressivity and all the rest of it. Unless the Minister can assure me to the contrary, I do not believe, and my farmers do not believe, that the present proposals will have any effect other than to diminish significantly the economics for many of my farmers.

I do not see any sign that the money that will arise from whatever form of modulation is ultimately adopted will come back to West Dorset. It still seems that there is significant asymmetry, to the disadvantage of British agriculture, and, while we are at it, significant irrationality. There is no rational argument for modulation, because modulation is trying to move in the opposite direction from that in which the Government have been trying to move for many years to increase efficiency. I hope that the Minister will be able to tell us that he is working hard to avoid those dire effects.

Many of my farmers went into organic production encouraged by schemes. That is no fault of the present Government; many of the schemes pre-date the present Government. They were also encouraged by some extremely well-meaning individuals, many of whom write to me. No doubt many more write to the Minister. They argue that we should establish much more aggressive targets for organic production.

I have an unbroken record of having written back to such individuals, sometimes to their dismay, saying that they are engaged in a process that is all too likely to be self-defeating. If the target is set high and the production level is sufficient for the production of organic produce to exceed demand, the effect will be to remove the premium.

I have been saying that for some years and, lo and behold, many of my farmers are in that absurd position. They have converted, they are producing perfectly accredited organic produce, and the premium has disappeared. Indeed, some of the produce is being sold on the open market as if it were non-organic. We clearly need to have some rational policy to arrive at a situation in which we are not disadvantaging people twice over: first, because of the extra costs of organic production and, secondly, because they are not getting the premium.

I said five years ago that the pig industry was one of the few rational sectors, in the sense that it had not been systematically destroyed by the lunacies of the common agricultural policy. Alas, it has been systematically destroyed by other lunacies since then, not all of which started then but which have been aggravated. The asymmetry of regulation between the United Kingdom and competing countries—Poland, Denmark and the Netherlands—in the pig industry has reached levels that exceed those that I warned about in previous years, so far as I can see from West Dorset.

I have in West Dorset—sorry, I had in West Dorset—probably the most efficient and sophisticated operation in the British pig industry. Denhay Farms was a process industry that related pigs to dairy and used cycles of production—in effect, it was in a combined cycle. It is a highly modern operation based on niche marketing. One can buy Denhay produce in the most expensive shops in Britain at high premiums. It is a tightly organised business on a very large scale. It would be impossible to imagine a business, other than the very large Velcourt-type operations, that is more modern in its approach than Denhay.

I do not know how we can hope that there will continue to be a pig industry if Denhay has given up pig production, as is now the case. It is still producing bacon and the excellent smoked ham but it has no pigs, because it no longer makes sense to have pigs in Britain. It makes sense to import the pigs.

When we import the pigs, we export the cruelty. Because the asymmetry of regulation is so great, countries have animal welfare standards of pig production well below those that previously obtained in the UK. They are producing pigs and dumping them. I persist in believing that there is a significant case for assessing that as predatory pricing on the part of some producers in other countries. They are using low-cost production to engage in predatory pricing to destroy the British pig industry, and once destroyed the costs of entry are considerable. We are still under pressure that would increase the likelihood that no pig industry will exist in Britain. People write to me—as they probably do to the Minister—about the need to end the use of farrowing crates. That would be the final blow. I also discover from constituents in Tolpuddle that they, as small organic outdoor pig producers who are just surviving thanks to their organic status, will no longer be allowed to engage in cutting on farm. As a result of some meat products regulations, they will have to use an approved abattoir miles away. Why add another level of regulation that will end up by destroying what little agriculture is left?

I have said in previous years, and I will say again, that the crisis will come in bovine tuberculosis. It will be greater than anybody presently imagines, because consumer confidence will be affected to such a degree that Ministers will not be able to contain it, if there is a serious outbreak of bovine TB. However untrue it may be that bovine TB affects the quality of milk—I do not offer a scientific opinion on that, because I have no scientific background from which to do so—the hysteria will generate a huge fall in consumer confidence if a widespread outbreak occurs.

The Krebs tests have gone well beyond an appropriate time scale. We still do not have any reason to believe that they will produce a sensible policy on badgers in any reasonable time. We do not have any sign of the development of accurate tests or proper vaccinations, but I hope that the Minister can tell us that something can be done about that promptly.

Many farmers in my constituency will not be able to afford the cost of the new scheme for fallen stock that is due to start in April. The Government have talked about partial funding, but we need to know more, and quickly, because it is now February. I hope that the Minister will be able to tell us that the partial funding will in fact be complete funding.

The Minister will be aware from his correspondence records that I—and, I am sure, many other Members—have written to him repeatedly about the problems with the British Cattle Movement Service. The organisation continues to provide aggravation that is farming's equivalent of the Passport Agency or the immigration and nationality department, although it does not reach quite the same levels. The problems caused by BCMS cross-checking with the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs about non-payments and delays have left some of my farmers tearing their hair out. I hope that the DEFRA review will lead to improvements, and I would be grateful for the Minister's comment on that.

I may be a ludicrous optimist and, indeed, the fact that I am talking about agriculture in the area of west Dorset at all suggests that I probably am, because the pessimists do not believe that it will exist in future.

However, I have long harboured the hope that many of the problems that I have outlined could be significantly ameliorated in the long run by a movement towards biofuels. It could have huge environmental consequences, as I am sure the Minister agrees. Therefore, in my area we welcomed unreservedly the biodiesel changes in the Budget of a 20p reduction in tax per litre. I also welcome the pre-Budget report suggestion that the tax on bioethanol will be similarly reduced. I am conscious of the fiscal constraints on the Chancellor and I understand that they are getting tighter, but industry estimates suggest that the cost differential between biofuels and ordinary fuels is more than 20p—it is more in the region of 25p to 30p a litre. That explains why we have not yet reached the tipping point and why the uptake of the opportunity to produce biofuels has not yet become significant.

I hope that the Minister shares my belief and is willing to lobby the Chancellor on the point. It will be a case of Treasury myopia if 20p per litre is not increased to 30p, or at least to 27p or 28p. If we could reach a tipping point, the benefit would be felt in the environmental effects and the huge advantages for my farmers in west Dorset, and it would also make a significant fiscal impact. If the industry could develop significantly, it would add, to the direct taxation on the sale of fuels—which is classed, oddly enough, in Treasuryspeak as indirect taxation—the indirect tax, which is known in Treasuryspeak as direct tax, on the corporations that are making money by producing the fuel. If the two are added together and compared to anything other than North sea production, such as imported fuel or allowing increased exports of North sea production, the fiscal equation begins to look very different from that on which I imagine the Treasury mandarins are currently basing their calculations. I hope that DEFRA will use its endeavours to persuade the Chancellor that it would make sense to try to reach that tipping point. We are almost there. It would not require much further effort, but it would make a huge difference to my farmers if they could see that light on the horizon.

I have taken 16 minutes, and I leave the remaining 14 minutes to the Minister to provide—I hope—the answers that will make my farmers happy for the first time in a long time.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Elliot Morley): I congratulate the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) on obtaining the debate and on making an effective case. He has dealt with a range of issues affecting his agricultural constituents and I understand and share many of the concerns that he has raised.

Milk prices have been poor for a range of reasons. Prices are influenced by world prices, as well as home demand, production levels and the exchange rate. We have tried to provide assistance for our dairy sector through the mechanisms of the common agricultural policy, but the real problem is supply and demand and the volatile nature of the market. In the aftermath of foot and mouth, it was calculated that the dairy sector would experience a dip in production and a potential rise in demand. However the dip did not materialise, and an increase in production has led to price falls. Other innocent victims were those people who had converted into organic milk production, who were caught by the same problem of supply and demand. The right hon. Gentleman was right to point to the danger of targets, which can play a role in driving policies, but care must be taken not to apply them too rigidly. If targets are applied too rigidly, production starts to be focused on just hitting the target, instead of responding to market demand, and that risks having an effect on the premium.

I am glad to say that we have produced an organic action plan that contains the flexibility that the right hon. Gentleman wishes to see. It has the support of the organic bodies, the National Farmers Union, consumer groups and environmental groups. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman has had the chance to see the plan, but I can ensure that he is sent a copy. I am sure that it will be of interest to him.

The right hon. Gentleman also rightly raised the issue of the current negotiations in the mid-term review. We think that the Commission is heading in the right general direction, especially on decoupling, the problem of production subsidies and the need for changes to the CAP. We will not achieve any of our objectives in the World Trade Organisation negotiations unless other countries see us making progress on agricultural production subsidies that distort the market, affect developing countries and do not even deliver for our own farmers in their artificial effect on prices.

I understand and share the right hon. Gentleman's concerns about the modulation elements of the proposal. Modulation is not ideal, because the ideal outcome would be the removal of all production subsidies, which would allow the freedom to apply the rural development policy and environmental policies without that rigid framework. However, we do not live in an ideal world and, as part of a transition, a case can be made for modulating the direct support payments and putting the money into the rural development fund framework. In that way, the money would go back into the rural economy. It is an opportunity for farmers and it would use the money more constructively than simply using it for production subsidies, with all their attendant problems. At present, the way in which the modulation proposals are unfolding in the mid-term review is not logical and would work against the nature and structure of UK farming. Nor would they deliver the money in the same way to the rural development programmes. We will try to change that.

I have much sympathy for the points that the right hon. Gentleman raised about pigs. The pig industry is strong in my area and I have much regard for the industry for precisely the reasons that he advanced. It has always operated without subsidies, it is efficient and good at marketing and, left to its own devices, has been a successful sector of agriculture. Unfortunately the industry has faced similar problems with prices as other sectors have. Prices are stable, but do not provide the sort of return that the industry needs and deserves. When the industry went through a very difficult period a few years ago, the Government made £66 million available over three years to assist it through the restructuring scheme. It was taken up by many sectors in the industry.

I understand that the Commission introduced private storage aids in December 2002, which are also designed to stabilise the market and improve prices. That is a considerable commitment from the Government in recognition of the particular problems that the pig industry faces. We are also trying to re-open some of the important markets for pig meat products that have been lost over the years for various reasons. For example, Japan used to be a high value market for a range of pig products, and we are working hard to re-open those markets. DEFRA is also sponsoring the world pork congress, which is designed to stimulate international trade—something that our industry has always been very successful in achieving.

We are also trying, with some success, to improve the market for genetic products. That market has been subject to some restrictions, but embryos and semen have been high value exports for our industry in the past. When I attend international conferences, I always take the opportunity to meet the Agriculture Minister of the country to press the case for semen and embryos, so I have become something of an expert on the international trade in those products. I perform the same service for the beef sector, and for ovines—other areas in which we have traditionally had high quality and high value, if limited, exports. We will do our best to assist the pig industry within the rules that apply.

The right hon. Gentleman also mentioned bovine TB. It is a difficult issue, but I do not believe that we may face a potential consumer problem. TB in cattle posed a real problem before pasteurisation, but since its introduction milk has been absolutely safe. Bovine TB cannot be passed on through pasteurised milk and that protects the consumer.

Mr. Letwin: I took pains not to challenge that scientific view, but does the Minister agree that the hysteria of the tabloid press and the fears of those who are no longer convinced by the scientific evidence are likely to lead to a scare that we are unlikely to be able to counter, no matter how rational our explanation?

Mr. Morley: I understand that point, and it is fair to say that we cannot predict how food scares will take hold. However, there is no rationale for any such scare, and we can demonstrate that. The existence of the Food Standards Agency has also made a huge difference to consumer confidence. The right hon. Gentleman is right to say that the credibility of Government scientists and Departments has been damaged by food scares, especially in the days of the old Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. The FSA, which has an independent role, has been successful in providing well-balanced and rational opinions on food issues.

We have introduced extra measures to deal with the backlog in TB testing that built up during the foot and mouth crisis, when we diverted all our staff and resources, and we are making progress. We have also recently introduced a new package of control measures, which involves the licensed movement off farm of non-reactor cattle, in certain circumstances; the imposition of movement restrictions on herds with overdue tests; and a pilot project to assess the effectiveness of the gamma interferon blood test, which is what I think the right hon. Gentleman meant when he talked of better and more accurate tests. The test is relatively new and we are introducing it in several areas to test its effectiveness. We hope that it will be faster and more accurate, which would certainly assist our TB control strategies.

As the right hon. Gentleman mentioned, we also have the Krebs experiment and the independent scientific group, chaired by Professor Bourne, which does an excellent job in advising the Government. We also have a stakeholder group on animal health issues, and a TB forum on which the industry is represented. That gives farmers an opportunity to raise their concerns.

It is true that we presently spend £30 million on fallen stock collection, including over-30-month stock, fallen cattle under our BSE monitoring and the result of transmissible spongiform encephalopathy monitoring in sheep. We made an offer to the industry to set up a national organisation. We are already committed to collecting the money, but we could use it to put in place the framework of a national collection service. We are also willing to provide up to £500 million to set up the organisation. We would require a contribution from the industry but we could keep it to a minimum. At the moment, the industry feels that the Government should pay 100 per cent. of the costs, but we cannot do so under state aid rules. We feel that the industry should make some contribution. We are still discussing the issue and the offer is still open if the industry wishes to take it up.

The BCMS has experienced some problems with computer control. I understand the right hon. Gentleman's concern and we will try to ensure that the problems are addressed and rectified.

I share the right hon. Gentleman's optimism on biofuels. The range of biocrops potentially has a bright future. The 20p cut in tax on biodiesel has stimulated the market. Indeed, the local garage in the village of Winterton, where I live, sells biodiesel and I fill my diesel Land Rover with it. I am slightly disappointed that it is the same price as ordinary diesel—I thought that it might have been cheaper. Nevertheless, because it is an environmentally friendly fuel, I am keen to use it. Biofuels could have a greater role to play and a case could be made to consider further the fiscal incentives. As the sponsoring ministry, DEFRA wants to see a good future for biofuels. If there is a good argument for further fiscal inducements, we are prepared to consider them and make representations to the Treasury accordingly.

I thank the right hon. Gentleman for the way in which he put his case. The issues that we have discussed are important and DEFRA is trying to address them. It is an ongoing process, although I am encouraged by the latest signs of increases in some farming incomes in some sectors. There is a long way to go, but it is better to see figures going up rather than down.

Unitary Authorities

2 pm

Jane Griffiths (Reading, East): I am grateful for the opportunity to discuss unitary authorities in the broadest sense. They have been with us for several years, and it is now time to take stock of their efficacy and their operation. After all, local government reform and local government review seem to happen almost continuously. We have a review, some changes are made, and almost immediately the next review is upon us.

County councils, which almost seem like a part of history, have not been a local government unit for all that many years. For example, when Berkshire county council was abolished a few years ago, there was much breast beating and hand wringing—if it is physically possible to do both at the same time. People said that our county was being abolished, taking part of our history with it—but that was not really true. It is true that Berkshire, as an entity, existed for centuries, but its boundaries have changed from time to time. Its county town used to be Abingdon, but with boundary changes, that rightly became Reading, which is, of course, the capital of the Thames valley—and which should be a city, as I am sure hon. Members of all parties will agree.

In fact, Berkshire was an artificial county, very much a creature of the Local Government Act 1972, and the move towards unitary local government was the right approach to adopt at the time. Most counties vary in character from urban through suburban to rural, and Berkshire is no exception. It has the urban centres of Reading, Bracknell and Slough, the rural expanse of west Berkshire with its racecourses and rolling downs, and the suburban and commuter towns and villages of Wokingham district. Many other counties are largely rural but contain large towns, so their character varies.

In the 1960s, Bedfordshire, the county in which I grew up, varied from the urban car factories of the south through the brickfields at the centre to the onion fields of the north. It has changed somewhat, and I would not presume to trespass on the territory of the hon. Members who represent the communities of Bedfordshire now, so I shall discuss the unitary authorities of Berkshire, particularly Reading and Wokingham—areas that I have the honour to represent.

I would like to air issues about the provision of services by local government and try to reach a view on the optimum size of population per unit of local government, and on the closeness to the population of those who are elected as representatives and determine council tax and spending.

Let us consider the purpose of local government. Historically, county councils have been responsible for education, personal social services, libraries, museums and art galleries, structure plans, highways and parking, refuse disposal, the control of mineral and gravel extraction, fire and rescue services, civil defence, weights and measures and consumer protection services—a heavy responsibility.

Shire districts have been responsible for housing, environmental health services, refuse collection, local plans and development control, markets, land charges, parks, recreation and leisure facilities generally, museums and art galleries—often jointly with county councils—crematoriums and cemeteries and a variety of licensing and registration functions, including public entertainment licensing and taxi driver licensing. They too have a heavy work load and a heavy responsibility, quite different from those of county councils.

Most county councils, because of the variety of communities that they have the duty to represent, will have a variety of representation. A county council member who represents a rural district or division may not be particularly knowledgeable about an urban part of that county and may not be inclined to vote resources in that direction, or wish to divert them there. That is a historical problem that affects county councils as units of local government.

The review of local government really got under way in 1990, when the then Environment Secretary rightly said that the review of local government would "rule nothing in and rule nothing out"—[Official Report, 5 December 1990; Vol. 182, c. 318.]

That led to the establishment of the Local Government Commission and to the enactment of the principle that where possible, there should be single-tier government, because two-tier government is likely to produce excessive bureaucracy and duplication of effort. In practice, the process, which tied up councillors and officers for several years in efforts to arrive at sensible solutions for their areas, produced workable unitary authorities only in mainly urban areas.

Outside the metropolitan conurbations, most counties acquired unitary authorities. Cambridgeshire contained Peterborough unitary authority, Bedfordshire contained Luton and so on. I will not weary the House with an account of the lengthy and at times acrimonious debates that took place in Berkshire about the future of its local government. Should there be four, five or six unitary authorities? Should Berkshire county council stay or should it go? If there were four or five unitary authorities, the existing districts would have to expand their boundaries. Would that result in a change of political control in those councils? Did that matter? Berkshire, in common with much of the south of England, is not a one-party state. Its eight hon. Members in the House represent all three main parties and its local authorities are similarly situated.

In Berkshire, we faced the dilemma of arriving at a consensus between those who wanted to retain their existing political control—a natural instinct on the part of anyone who has been elected—even at the expense of effective local government, and those who were prepared to jeopardise their personal political futures, as it might have been seen, to achieve effective representation and provision of services. To cut a long and tedious story short, there was furious lobbying and debate, and the occasional exchange of threats and promise of reward. That was all done in the most punctilious fashion; nothing improper took place.

Eventually, the Secretary of State decided that although the Local Government Commission had recommended the creation of five unitary authorities, there should be six within the existing boundaries of the shire district. In 1996, Berkshire county council was refused leave to appeal against the ruling. Thus were born the Berkshire unitary authorities of Bracknell Forest, Newbury—now renamed West Berkshire—

[Jane Griffiths]

Reading, Slough, Windsor and Maidenhead, and Wokingham. Although not typical, in that throughout Berkshire there is only one tier of local government, the Berkshire unitary authorities provide a useful pointer to the future of effective local government and should inform the inevitable review of local government that will, and should, take place sooner or later.

I remind the House of the guidance that was given to the Local Government Commission in relation to carrying out its work. The commission was told that, although reorganisation should be worth while and cost-effective over time, it was not "precluded from recommending an option which would be more expensive than the status quo if it believes that the cost would be outweighed by other considerations".

The commission was "instructed to look at representation and the provision of services from the viewpoint of the citizen, not the authority. It should take into account the extent to which a possible structure might improve responsiveness to local people. For example, it should consider the potential effect on elected members' ability to give political leadership, and on the level of understanding of local government, and participation in it, by local people and organisations".

I would suggest that that part of the guidance is salutary for us all to consider, even now. The Local Government Commission did some excellent work, but much remains to be done. How wide and how deep is understanding of local government among ordinary council tax payers?

Mr. Martin Salter (Reading, West): My hon. Friend is making a good point, and drawing the attention of the Chamber to the fact that it was a Conservative Secretary of State who chose to ignore the recommendations of the Local Government Commission. I have two points on the lessons to be learned from that. First, is the Conservative party not being completely hypocritical when it mourns the impending demise of the counties, because it was a Conservative Secretary of State who abolished Berkshire county council? Secondly, the decision to create six unitary authorities in Berkshire was criticised at the time as a political fix. What are my hon. Friend's views on those matters?

Jane Griffiths: My hon. Friend is right to make those points. The Secretary of State in the Conservative Government of the time was the ultimate decision maker on the future of local government in Berkshire. The decision was indeed criticised as a political fix, and I recall that the two Conservative Members representing the two Reading constituencies applauded the demise of Berkshire county council and the creation of those unitary authorities. It is not for me here to comment on or seek to analyse Conservative party policy; that is for Conservative Members. However, my hon. Friend's points are well made.

The commission was told that when it recommended the creation of unitary authorities, it should aim to make them responsible for all local government functions rather than passing existing authorities' functions to joint boards—an idea that was considered at the time. That is because the potential benefits of unitary authorities are lost if those authorities, and the communities that they represent, do not have direct responsibility. Although it was probably right to jettison the notion of joint boards in almost all cases, the aim of making a unitary authority responsible for all local government functions, although it has technically been achieved, has not really been fulfilled in terms of local council tax payers' appreciation of how such services work.

We have all failed in some measure if what we want is truly participative local democracy. The local government that we now have is an improvement on the previous structure—certainly in Berkshire it is—but there is a very long way to go.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge): Does the hon. Lady have any data to hand on participation rates in elections in unitary authorities compared with those in two-tier authorities? If so, it would reinforce her point.

Jane Griffiths: I know that participation rates in local elections are higher in unitary authorities than in county council elections. County council elections are often held on the same day as other elections, perhaps general elections. That affects participation rates. Most unitary authorities are largely, if not entirely, urban, and participation rates tend to be a little lower in urban than in suburban or semi-rural areas. I am not sure what conclusion can be drawn from those points, but participation rates in different types of district would merit further study.

The commission was guided as follows:

"Any new structure should enable functions to be performed in a way which is cost-effective, is responsive to local needs and conforms with statute, EU directives and regulations and national policy requirements."

Did that happen with unitary authorities and the new structures? Do they enable those functions to be performed cost-effectively? I shall explain later that in some ways they do not. That is not necessarily the fault of unitary authorities, and certainly not usually the fault of elected members and officers of those authorities, but in some cases the fact that they are unitary can work against cost-effective provision of local services.

There are problems in Berkshire—I am referring to Reading and Wokingham rather than the other local authorities in Berkshire. Two areas in which unitary authorities face particular difficulties are transport infrastructure and education provision, as well as the ever vexed question of local government finance. Just about every unitary authority, and many others, will tell anyone who will listen that they believe themselves to be underfunded, but it is difficult to make judgments about that from the outside.

Reading is typical of small unitary authorities in that in this era of parental choice, its secondary schools cannot accommodate all its school-age population. There is no comprehensive school in east Reading, so 11 to 18-year-olds, by and large, go to school in Wokingham district. The present nature of local government finance means that Wokingham receives less for each child it educates than Reading does. The reasons for that are various, but largely concern particular needs that are suffered by more young people in Reading than in Wokingham district, because the character of those two districts is different. Thus Reading children travel outside the borough to school and Wokingham must consider the needs of Reading children when it plans its education services. Under Berkshire county council that was not the case—although Berkshire county council as an education authority had serious deficiencies.

Three quarters of my constituents live in Reading borough, but considerably fewer are educated there. It is logical for any local education authority to plan to educate the children of its council tax payers. Neither Reading nor Wokingham can do that, so the arrangements must be examined again. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will consider the difficult issues that face small authorities when they are trying to plan education provision. Perhaps he will discuss the matter with his colleagues.

Mr. Salter: On education provision, my hon. Friend will recall that the recommendations of the Local Government Commission for England in respect of Berkshire, particularly Reading, envisaged a sensible expansion of Reading's outdated 100-year-old boundaries, which would have picked up many of the schools built subsequently on the periphery of the urban area of Reading. Had the absurd decision to create six unitary authorities not been made, many of the education problems to which my hon. Friend refers would not have occurred.

Jane Griffiths: That is certainly the case. My view at the time was that the six proposed unitary authority boundaries were much too tightly drawn. Many thousands of people who do not live in the borough of Reading consider that they live in Reading, because they work and shop there. Their children may be educated in Wokingham, but they use Reading to meet just about all their other needs.

I have referred to schools in east Reading, but the problem is greater in south Reading. I apologise if I sound parochial, but the issues facing Reading and other authorities in Berkshire are pertinent to unitary authorities—throughout England, at least. South Reading has two comprehensive schools: Reading girls school and Thamesbridge college, which is in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West (Mr. Salter). Just over the border in Wokingham is Ryeish green school, more than 60 per cent. of whose pupils live in Reading borough. Wokingham needs secondary school places elsewhere in its district, and has been considering whether Ryeish Green school should be relocated to meet that need. That proposal, which was considered by Wokingham quite recently, led to a campaign, run by Reading councillors and by my hon. Friend, for the school to be retained in its present location in the interests of the children who go there. The future options for that school and others in Wokingham district are being considered. Wokingham had hoped for a private finance initiative for its schools, but that has not so far been authorised. I hope that, with his colleagues, my hon. Friend the Minister will find an opportunity to reconsider that.

My view is that the two schools in south Reading within Reading borough are not well served by the existence of Ryeish Green school in its present location. We are left with that piece of history: there are three schools, the people of south Reading need to send their children to school, and the money is in the wrong place—I believe that one of the schools is in the wrong place too.

The families who have the greatest choice in educating their children, because of transport and other factors, tend to choose Ryeish Green and other schools outside Reading borough. That makes it extremely difficult for Reading girls school and Thamesbridge college to fulfil their potential and that of the children who attend them. This factor creates a burden for Reading borough council, which is responsible for those two schools. That means that things are difficult for Reading borough council in the present funding regime, and my constituents who live in south Reading are not well served. Education provision is a continuing problem for Reading and Wokingham unitary councils, and could usefully be scrutinised by my hon. Friend the Minister and his colleagues. Size does matter; education does matter.

The transport infrastructure is also a burning issue for unitary authorities.

Mr. Hammond: The hon. Lady has just said that size matters. I shall ask the Minister later about size in relation to unitary authorities. From her experience, and that of her neighbours and colleagues in what used to be Berkshire, does the hon. Lady have a view on the minimum size, and perhaps the maximum size, of an effective unitary authority?

Jane Griffiths: It would be difficult to arrive at a population figure and say no fewer than that—or no more than that. That could cause problems. The density or sparsity of population would affect the number of people who could receive good governance from a unitary authority. The population of the borough of Reading is about 150,000, whereas the usership of the borough is a quarter of a million, possibly more. That anomaly needs to be addressed.

Mr. Salter: Before my hon. Friend moves away from the subject of education, I thank her for drawing attention to the successful campaign, run by myself and by local councillors and parents, to allow freedom of choice, and to allow the people of south Reading to choose Ryeish Green school for their children. Does she acknowledge that the campaign was supported not only by the Labour party in Reading but by the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) and by the Minister, who made the position of the Department for Education and Skills clear to Wokingham council? The proposal to move Ryeish Green school some eight miles to Finchampstead has now been dropped. That has been acknowledged in a press release from Wokingham district council. Will my hon. Friend clarify her position? Does she believe that parents in south Reading should be denied the opportunity to send their children to a school outside the boundary, such as Ryeish Green?

Jane Griffiths: I would never say that parents living anywhere should be denied the opportunity to send their children to the school of their choice, whether it is in the borough in which they lived or not. My point about Ryeish Green school is that the other two schools in south Reading are not well served by its existence. The fact that more than 60 per cent. of its pupils live in Reading borough shows the choice that parents in Reading are making. That is their privilege, and I would not seek to deny anyone that choice.

Under the Greenwich judgment, it would not be lawful to limit the geographical origin of the pupils of any school. I do not believe that the question arises. At Ryeish Green school, things have moved on and various options for the future are being considered. When the debate being held behind closed doors emerges and conclusions are reached, it will be salutary for all of us, because that debate goes to the heart of the problems of small local authorities. This is a question not of the quality of the schools concerned, but of where the money goes.

I want to talk about transport infrastructure, which is a burning issue for unitary authorities. The near impossibility of planning and implementing transport infrastructure projects for unitary authorities, especially small authorities, is well known. That is one reason for the widespread support for regional government, which I share—but we are not here to debate regional government today, although I hope that there will be opportunities to do so in the future; we are here to debate unitary authorities.

The Thames valley is one of the most affluent areas of the country, and as a consequence has one of the severest traffic congestion problems. It is imperative that the local authorities in the Thames valley work together to plan, manage and minimise that congestion.

The Thames runs through the north of my constituency. There are only two crossings of the river in Reading, which contributes greatly to the traffic congestion in the north and centre of my constituency. Much of the traffic does not need to be there, but is there because there are only two realistic ways to get across the Thames. There is almost no public transport alternative across the Thames, if one lives outside the borough of Reading. People drive in from South Oxfordshire because they work in Reading. The catchment are of Reading is about a quarter of a million people, some of whom live in villages in South Oxfordshire.

The issue of a third Thames crossing has been debated among the various local authorities in their changing guises since the 1920s, and no solution has yet been found. Most local authorities in the area favour a new road bridge across the Thames, but the more rural authorities to the north do not want it to be in their territory. That position is untenable. If we want a road, it has to go somewhere.

In transport planning, as hon. Members will know, there is never one solution to a problem. There is always a range, each of which will do something—but not everything—to reduce congestion and make journeys easier. My own solution is a light rail system. Light rail is an excellent transport mode for urban areas such as greater Reading. In Reading, we are greatly envious of the excellent system enjoyed by Croydon—and we felt better able to commiserate with Croydon when both towns failed to achieve city status. We will get over it.

Light rail, however, is unlikely to provide a good solution in sparsely populated rural areas. That is why the Berkshire unitary authorities, and the neighbouring authorities in Oxfordshire, cannot agree. While they fail to agree, traffic congestion increases week by week. Parts of my constituency, such as central and east Reading, achieve—if that is the word—severe pollution and dangerously low air quality on far too many days of the year. All the best efforts of Reading borough council to encourage alternative modes of transport, excellent though they are, will never remove the problem. Unitary authorities will never be able to plan transport infrastructure effectively acting alone, because there are too many factors beyond their control.

Upon the demise of Berkshire county council, a body was set up—the Reading urban area package, comprising Reading, Wokingham and West Berkshire councils. If small unitary authorities were really the answer, why was the package necessary? The Reading urban area package does some very useful work of benefit to all, which none of the unitaries could have done alone. This is not an argument for the return of Berkshire county council—far from it. Unitary authorities need to join together to achieve outcomes that are of benefit to all. It may be difficult for them, with different political colours and strategies, much like the three councils that I have just mentioned.

Mr. Hammond: Is the hon. Lady sure that she has drawn the right conclusion? She said that she was not calling for the return of Berkshire, but that the unitary authorities within the county were too small. Is she sure that small unitary authorities working together is the right solution? How did she arrive at the conclusion that larger unitary authorities—perhaps countywide—are not the solution?

Jane Griffiths: Our experience in Berkshire leads to my strong conviction that a county council model is not the right solution. I will not waver from that. I tried to highlight the problems faced by small unitary authorities. If they were larger—obviously there would be fewer of them—the problems would be less difficult to tackle. However, they would still be there, and there would still have to be joint working. The realisation that joint working had to take place was an immediate acknowledgment, upon the demise of Berkshire county council, that the new authorities were too small. Some of us said that all along, but it fell on deaf ears.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight): I apologise to the hon. Lady for arriving in the middle of her speech. Perhaps she could help me with two questions. First, has the Electoral Commission reviewed the boundaries of the unitary authorities in Berkshire, or is Reading making such a proposal? Does she feel that there could be a better arrangement of unitary authorities in Berkshire? Secondly, what would be her advice to authorities that do not have adjoining unitary authorities?

Jane Griffiths: We do expect a review of the boundaries in Berkshire, but exactly when we shall have one I do not know. Part of the reason for today's debate, ahead of any review, is to highlight some of the issues. I appreciate the difficulties that the hon. Gentleman might face. For geographical reasons, his unitary county—I believe it is the only one—has no other to join with and so works alone. I also appreciate that he might have a very heavy constituency work load, because he represents more people than most of us do. He has my sympathy. I am sure that he does an excellent job.

We must find a new way to encourage unitary authorities to work together, or to oblige them to do so if they are unwilling. Otherwise, all their council tax payers are let down. Central Government take full account of that. Ministers often receive delegations and are lobbied on issues that, if local authorities were of sustainable size, could be resolved at local level, without the need for ministerial intervention.

Some small local authorities own land and property outside their boundaries. It might have come to them from the previous county council or might simply be there for historical reasons. That is the case in Berkshire. Reading borough council owns a considerable number of properties in Woodley, in the Wokingham district, which is in my constituency. I doubt that that situation is unique. The residents who live there find it difficult to understand why they must pay their council tax to Wokingham and their rent to Reading. If they have nuisance neighbours they must contact Wokingham to complain about noise or environmental health hazards. If they need housing repairs they must contact Reading. That is not a customer-friendly provision of local government services. I mean no disrespect to Reading borough council when I say that there is no great incentive for Reading, with its limited resources, to prioritise putting money into property that is outside the council's boundaries. The brutal political reality is that no one who lives in those houses can vote in the Reading borough council elections. Tenants of one council who live in another often lose out on services, through no fault of their own. We must do whatever we can to tackle that problem.

That was the experience of my constituents in Woodley. Fortunately, the matter has now been resolved, and I am glad to say that they are getting their housing repairs. However, such circumstances must exist elsewhere to a considerable extent. I am sure that hon. Members of all parties often encounter such problems in their casework.

I would like to highlight another issue that particularly affects Reading and other small unitary authorities with urban centres that attract a great many people for work, shopping or entertainment. The people who come in do not pay council tax to the authority. Although they make a welcome contribution to the economy of towns such as Reading, they place a considerable burden on local services, for which the people who live in the town must pay.

There are more people on Minster street in Reading, which is pub and club land in my constituency, at 1 am on Fridays and Saturdays than there are at 1 pm. Managers of local authorities did not anticipate such inflows of people, but they are increasingly common. Few people would want Reading to return to the sleepy market town that it was many years ago, but at any given time most of the people on the streets of Reading are people who live outside the borough, but fairly close to it.

I was very pleased by the recent launch of the business improvement districts, which will include Reading. That programme, which is very welcome, will go some way to redressing the balance, but it does not entirely solve the problem. Size does matter. How should the council tax payers of Reading reconcile their wish for a lively local economy with the fact that they are subsidising residents of Wokingham, West Berkshire and South Oxfordshire councils who want to have a good time?

Mr. Hammond: Is the hon. Lady suggesting that the people who flood into Reading do not spend any money or contribute to the local economy?

Jane Griffiths: Not at all. They contribute greatly to the local economy and create job opportunities. Reading university is popular, partly because students who are struggling but do not wish to incur large debts know that they can get jobs. The entertainment economy—the evening economy—in Reading is staffed by students. It is an asset to the town, but services such as the police, and, to some extent, general emergency services, are called on in places with a lively evening economy.

Reading also has a rock festival and the Womad festival, to which tens of thousands of people come to enjoy themselves. The cost falls disproportionately on the council tax payers, many of whom may not be able to afford to enjoy themselves in the pubs and clubs of Reading. That is a problem.

That brings me to the vexed issue of local government finance. The population of Berkshire is growing, as it is in much of the south of England. There is a problem of data lag—a new piece of jargon—in areas in which the actual population is greater than the planned population. If one uses census figures to project house building and to plan how many people will live in a district, they will always be behind. If the population is static, there is not a problem. If it is declining, there may be empty homes. We do not have a significant number of empty homes in Reading and Wokingham.

I can do no better than share with the House a letter that was sent by Wokingham council to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. It is headed "Revenue Support Grant 2003/04":

> "In general the Council welcomes the proposals. The recognition that the costs of providing services in Wokingham are higher than authorities in the "other south east" block and the introduction of the "Berkshire Non Fringe" is particularly welcome."

We can see that a whole flurry of jargon is threatening to overwhelm us. The letter continues:

> "We are also pleased to note that a number of the other changes in methodology supported by the Council have been adopted. In addition the census population data has shown the degree to which the previous data used in the distribution process understated the true demands on this Council's services. This is clearly good news for Wokingham and reinforces our previous representations on the inadequacy of Wokingham's grant...Whilst the floors and ceilings concept is fully supported by the Council the magnitude of grant entitlement being held back has serious implications. It represents £6m or 5 per cent. of our budget requirement and will mean that, in spite of the good news, real and damaging service cuts will be required to keep the rise in Council Tax to a reasonable level. We cannot believe that this is an intention of the floors and ceilings mechanism."

[Jane Griffiths]

I am sharing that with hon. Members because Wokingham is a small unitary authority in an affluent area. It incurs high costs when providing services, because skilled workers are hard to find. However, low-paid workers, such as care workers, are even harder to find, because they cannot easily afford to live in such districts. That is also largely true of Reading—although we were pleased to find that the rise in council tax may not, after all, be as prohibitive as we had thought.

Mr. Hammond: That problem exists throughout the high-pressure areas of the south-east. It certainly exists throughout Surrey. It has nothing whatever to do with unitary structures. We have two-tier arrangements throughout Surrey, and we have exactly the same problems in recruiting and retaining lower-paid staff.

Jane Griffiths: The hon. Gentleman is right, and I simply mention the issue in passing because unitary and other authorities—regardless of whether they are single-tier or two-tier—tend to raise it with Departments when they discuss finance levels. I did not highlight it earlier, because, as the hon. Gentleman said, it is not specific to single-tier local government. None the less, the issue does arise.

After it became clear that I would be introducing this debate, I was contacted by Telford and Wrekin unitary authority, which is very concerned about the issues before us, and I am happy to share a little of what it had to say:

"If data lag on population is not addressed the new formula is still no fairer to growing authorities. We still have to provide services to the population growth for two years without any Government support. This is not rough justice—it is a fundamental flaw in the formula."

I am inclined to agree. The authority continued:

"The Growth Areas Group suggested that the population figures used for the 2003/04 settlement should be updated from the 2001 data by estimating population growth for 2002 and 2003 based on the average known growth for the last three or five available years."

It noted that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister

"felt this was too complicated and suggested the use of a targeted grant instead—outside the floors and ceilings methodology. The Formula Review Group accepted this in principle without objection and this formed the basis of the consultation option."

However, the effects of the census have skewed population numbers. The data are not real—they are rapidly outdated.

The authority continued:

"the census shows previous population figures used for RSG"—

rate support grant—

"have been understated. The Council has lost grant over the years as a result. Now that the population figures are correct for 2001, it is difficult to explain to the public that the Government is not willing to use them to address the data lag anomaly, because the previous years' figures were wrong! That is surely penalising the Council twice."

Speaking as someone from outside Telford, I pass the authority's points on at face value, because they show that the issues that affect unitary authorities in Berkshire also affect many other authorities in England.

The final issue that I shall mention is licensing, which will place a disproportionate burden on small unitary authorities. We may see a change in legislation—I hope that we do—to modernise licensing laws in the near future. When that happens, the decision-making burden will fall on local authorities. Much of what was previously done by magistrates will be done by local authorities, but people who live in Reading, for example, will expect the enforcement of licensing laws to continue at least at the same level. It will be difficult for small unitary authorities, which have a limited tax base, to fulfil their responsibilities, and I shall raise that matter again on other occasions.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will consider those issues. I look forward to hearing from him whether he agrees that small unitary authorities often experience many difficulties, not of their making, in providing local services effectively. I hope that he will agree to discuss with his colleagues ways in which good and effective unitary authorities, such as Reading and Wokingham, can be helped to become even better and more effective.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): Order. It might be as well if I reminded hon. Members that it is customary practice in 90-minute Adjournment debates to commence the first of the three winding-up speeches 30 minutes before the conclusion, which means that there are 14 minutes left for general debate.

2.46 pm

Mr. Martin Salter (Reading, West): I assure the Chamber that I shall not speak for 14 minutes. I imagine that my colleagues have heard more about Reading than they ever thought they would, and I apologise for the fact that they are about to hear a little more. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths) on securing the debate. Frankly, given the number of unitary authorities that exist, and notwithstanding the obvious difficulties that the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) would have in contributing to the debate, I am surprised that more hon. Members have not decided to participate. Unitary authorities have been in place for sufficiently long for us to conclude certain things about their inception and operation. Perhaps we can learn lessons from the past and rectify mistakes. I am certainly looking forward to a boundary review in Reading, but I shall deal with that later.

My hon. Friend talked about the optimum size of an authority, and discussed the matter with the Conservative Front-Bench spokesman. I have not researched the subject, but I seem to remember that the criteria to which the commission was working, or which it published, referred to a unitary authority with a population of no fewer than 120,000 people and up to 250,000 or 300,000. I have a similar relationship with West Berkshire to that which my hon. Friend has with Wokingham, in that one third of my constituency is in West Berkshire—and has the misfortune of coming under Liberal control, although I am not sure for how much longer—and the other two thirds are well represented by Reading borough council. The recommendations of the Local Government Commission did not envisage that West Berkshire and Wokingham would exist in their current form. Two options were proposed: one was a four-authority option and the other was a five-authority option. Wokingham did not exist in either option. It is worth putting it on record once again that a political fix occurred. The fact that the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) had an influential position in the Government, which he was able to use in alliance with the then Conservative leader of Wokingham council, is a political fact of life, but it led to the creation of that political fix of unitary local authorities created outwith the criteria that the commission set down.

Mr. Hammond: I am sorry to disappoint the hon. Gentleman, but I shall not rise directly to the bait. However, I shall ask him whether he will tell the Chamber his view on the maximum viable size of a unitary authority in an area the size of rural and suburban Berkshire.

Mr. Salter: I was not attempting to bait the hon. Gentleman; I was merely reading a bit of political history into the record. I am a great believer in making statements when I actually know something about the subject. I know a little about local government in Berkshire, having been a Reading borough councillor for 12 years and deputy leader of the council. My hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East was a senior councillor there at the same time.

I must say that one look at the map of Berkshire would suggest that the natural expansion of Reading council's boundaries would take in Greater Reading, which includes areas under Wokingham and West Berkshire councils and a few other places besides. That would give Reading a population base of more than 200,000. It may vary elsewhere. Medway Towns council is considerably larger, and it would be an entirely different question were we to look at the old metropolitan boroughs and districts in the midlands and north-west. There is not a one-size-fits-all solution.

However, as my hon. Friend was saying, there is an issue of economic scale. Is it possible to deliver an efficient tie-up between housing and social services if there is an unnaturally small boundary? Can people be provided with the educational choice that we would like to give them without there being internecine war across the boundary divide?

One of my favourite campaigns was for a unitary Reading in which my hon. Friend and I were heavily involved. I have still got the stickers that say, "One town, one council and a third Thames bridge." It was a very punchy campaign. One of my favourite photos of my hon. Friend, and I have many, is of her holding a huge bag of petition forms outside the civic offices in Reading in support of the campaign. I may have taken the photo.

Sadly, we have not got our third Thames crossing, although we have our one council. We have not got city status, and Reading council remains built on 100-year-old boundaries. We are hemmed in. We cannot deliver park-and-ride services to the west of the town without getting co-operation from Liberal Democrats in West Berkshire. Anybody who has worked with Liberal Democrat councillors knows that it is like herding chickens—it is impossible to get consensus. A former leader of a Liberal Democrat-controlled council gave me that soundbite. He knows how difficult it is to herd chickens so he should be believed.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East said, it is absurd that we have housing stock outside our borough boundaries and conflict over where children should attend school. I must tell my hon. Friend that our well-publicised difference on the Ryeish Green school has now been given another public airing. The fact remains that had Wokingham been able to get away with moving Ryeish Green school from south Reading to Finchampstead, the catchment area would not have included the south Reading area. Many of my constituents—and hers—would not have had the option of choosing schools, which would have been a great shame. That said, the education provision in Reading must be resolved and it is a victim of our absurd 100-year-old boundaries.

How absurd are those boundaries? I have a constituent who pays, I think, 25 per cent. of her council tax to West Berkshire council and 75 per cent. to Reading council because the boundary goes through a corner of her house and across her garden. She pays Reading for a few hundred bricks and West Berkshire for a garage and a shed. It was a moot point, of course, as to whether she was entitled to a bus pass or 75 per cent. of one. As one can imagine, there is tremendous difference between the standard of public services delivered by a Labour-controlled authority in Reading, which has one of most generous bus pass schemes in the country, and the paltry token service that the Liberals in West Berkshire offer. I was able to get common sense to prevail and, despite only paying 75 per cent. of her council tax to the people's republic of Reading, she obtained a full bus pass. That is another triumph that we can tick off.

Mr. Andrew Turner: Will the hon. Member give way?

Mr. Salter: No, I will not; I am just warming to my theme.

My hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East made a pertinent point that the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) failed to grasp: the burden on the council tax payers of the urban centre. This is not just about Reading; I am sure that it applies to Nottingham and to many other towns. Yes, it is great that people come into our town centres to use our pubs and clubs and to shop. Sadly, that revenue does not necessarily flow into the coffers of the local authority. Every piece of litter dropped in Reading by a resident of Wokingham, albeit accidentally, is picked up by a council tax paid employee of Reading borough council. The police funding formula is often based on the residential economy as opposed to money generated by passing trade. A great many issues must be bottomed out on that front. That is not to say that we disagree with or condemn our town centres for being lively and exciting, but we must acknowledge that the funding formulas do not reflect reality. I will give way to the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight and then to the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge if they will be brief.

Mr. Turner: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I am interested to hear that his local authority can distinguish between litter that is dropped by residents of Wokingham and that dropped by residents of Reading—[Interruption.] A different class of litter.

Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is easier, albeit that it has not yet happened in Reading, to define the boundary of an urban area than it is to define boundaries in rural areas? To create a rural unitary authority large enough to be viable often means extending it beyond people's reasonable travelling distance.

Mr. Salter: Yes, I certainly do, and I will come to that point in my conclusion.

Mr. Hammond: The hon. Member for Reading, East also referred to policing costs. I did not intervene then but I wish to now since both Members for Reading mentioned the subject. Perhaps there is something peculiar about police funding in the Thames valley. However, my understanding is that the Thames Valley police were funded by all the council tax payers in the Thames valley, so people living in Wokingham will be contributing to the policing of Reading. Is that not correct?

Mr. Salter: I refer the hon. Gentleman to a speech that I made last year on police grants. I think that it may be coming up again today. It is not just about the funding of the police; it is about the allocation of police resources. We end up in the absurd situation whereby my constituents and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East pay the same as everybody else towards the precepts levied by the police authority on the council tax. In effect, because of the requirements of policing Reading town centre, we end up with one police officer per—and I used this figure purely for example—2,000 head of population; whereas somebody else will be paying precisely the same and get one police officer per 1,000 head of population. As I say, I use those figures purely for illustration, but the point is clear.

We talked about the absurdity of the boundaries of Reading; we talked also about some of the problems in education, transport, joined-up services and economies of scale and about the need for a boundary review and for change. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East, I welcome the creation of business improvement districts. This is an opportunity for a little bit of municipal socialism, if we are still allowed even to conceive of such a thing. Of course, it must be done with the consent of the business community, but how I would love to see an opportunity for Reading and for other lively, vibrant urban centres to be able to levy a modest tax on some of the profits of the breweries, the clubs and the other centres of entertainment to help to fund CCTV, extra police and all the other measures that are needed to keep the population of the town centre, visitors and residents safe and secure. It is far too easy to profit from lively town centres yet not put enough back into the security that we all seek.

As a nation, our record on local government reform is pretty poor. I remember my days as a politics student studying the Redcliffe-Maude report of 1974 on the reorganisation of local government. Sadly, we fudged it last time round. I believe in the unitary format; I believe it needs to be large enough to create economies of scale, and sometimes that means grasping the nettle of a local authority. After all, it did apply to county authorities being beyond the normal scope of people's travelling patterns. I believe in strengthening parish and community councils and I believe in effective regional government with real powers that could bring together the disparate boundaries that affect health, education, the police, the fire service and strategic planning.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East for giving us the opportunity to debate this issue. I hope the Government will accept that what was done by the previous Administration was only half done, and that there is much further to go if we are going to have proper, radical and effective reform of unitary local government.

3 pm

Matthew Green (Ludlow): We have heard a great deal about Reading; it was most interesting, and I congratulate the hon. Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths) on securing the debate. However, wider issues are at stake, and some that are pertinent to Reading are also pertinent to other parts of the country.

We are talking as though the term "unitary authority" appeared on the face of the Bill, but I recently discovered in Committee that the term does not exist. The definition is "districts in areas in which there is no county"—or some such phrase.

Mr. Hammond: I think that the hon. Gentleman is thinking of the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Bill—and he may know that the Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty), has now corrected his assertion that the term did not exist in legislation: it exists in the Dogs (Fouling of Land) Act 1996.

Matthew Green: I thank the hon. Gentleman; I am delighted to hear that.

In principle, unitary authorities are probably the best way of delivering local services. However, local needs and considerations must always be taken into account before unitary authorities are imposed. There should not be a top-down solution. I shall now touch on the reasons why unitary authorities are a good way forward.

In two-tier areas, housing and social services come under different authorities. We need joined-up thinking. In some areas that can be achieved with local authorities working together, but in general it works better in unitary authorities. It has sometimes been linked with health. In Herefordshire, before the strategic health authorities were set up, the unitary council had housing and social services under the same roof, but the chief executive of the Hereford health authority was also the chief executive of the council. It was a tight-knit authority. In Shropshire, the director of social services is the deputy chief executive of the primary care trust, and is currently acting chief executive as well. That close synergy makes a great deal of sense.

On other matters such as environmental health, economies of scale would mean some of the smaller districts disappearing into the unitary authorities, but that makes a great deal of sense. The same applies to waste management, which is currently divided into waste collection and waste disposal. That division has resulted in a number of perverse effects—but again, unitary authorities get round the problem.

We have mentioned the history of Reading and the local government review, but I have a great deal of sympathy with Shropshire, which suffered similar perversities under the last local government review. It has been said before, and it is worth saying again, that the pressure in Berkshire was for four or at most five unitary authorities. The Local Government Commission's recommendation was for five, but political pressure from local Conservatives, including a Berkshire Member of Parliament, resulted in there being six unitary authorities, which was probably too many.

Now that we have those six unitary authorities, the problem is that Reading wants to expand. I understand that it approached the Deputy Prime Minister for a local government review but was turned down. I know exactly why the Deputy Prime Minister did that: he does not want local government reviews, except when regional referendums are due. We have mentioned that in Committee on the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Bill. Another problem is that the neighbouring unitary authorities are not keen on Reading expanding and taking over parts of their areas. That is an ongoing, long-term problem.

Should there be reviews of local authority boundaries outside the scope of the Regional Assemblies (Referendums) Bill? Of course there should. In some areas there is demand for changes to existing unitary or two-tier authorities. In Shropshire, we want a unitary authority to cover the area currently covered by Shropshire county council. There are five district councils and the county council. All three political parties would like to see the abolition of the five districts, and a unitary authority. However, we have been told that there will not be a chance of doing that until there is a referendum in the west Midlands, which could be years away. The mess that the Government have made of their regional policy is causing a problem at a local level.

We now need a unitary authority in Shropshire, because in the last review Telford was taken out, against the recommendation of the Local Government Commission, which recommended the then current two-tier system structure of six districts and one county. Taking Telford out of the equation left the rest of Shropshire without a large chunk of the population of Shropshire, which made less economic sense. We now need a unitary authority in Shropshire, to make the economies of scale work.

The Government have missed out on an opportunity. The Minister needs to address how they will deal with the various demands for reviews of local government outside the regional process. In the south and the midlands, it will be many years before we get to that stage, so it would be useful if the Minister gave us some encouragement that there might be some reviews outside that regional process. With our amendments to the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Bill we gave the Minister in the Standing Committee opportunities to decouple the process of local government review from the regional reviews. It is unfortunate that the Government did not take up that opportunity.

We have heard a fair bit about the appropriate size of unitary authorities. We should be cautious about saying what the appropriate minimum size should be. The Local Government Commission's preferred size was, I think, between 150,000 and 300,000. Herefordshire is below that size, and is a successful, efficient, Liberal Democrat-run unitary authority.

Mr. Salter: I have spent some time in Herefordshire, and I agree that it is well run. I make a public plea for the hon. Gentleman to come to West Berkshire and do a workshop for the Liberals there on how to run a successful council.

Matthew Green: I am not sure that my schedule would permit me to do that—or, even if it is what is needed, that I am the person to do it.

Herefordshire is a successful unitary authority with fewer than 150,000 people. If the Government are too dogmatic about the minimum size, places such as Northumbria, when they are considered in the review of the north-east, will be split up into large unitary authorities—large in terms of area, that is—in order to achieve the minimum population. Those authorities will be so large that people will not naturally feel part of that community, and could be a long way from their nearest centre.

Mr. Andrew Turner: The hon. Gentleman has spoken at some length about reviews. However, did he not say earlier that unitary authorities have to be the best way, and that there should be local consultation before they are imposed? That suggests that under Liberal Democrat policy, they would be imposed.

Matthew Green: That is not quite what I said. I said that the unitary authority was the best way forward, but should not always be the solution, because local considerations needed to be taken into account. That is why we have sought the decoupling of local government reviews from the regional process. If the Government carry out their regional process along those lines, all two-tier authorities will eventually go, for no other reason than the form of local government that has come in.

I have covered most of the points that I wanted to make. I welcome the fact that we have been able to talk about unitary authorities again, and I look forward to hearing from the Minister how we might have reviews without having to wait for the regional reviews.

3.9 pm

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths) on having secured the debate on unitary authorities, although it has occasionally seemed to be a debate on the woes and opportunities of Reading. I thought that I knew the area well, but I have been apprised of the woeful state of my geographical knowledge. I now know about Ryeish Green school, and I shall take the opportunity of mentioning it to my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), in a display that will astound him. While the two hon. Members who represent Reading were intervening on each other, I felt rather like a voyeur at a meeting of the management committee of Reading Labour party—but I am sure that they will sort out their differences.

We have heard about the pros and cons of unitary authorities from the hon. Members for Reading, East and for Reading, West (Mr. Salter). The hon. Member for Reading, East focused on the diversity within counties and suggested that smaller unitary authorities might have a better focus. She also mentioned the "diseconomies" of small scale, and made particular reference to the problems of small education authorities. She made many interesting points, and I shall address the Minister about them shortly.

Both Reading Members mentioned institutional change and institutional structures. Those are important. In this country, we have a bit of a history of thinking that we can solve problems by changing the institutions that deal with them. Experience has shown, however, that changing institutional structures does not necessarily solve the real problems that bother people. The conclusion is clear: there is no "one size fits all" policy, and structure must be locally determined. If it is a widely held view in Shropshire that people want to have a unitary county, then we in Whitehall and Westminster should be cognisant of it.

A unitary structure might be best in urban areas, where distance is not a great issue. I was reminded yesterday that the largest metropolitan authorities have populations well in excess of 1 million, and function very well. However, they have the benefit of high density of population, and thus relatively small geographical areas. When we consider more sparsely populated areas, the minimum size of unitary authority required to deliver effective and efficient services might well, as the hon. Member for Ludlow (Matthew Green) suggested, be too large to allow people that essential sense of relationship with the place from which they are governed that is the advantage of district councils—our lower-tier authorities in the current two-tier areas.

I want to talk to the Minister about two issues. The first is choice. We can conclude that the Government think that unitary authorities are the structure of choice, because they propose to impose them on any region opting for elected regional assemblies. I understand the Government's natural desire not to be lambasted for creating an extra tier of government in existing two-tier authorities, but in some regions—certainly in the north-east, likely to be one of the first regions to have a referendum—some 68 per cent. of the population already live in unitary authority areas. In those areas, an extra tier will be created by the introduction of elected regional assemblies. That is slightly peripheral, however.

It is extraordinary that the Government have introduced a double hurdle for a yes vote in a referendum. I am still quietly puzzled as to their motive for making it more difficult to achieve a yes vote for a principal Government policy project.

Presumably we all agree that change is traumatic and tends to undermine the principal function of local government—good, efficient public service delivery. However beneficial the outcome of the change may be, the process is difficult. One problem that may arise from the Regional Assemblies (Referendums) Bill is constant uncertainty about whether that change will take place.

Worse still, in my view, is the fact that the Government's proposals for a boundary committee review of areas opting for referendums for regional assemblies may produce a sub-optimum pattern of unitary government, because the Government will not allow the current unitary council boundaries to be reopened. In other words, the existing two-tier areas in the north-east, which contain 32 per cent. of the population of that region, must be organised into unitary authorities that fit round the existing ones. That may not in every case be the most logical solution.

My question to the Minister mirrors one put by the hon. Member for Ludlow: do the Government propose an alternative mechanism for achieving unitary status, if that is what a local community wants? It would be bizarre if the Government were to say that a community must have a unitary authority if it is to have an elected regional assembly, but that it cannot have a unitary authority without opting for an elected regional assembly. If they did, it would be inappropriate and lop-sided. The Government may argue, although I would not agree with them, that a unitary structure is necessary to accommodate elected regional authorities, but they cannot argue the other way round, because unitary authorities already operate in areas that do not have elected regional assemblies.

My second question to the Minister is about size. That is an important issue, and I have tried in a couple of interventions to draw out hon. Members' views on the size of unitary authorities. With few exceptions, the creation of unitary authorities of a workable size in the shires will sound the death knell of the counties. It seems to me—we have heard some evidence for it this afternoon—that a minimum size will be required to enable them to work. However, there should also be a maximum size—perhaps not in population terms, because in our metropolitan areas there are large populations in a single authority area, but in geographical terms—so that people are not too distant from the point from which they are governed.

If an authority such as Wokingham, with a population of 150,000, is acceptable at the bottom of the size scale, it is difficult to imagine that an authority such as Essex or Kent, with a population of 1.3 million or 1.4 million, could be a plausible unitary county. That is why I assert that the Government's "unitarisation agenda", as part of its elected regional assemblies programme, necessarily means—in some cases at least—the death of the counties as we know them, because they are too big to be effective unitary authorities.

The Minister for Local Government and the Regions has gone to great pains to muddy the water on that issue, and to suggest that nothing has been ruled out in advance and that counties could be unitary authorities. Perhaps Shropshire could be; I do not know the detailed facts. What work has the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister done on the effective size of unitary authorities at the top and bottom end of the scale? Has it considered the minimum size needed to deliver public services economically, and the maximum size, in terms of population or geographical area, necessary to ensure that local government is still local government and will be delivered close enough to the people to ensure that there is a genuine sense of ownership? I should be grateful to the Minister if he would address head on the position of the counties in an all-unitary structure, and tell the Chamber bluntly whether he is asserting that a county the size of Kent or Essex is a viable and plausible unitary authority area.

3.19 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Christopher Leslie): I am not sure whether, in the time available, it will be possible to address all the wide-ranging issues raised in the debate. I place on record my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths) on securing the opportunity to debate so many issues, especially on the wonderful town, area and district of Reading and the various people living therein.

Common themes among all speakers have been the nature of local authority institutions, and structural and boundary issues. It is important to say at the outset that at the heart of the Government's approach is performance and whether local authorities—regardless of their composition, nature and size—can perform and deliver high quality services for their people. Our aim is systematically to achieve a more uniform and higher level of local government performance throughout the country. That is why we have put in place reforms such as best value and new constitutions and are building on those reforms by embarking on the process known affectionately as comprehensive performance assessments—CPA—and performance management. We are committed to higher performance and determined that local councils should deliver quality public services. People want them, and have a right to expect them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East raised questions about education and the nature of schooling in her council area. I was interested to note, when reading the formula for allocation of education funds, that characteristics of the block for education spend reflect not only population but deprivation and the costs of paying people in high labour cost areas. That has all come together in my hon. Friend's constituency to result in a comparatively good settlement. Reading has had an 8.8 per cent. grant increase and Wokingham an 8.4 per cent. grant increase, which are towards the upper end of the scale for unitary authorities throughout the country.

Mr. Salter: We are extremely grateful for the very good grant settlements in the Thames valley, but my hon. Friend the Minister must bear it in mind that for many local authorities, this year saw the end of other income streams from central government. Reading is actually losing some £3 million as central Government funding for other projects comes to an end. On the face of it, the settlement seems wonderful and one might hope for a council tax increase of 1 or 2 per cent. but, sadly, other factors have been brought to bear.

Mr. Leslie: I assure my hon. Friend that that is still a wonderful settlement. We have moved away from ring-fenced grants, which have, in a sense, tied local authorities' hands, because we want to give more in general grant to those councils so that they can make their own local decisions, as they are best placed to, on how to allocate and spend money. My hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East referred to the PFI bid and the question of capital for education, and I shall certainly draw her comments to the attention of the Department for Education and Skills. She also mentioned population growth statistics, how those feed into the formula and the time lag in feeding the data into the system. The new formula grant arrangements are based on the most up-to-date data and evidence that we could muster. The new census figures are accurate and the Office for National Statistics is proud of them. The per head element of the formula gave her local authorities a relatively good result.

My hon. Friends the Members for Reading, East and for Reading, West (Mr. Salter) mentioned the extra costs for Reading of daytime and, in particular, night-time visitors. We have tried to take that into account in our allocation of resources to local authorities, and I can tell them that the formula allocation for environmental services, highways services and policing reflects the number of daytime visitors. For highways and policing, that also applies to night-time visitors. We have not been blind to that point and have taken the issue into account.

Performance cannot be improved simply by considering issues such as local government structure, boundaries or the size of local authorities. Structure and boundary reviews can, in some circumstances, distract local government from the real work at hand, which is the delivery of quality local services and the provision of leadership to communities. Of course, there may be some evidence to suggest that some functions can be more easily delivered by larger authorities. We recognised that in the draft guidance that we gave to the boundary committee about the local government reviews that might take place before any referendum on an elected regional assembly.

The guidance states that many of the most significant factors that determine the ability of authorities to deliver quality services have little direct relation to the geography, structure or size of the authority. However, there is some evidence to suggest that the quality of political management, a willingness to innovate and a sound corporate structure and capacity are the most significant determinants of high-performing councils. None of that means that quality services are beyond smaller authorities, albeit that they might sometimes work in partnership with others.

Indeed, the recent CPA results on the quality of performance of local authorities show that there are smaller authorities—Reading is one—that are judged as being of good quality. Hartlepool is nearly the smallest unitary council in England, yet it is in the excellent category. The same is true of Blackburn with Darwen, which is similar to Reading in size. Some large authorities are classified as weak or poor. Conversely, there are small authorities that are not performing and larger authorities that are performing well or better. To coin a phrase used by my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East, size does not always matter in that respect.

Mr. Hammond: The Minister is concentrating on the economies of scale and service delivery. Will he address the issue of potentially large unitary counties, such as Northumbria, in terms of geography, and Essex and Kent, in terms of population? If they were to become unitary authorities on a county-wide basis, there might be a problem of remoteness from the people and communities that they are supposed to serve as local government.

Mr. Leslie: I am not quite sure what point the hon. Gentleman is making. Does he think that unitary authorities need to be large in order to preserve the county characteristic? Or does he think that they should be small? I shall come on to the fact that we have not been as prescriptive as he might like when giving guidance to the boundary committee about structural reviews that might take place in relation to elected regional assembly referendums.

Partnership between authorities is important and can take place. My hon. Friends have touched on some of those issues. Regardless of size and boundaries, joint working is always welcome. There will always be an element of local discretion. Local authorities are independently elected, autonomous bodies; each local authority has its own priorities. However, they need to work together on more strategic issues.

My hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East raised the question of transport. I understand that there is some feeling that the size of Berkshire authorities might be hampering their ability to co-ordinate transport provision across authority boundaries. However, each of the six authorities produces its own local transport plan and I note that, although Department for Transport guidance urges neighbouring authorities to consider having joint plans, the Berkshire authorities have not done so. I would encourage Berkshire authorities to carry out more joint work in that area, which could lead to more joint local transport plans.

Structure and boundaries are not central to the delivery of quality local services. However, we recognise the importance of getting boundaries right. Although other factors, such as leadership and corporate capacity, are critical to the creation of high-performing local authorities, we accept that the ability of authorities to develop or sustain those attributes may be affected by their geography, structure and size. Nevertheless, before we could alter structures or boundaries of local authorities, including the boundaries of existing authorities, we would have to invite the Electoral Commission to carry out a review. Only if and when it recommended change would the Government act. At present, we do not believe that such reviews should be a priority for the Electoral Commission. There are other issues to be addressed such as periodic electoral reviews, which are a priority. In considering that question, structural reviews are not on the agenda, but we have not closed the door for ever on boundary matters. We have a strong agenda of reform and improvement in local government that will benefit all our constituents. I urge all hon. Members to focus on that agenda.

Sugar Industry

3.30 pm

Mr. Doug Henderson (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): May I start by saying what a privilege it is to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Deputy Speaker? It is also a privilege to raise such an important issue on behalf of my constituents. It is some time since I secured an Adjournment debate, although I have responded to some over the years.

The issue is about sugar production in the United Kingdom and competition in the sugar industry. It is crucial in my constituency, where more than 600 people are employed at the Nestlé confectionary plant in Fawdon, Newcastle, making such well-known products as pastilles, Fruit Gums, Jellytots, Tooty Frooties, Rolo, Blue Riband, Breakaway, Yorkie biscuit and Caramac, which are covered by the sugar regime.

The sugar regime has many consequences, the first of which is that British consumers pay a high price for their sugar. That is also true throughout the European Union, but the price in Britain is higher than that in other European Union states. According to the UK Industrial Sugar Users Group, in our country prices are consistently 20 to 30 per cent. higher than the intervention price. On 27 January, sugar cost £677 per tonne compared with an intervention price of about £400 per tonne. The price of sugar in other European Union states is only between 8 and 22 per cent. higher than the intervention price. Anyone who depends on sugar to manufacture a product in the UK is not only at a relative disadvantage to other parts of the world, but at a relative disadvantage to other European Union states.

A second consequence is that the British taxpayer must pay a significant share of the €800 million in annual subsidies. British confectionary producers must pay an excessive price for an important ingredient. If there is a movement, or an incentive to move, by international manufacturers away from the United Kingdom, there is a risk that British jobs such as those at Fawdon, Newcastle will be lost to other parts of the world.

What has created the inflated profitability in the sugar industry, which I consider to be economically inefficient? The profits of the two major British sugar companies—I shall come to them—are significantly higher than those of any other manufacturer in the food processing industry. I would argue that that is because of the monopoly—more accurately, duopoly—situation in the industry. The root of the problem is the rules in the common agricultural policy. Those, including myself, who have had some contact with the CAP have tried to drive through reform.

The duopoly of the two manufacturers in the United Kingdom is equally important. British Sugar, which is part of Associated British Foods, processes sugar beet and Tate and Lyle processes sugar cane. The situation in the United Kingdom has grown up over many years under successive Governments. The duopoly exists because Governments have been unable to refer the companies to the competition authorities, which has resulted in a change in the market situation within the industry. It is worth noting that the producers have been fined by the European Union on a number of occasions for anti-competitive price-fixing policies. Even when they have had an opportunity to reduce prices because of fluctuations in exchange rates, they have failed to respond. During the period between May 1996 and April 2000 there was a significant movement in favour of sterling away from the euro currencies. The price of sugar fell during that period by 33 or 34 per cent., but the processed sugar price in this country fell by only 14 per cent., which demonstrates that there has not been the response that might have been expected if the market had been competitive.

The industry is not small. Its size is considerable in this country. The sugar processors employ about 2,000 people; the farmers who grow the beet that is linked to quotas employ about 7,000 people; and the food processing industry employs about 90,000 people. About 100,000 people in the industry are directly affected by whatever regime governs the price of sugar in this country. The companies involved are widespread and include Nestlé in my constituency, Cadbury Schweppes, Mars and United Biscuits. It may not always be recognised but sugar is a substantial ingredient in the soft drinks industry and companies such as Britvic, Coca-Cola and dear old Barrs in north-east England and Scotland are also affected.

How does the anti-competitive duopoly work? First, sugar is regulated with an intervention price and quotas are linked to it. Theoretically, that is to prevent overproduction, but it actually creates an anti-competitive situation resulting in a certain amount of production above the intervention price, but the subsidies go with it and that is very much in the interests of the two main sugar processors.

Consumers who buy sugar also suffer, but the food manufacturers provide the main market for sugar. Those companies historically pay two to three times the world price for their sugar, although currently they pay more than three times the world price. I recognise that there are fluctuations around the two to three times level. Taxpayers foot the bill for export subsidies and tariffs keep out competition. That not only causes excessively high prices in this country and an anti-competitive position, but damages the ability of most developing countries—some are allowed to export to the European Union—to sell an amount of sugar that would make a major contribution to the demands of people in the European Union and beyond.

Mr. Bill Wiggin (Leominster): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the sugar regime costs British consumers £750 million a year? There is a Cadbury's factory in my constituency, as well as ones belonging to Brooks Soft Drinks and Malvern Water. I have witnessed the way in which sugar is brought into such factories. I hope that the hon. Gentleman would agree that the way that it is delivered is incredibly efficient. Those delivering it seem to have a way of knowing when to turn up to keep the amount of sugar in the factory at the right levels. That monitoring process is carried out remotely. The sugar companies are doing a good job, but anything that would make ingredients cheaper for the soft drink and chocolate industry would benefit all our constituents considerably.

Mr. Henderson: I take the hon. Gentleman's point. It is true that consumers in this country suffer because of the increased prices that they pay, and the taxes that they pay towards the sugar regime. I am not sure that I would ascribe efficiency to the sugar producers. If they could not produce sugar at a profit under their rules, they would have to be very poor at it. I am sure that they do try to be as efficient as they can. Given that there are profits at stake, they would be silly to do otherwise.

Oxfam has played an important part in explaining the damage that can be done to developing countries. I would like to cite some of the Oxfam submissions on the subject. It says:

> "European consumers and taxpayers are paying to destroy livelihoods in some of the world's poorest countries. Through the sugar regime of the Common Agricultural Policy (CAP), they are paying for a system that rewards a handful of sugar producers in Europe"—

so it is not only in the UK—

> "while undermining markets and opportunities for farmers and agricultural labourers in the developing world. No agricultural sector is in more urgent need of radical reform. Yet sugar is not even included in the European Commission's latest reform proposals."

That is one of the most iniquitous aspects of the regime. Once the British demands have been met, the excess sugar produced by the two duopolists with subsidy is then dumped on the world market, often to third-world countries. Nigeria was cited as one such country recently. The regime is directly subsidised by the British taxpayer, and it keeps the production of developing countries out of those other markets.

In this country, the regime adds between 2p to 3p to the price of a typical product such as a packet of pastilles or a packet of Rolos, compared with the price that would apply if the confectioners in this country were able to buy sugar at the world price. I recognise that the world price would rise a little if there were more of an open market. That would have to be taken into account. However, it would still leave people who buy sugar in this country at a great advantage, compared with the current situation.

I raise the issue now because the current regime is wrong. There has been debate about it in the past. We are at a crossroads concerning agricultural policy in the European Union. Some say that what has served us well in the past should be reinforced in future. Others say that there must be change if the European Union is to progress in its development. Protectionism in the United States leads to the same impact as does the regime in Europe.

The next major reform of EU agricultural policy is in 2006, which is when the big arguments must take place. A mid-term review will take place this year. The Commission will be taking on board ideas and suggestions from March until the early summer, and it is expected to make some sort of recommendation in midsummer or early autumn. If I am wrong about the dates, I am sure that the Minister will put me right. It is appropriate that there is a debate in this country and in the European Union about the sugar regime.

The Commission's study covers virtually everything, but its terms of reference require it to consider the impact of European Union enlargement. One of the big questions is whether, if the sugar price in such countries as the Czech Republic is much lower than the price in the UK, producers have an incentive to move to the Czech Republic. Clearly after enlargement the relationship will be different, although the argument about moving to a lower-cost sugar-supply nation would still apply, but outside the European Union. There will probably be a rise in prices in the countries that accede to the European Union, but it will probably—this is guesswork—be over a period of time. A great deal of negotiation must take place on the phasing in, and that will be an ideal opportunity to raise the question of the sugar regime.

[Mr. Henderson]

The Commission is also considering the relationship of products to developing countries. The agreement has the name "everything but arms", a typical piece of Eurospeak and the lowest common denominator that everyone could agree to. It deals with the relationship between products produced in the European Union and those that can also be produced in developing countries. To what extent should there be free trade? To what extent should there be restrictions? At present sugar is excluded from the considerations, even for the poorest countries, some of which are sugar producers. It would be very progressive if the Government tried to get that definition changed in the Commission and succeeded in bringing sugar structures into the discussion. Even if no progress is made, let us at least have the discussion.

I know that the Minister will want some time to reply on those issues. I do not wish to hog the floor much longer, but I want to ask him some specific questions, which I ask him to deal with today or, if not today, perhaps later.

First, do the Government recognise that there is a problem and are they prepared to take any of the actions suggested by me today and by other pressure groups in the industry?

Secondly, even if it is difficult to achieve change in the European Union—I do not claim that it is easy—can action be taken in the United Kingdom at least to bring the sugar price here in line with that in other European Union countries? Can something be done in this duopolistic situation to free things up and allow more competition? We are not suggesting that sugar producers should be denied their profits, but can those using the product have a better deal in this country?

Thirdly, are the Government committed to removing the sugar exclusion clause from the everything but arms agreement and will they take action in the Commission to achieve that?

Fourthly, will the Government insist on a phased reduction of export subsidies, which would be part of the proposals for the mid-term review of the agricultural policy?

Finally, are the Government prepared to commit themselves to a major restructuring in 2006 and to say that the main objectives are to bring competition into the sugar industry, reduce prices to bring them nearer to world prices and allow more competition from developing countries—in other words, bring prices down and give sugar consumers in this country a better deal? That would be good, because it would not only follow the general drift of the Government's policy and their desire for a more competitive economy but help to guarantee jobs in such companies as Nestlé in my constituency.

3.49 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Elliot Morley): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) on securing the debate and on the thorough and knowledgeable way in which he set out the complex issue of the effect of sugar prices on manufacturing and processing.

Sugar beet is a very important crop in this country and region. It is an important crop in my constituency in north Lincolnshire. I sometimes wish that the people who defend the status quo would listen to the other side of the argument and consider the impact on processors and on the many jobs in this country, including those in my hon. Friend's constituency. He made his case clearly and strongly. I shall try to deal with the points that he raised.

I can deal straight away with the everything but arms agreement. Sugar is not excluded from the EBA, but provisions relating to it are phased in, as is the case with rice and bananas. The Agriculture Council agreement allows for an increasing quota of duty-free sugar imports from least developed countries until 2009. This year, 85,000 tonnes of sugar will enter the European Union under the arrangement.

Between 2006 and 2009, there will also be stage reductions in import duty for unlimited quantities of sugar, with a view to full liberalisation by 2009. To many manufacturers, that is not exactly a speedy agenda. I sympathise with them, because the Government's general approach towards sugar and other products is to encourage vigorous competition. The framework of competition law in the United Kingdom has been thoroughly revised since 1997 by the Competition Act 1998 and the Enterprise Act 2002. My hon. Friend mentioned the duopoly. Measures have been put in place to ensure that it is not abused.

The real problem is prices, which my hon. Friend rightly stated are affected by the CAP. We believe that strong competition is the best way to ensure that consumers get a good deal from lower prices, increased choice and higher quality. Vigorous competition puts pressure on firms to find ways of reducing costs by increasing innovation and organising their production efficiently. It is a key driver of productivity. Changes are inevitable for the sugar beet sector as well and are being phased in to give people time to adjust.

We recognise that the present situation leads to considerably higher prices. My hon. Friend was right in saying that the price of sugar in the EU is three times the world price—that is significant. One can understand why drinks and chocolate manufacturers, who are big sugar users, are concerned. As I said, the price is high because sugar is part of the subsidised and quota-controlled sector of the CAP.

I assure my hon. Friend that the Government recognise the problem. That is why we are committed to CAP reform. The policy has been largely unchanged for nearly 30 years, and it does not deliver what farmers, the rural economy, consumers and the environment need. The distortion of world prices has not helped farmers. The policy has caused all sorts of problems in this and other countries, it is hugely expensive for EU consumers and it does not meet the challenges posed by the World Trade Organisation negotiations or, as my hon. Friend said, enlargement of the EU.

We are committed to reducing the overall burden of the CAP. The mid-term review of the CAP is a good start in the right direction. We have some concerns about the detail, because we want to move away from price and production support and provide more money for the so-called second pillar—rural development and agri-environment scheme support—which benefits agriculture and the rural economy generally.

As things stand, sugar is not yet part of the mid-term review discussions, as my hon. Friend said, and I can understand his frustration about that. The reason why it does not form part of those discussions is that, when the existing sugar regime was renewed in 2001, it was decided that the new arrangements should run until 2006. Following pressure from the UK, we succeeded in getting a formal commitment to a further review this year, which the Commission has now openly linked to the MTR process by promising a report and proposals by June. As my hon. Friend rightly said, if one is going through the MTR process and looking at decoupling, it is difficult to ignore the sugar regime. The report will have to take account of what is now being proposed in the MTR for other sectors. The Commission has said openly that that is its intention, and we welcome that.

We do not believe that there is a case for the sugar regime remaining outside any such changes. The UK will argue vigorously that any MTR decisions will have to apply to sugar at the earliest opportunity. I agree with my hon. Friend that the sooner we tackle those issues, the better for all concerned. We are committed to taking action on price. We also want to see a reduction in subsidies as part of the MTR process, because they are not helpful to European consumers or to world prices, or consequently to developing countries and poorer countries, which want market access.

I understand my hon. Friend's point about the Oxfam report entitled "The Great EU Sugar Scam", and we have a great deal of sympathy with what Oxfam said about the impact of heavily subsidised and protectionist regimes on developing countries.

Mr. Henderson: As my hon. Friend will recognise, these are complicated issues. Would he be prepared to meet a delegation from the industry before the end of March to discuss the British submissions to the European Commission?

Mr. Morley: I certainly have no objection to that in principle. I should point out, however, that my colleague, Lord Whitty, is responsible for food and farming at the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, and it is all too easy to make commitments on behalf of people who are not here. I deal with debates in this Chamber as part of my multi-functional role in the Department, and because my colleague is a Member of the House of Lords. I know that he shares the Government's views on the matter, however, and has been a strong campaigner for the changes that I have described, so I will put my hon. Friend's proposition to him. I am sure that he will be happy to talk to him about the progress that is being made and about the details of the MTR, which are complex.

It will be no surprise that there are differences of opinion between member states, but the UK has consistently taken the lead in pressing for the urgent adaptation of the internal market to the circumstances that full market access for developing countries will bring. We believe that that is in the best interests not only of our processing sector, for which my hon. Friend made a good case today, but of agriculture, in terms of adapting to the changes and considering the opportunities that a more liberalised market may present.

My hon. Friend did not raise the subject, but I know that sugar growers are interested in industrial crops and the use of sugar for ethanol production. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has introduced changes in duty to encourage biodiesel and bioethanol production, which offers some potential in the long term.

I congratulate my hon. Friend on the way in which he made his case. I will take up his request with my colleague, Lord Whitty. I hope that I have reassured him that we sympathise with the points that he made and are committed to advocating these changes in the European Union, which are long overdue.

Beechwood Lodge, Basingstoke

4 pm

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): I welcome the opportunity to raise in this short debate an issue that is of grave concern to me and to a significant number of people in the constituency of Basingstoke and in the wider borough of Basingstoke and Deane. My right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) is with us in spirit, but business elsewhere demands his attention. I know that he identifies himself with the broad thrust of the comments that I propose to make.

Almost a year ago—on 4 February, to be precise—I wrote a letter to the Secretary of State for Health in which I expressed my profound concern about the deaths in the community in Basingstoke of five former residents of Beechwood lodge. I should explain that Beechwood lodge is a Stonham housing association hostel for single men. Four of the deaths happened within a few weeks of one another around Christmas 2001, and the body of one man lay undiscovered for three weeks or so. They followed the death in the community early in the year of another former resident.

In my letter, I asked the Secretary of State to set up an official inquiry into the five deaths and the way in which Hampshire social services, Stonham housing association and the borough council had acted. I also tabled parliamentary questions. The Secretary of State replied that he was not planning to hold an inquiry, but he did not totally rule out the possibility that one might be held. He implied, or so I understood, that he hoped that the inquiry instigated by the borough council would serve the same purpose. I regret to report that it has not. Concerns about what happened to former residents of Beechwood lodge have not remotely subsided during the past 12 months, perhaps because of the efforts of some to remove the issue from our local agenda. I return to the issue without apology and repeat my request for an official inquiry.

The five men died after being moved into the community following Stonham housing association's controversial decision to close the hostel. Their deaths gave rise to a storm of local protest over the lack of care and support that they had received after being moved out of the hostel. While the residents of Beechwood lodge were being moved into the community, Hampshire social services and Stonham housing association gave solemn assurances that residents' needs were being assessed and that appropriate care packages would be put in place. It later transpired that many of the residents were given no support in the community, but were left to fend for themselves.

On 7 February—three days after I wrote to the Secretary of State for Health—Basingstoke and Deane borough council announced that it had commissioned a review, not an inquiry, in partnership with Stonham housing association and the other relevant authorities and agencies. The review, which was labelled "independent", examined the procedures that had been followed in implementing the closure of Beechwood lodge. The independent review was also to make recommendations as to further action that might be taken to assist former residents and to advise how such processes should be carried out.

There was immediate concern locally. First, there was to be a review, not an inquiry. There is a fundamental difference between the two: by definition, an inquiry is inquisitive, whereas a review is an overview. The terms of reference focused too much on what had happened rather than on the whys and wherefores and where responsibility lay. There were also well-founded concerns about how genuinely independent a review could be if it were set up by the involved parties. It was also realised that the reviewer would have no statutory powers to summon witnesses or to demand papers, and it was uncertain what resources would be at his disposal and whether evidence would be heard in public or in private, and over what period of time. Not only were there many misgivings concerning the conditions surrounding the independent review, but the reviewer had no powers to compel the various agencies and authorities to implement any recommendations.

The task of conducting the review was given to Mr. Frank Rust, the chairman of the community health council and a past member of an area health authority and much else. I wish to state unambiguously that Mr. Rust's personal integrity and commitment to the task are not in dispute. He is rightly respected for his contribution to public life in many fields. The quarrel is not with the reviewer, Mr. Rust, but with the terms of reference that were imposed on him and the consequential limitations of his report. Furthermore, the borough council has subsequently handled the report. I emphasise that the review was the initiative of the borough council.

There was an early manifestation of concern. Mr. Rust was tasked with providing the council with an interim report prior to presenting his final report. He did so in April last year. We now know that the interim report was the only one that he provided. It was, in the words of a leading councillor,

"polished and padded a bit".

Some members of the council felt that it was lacking in substance and detail, but it became the actual report. Moreover, copies of the interim report were sent to the various agencies and authorities involved, but not to individuals whom Mr. Rust had interviewed in the course of preparing it, such as Mrs. Anne Ritchie, who has played such a dedicated role in representing the interests of the residents of Beechwood lodge. The comments of those agencies were taken into account. It is truly alarming that the polishing and padding was provided by the council, an act that brings into serious question the ostensible and declared independence of the report.

A fortnight or so ago, Lord Laming made public the findings of his inquiry into the horrific suffering and death of Victoria Climbié. That tragic case has a number of points of contact with the Beechwood lodge saga, the most striking being the proliferation of responsible bodies. With the advantage of hindsight, one can see that each body tended to minimise its own responsibility and to maximise that of the others. Where there should have been multi-agency co-operation, there was multi-agency failure. At the time, I described the Rust report as "an anaesthetised analysis of a human tragedy which should never have happened."

The report inadequately stated that the tragedy was wholly avoidable. Some of the most vulnerable people in our community were grievously let down. Mr. Rust's report appears to imply that prime responsibility lay with Stonham housing association. The report is essentially non-censorious. Stonham's appalling shortcomings are listed as a matter more for regret than for blame. Social services emerge in a poor light. At times they are more concerned about the resource implications of their involvement than the needs of residents. Mr. Rust recently reminded me that letters survive from social services and Stonham asking one another for extra resources. Not least, social services failed to complete assessments within the promised time.

The report acknowledges the pivotal role of the borough council in providing accommodation for Beechwood lodge residents in the community, including sheltered housing schemes. The council could have influenced events far more than it did. It almost wholly ignored warnings—the correspondence survives. The report also finds that the Housing Corporation "could have taken a more proactive, even a strategic/leadership role".

It does not make it clear when that could or should have happened. Mr. Rust recently wrote to me, saying that the crux of the problem was the decision by the Housing Corporation to reduce the revenue grant for Beechwood lodge and its failure to fund the closure programme. As in the case of Victoria Climbié, each lapse may not of itself have been fatal, but taken together they were lethal. The catalogue of failure is chilling. One of the glaring weaknesses of the report is the absence of any testimony from former residents. The inquiry's terms of reference did not demand its inclusion, nor did they require the reviewer even to speak to former residents. The absence of such testimony detracts greatly from the completeness of the report.

In fact, the report tells us nothing that we did not already know. The closure of Beechwood lodge and the ensuing tragedy was a ghastly saga of multi-agency failure for which no one has been held responsible. It is a classic instance of the no-blame culture that bedevils modern society, but individuals formulated those strategies, and individuals took the decisions. They should have been held to account, but they were not. They could still be held to account.

Although every agency and authority involved bears some responsibility, there is particular concern about the borough council's attitude. It is summed up in the repeated assertions heard so often in public and in private: "We must not blame anyone; we must put this behind us and move on." The impression is given that some wish to sweep the whole horrific and tragic affair under the carpet.

It is piously hoped that the new "supporting people" strategy will prevent a repetition, and I share that hope. However, "supporting people" only formalises what should have happened in the past; it is no guarantee of delivery. Moreover, in Basingstoke, the "supporting people" strategy will be implemented by precisely the same agencies, and in some cases by the same people, that failed the residents of Beechwood lodge so badly.

A sizeable body of informed local opinion believes that, despite Mr. Rust's good intentions, his report inadequately analysed the complexity and the full horror of what happened in Basingstoke after Beechwood lodge residents were rehoused in the community. There is much unease that the agencies and authorities responsible may have escaped too lightly. There is genuine concern about the council's perceived attitude. For these reasons, it is hoped that, even now, the Government will instigate a fuller inquiry to find out what went wrong and why, so that from the mistakes of the past we may learn lessons for the future.

I do not ask the Minister to pronounce judgment immediately; this is a matter for thought and reflection. I ask her to give serious consideration to setting up such an inquiry, and I hope that in due course the Government will agree. The tragedy that followed the decision to close Beechwood lodge was both predictable and predicted. I have made the point that it happened because every involved authority and agency failed. Consequently, some of the most vulnerable people in our local community were grievously let down. The seriousness of what happened and the imperative of ensuring that lessons are learned demand an official inquiry.

4.14 pm

The Minister for Social Exclusion and Deputy Minister for Women (Mrs. Barbara Roche): I start by saying to the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) that I understand his great anxiety about the issue and the individual cases. I know that his concerns are deeply held and have been for some time. I thank him for giving me prior notice of some of the issues that he wanted to raise today. I also understand that when the hon. Gentleman speaks about the matters, he is representing the views of ex-residents and the members of Basingstoke Action for Single Homelessness. As he said, there is real local concern.

I want to describe the circumstances that I understand to have been in place and the reasons for the closure of Beechwood lodge. A regular three-year review of Beechwood lodge by the Housing Corporation found that many residents had alcohol issues that did not require the intensive support that would justify payment of the supported housing management grant. Beechwood lodge also had a void rate of about 30 per cent., which was below funding guidelines set by the corporation. The decision to close Beechwood lodge was taken by Stonham housing association, with the support of the Housing Corporation, Hampshire social services and Basingstoke and Deane borough council following consultation with stakeholders, including the local health authority.

A structural survey also showed problems with design to the extent that the cost of routine maintenance for the building was no longer sustainable. Basingstoke and Deane borough council had already provided £148,000 of housing association grant in 1995 to repair a building that was not even 10 years old.

My information is that residents were consulted about the decision to close the hostel, with more than 70 per cent. responding that they would prefer to move. I also understand that the closure was planned over a four-year period to July 2001 to ensure that appropriate placements were found for all residents. However, despite joint working, the information given to my officials was that some people did not accept the care packages that were offered to all residents by the agencies as part of the re-provision arrangements and preferred to move into independent accommodation, which was perfectly within their rights.

[Mrs. Barbara Roche]

Consultation with the residents highlighted the fact that 74 per cent. would prefer to live in flats, bedsits or shared accommodation. As half of the bed spaces were permanent and the home was running at 80 per cent. capacity, there were only 40 bed spaces for which vacancies could occur. The borough council and Stonham planned re-provision around finding alternative accommodation for the long-term residents and providing an equivalent number of other bed spaces in the first instance, followed by a programme of expansion based on the needs of the individual in line with the "supporting people" requirements, to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

In 1998, Stonham assessed 77 residents and found that 32 needed further health and care assessments. The council's health and housing committee subsequently put in place an initial re-provision plan to increase the number of move-on nominations to 13 each year, in order to assist residents with little or no support needs—needs that could be met through floating support in alternative accommodation.

I understand that by June 2000, the borough council had submitted a multi-agency strategic plan to the health and housing committee; four months later, it was approved by a panel of elected members. The result was that multi-agency assessments with social services could ideally match the remaining residents with appropriate accommodation. In the months leading up to the closure, joint assessments took place for about 20 residents with high support needs. The residents were accompanied to viewings of alternative accommodation by Stonhan or council housing officers, who worked to find housing options that met the needs of and were acceptable to residents.

Our information is that all residents were rehoused in other schemes more appropriate to their level of need. Since the announcement of the closure of Beechwood lodge, the 40 lost bed spaces have been replaced with the equivalent of more than 140 new bed spaces, including Mary Rose court. I have not had the advantage of visiting Mary Rose court, but I understand that the hon. Gentleman has been there and I believe that he was impressed by what he saw.

Additional bed spaces have been provided through a number of initiatives, including local authority social housing grant, and floating support. By that I mean workers who provide support to help people to live independently and to support tenancies for those with low support needs. That should either prevent vulnerable people from becoming homeless or enable them to sustain a more independent tenancy.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about the review commissioned by the council. It was run by Mr. Frank Rust, the ex-chairman of the community health council. The report made a number of recommendations. It recommended, first, that all vulnerable ex-residents should be contacted to assess the level of support that they receive; secondly, that Basingstoke Action Against Single Homelessness and other supporting agencies should be included in developing the borough council's homelessness strategy; and thirdly, that the agency should lead on commissioning services for those vulnerable to homelessness. My information is that the council has implemented all those recommendations.

I understand that health and social services both advise that it is no longer appropriate to provide one large-scale institution in the area, where residents may become deskilled. That was confirmed by a recent survey into the housing needs of single people, in which the hostel residents were well represented.

The hon. Gentleman, as he has said, asked the Department of Health to investigate the circumstances leading to the deaths of former residents of the hostel, and to assess the performance of agencies providing care and support at Beechwood lodge. The Department declined to undertake an inquiry into the circumstances of the deaths of four men following the closure of Beechwood lodge because it was judged that such an inquiry would not add value to the inquiry already commissioned, and that a separate inquiry might have impeded the progress of the internal inquiry. The social services inspectorate has maintained contact with Hampshire social services on the progress of the inquiry and received a copy of the report in July 2002. I understand that the local agencies have continued to discuss the outcome of the report, and that the local council discussed the matter in its overview and scrutiny committee in January.

At that community overview and scrutiny committee, the council agreed that it was content that the housing strategy addressed the issues of vulnerable residents within the borough. However, the social services inspectorate is continuing to liase with Hampshire social services department to ensure that appropriate actions are taken to implement lessons learned from the inquiry and its outcome.

Improved joint working between agencies coupled with new provision across the borough for men and women has resulted in housing support being more tailored to the needs of individuals. The introduction of the supported housing panel also ensures more appropriate housing together with appropriate support in future. It is supported by the borough council, the Housing Corporation and the "safer communities" programme in investing more than £4.4 million in accommodation for vulnerable people.

Funding has also increased to develop floating support services. The borough council has invested £1.5 million to purchase 31 houses for statutory homeless households and provided other funds for a 14-bed hostel, which is due to open in July, which can accommodate single homeless people or homeless households. The borough council is also undertaking a feasibility study on the provision of a day centre as part of its review of homelessness provision in the borough. I know from my experience what valuable work day centres do.

Tackling homelessness is about considering individual circumstances. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that it is not just about seeing whether people have a roof over their head but about considering their special needs and supporting them. The homlessness directorate within the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has provided more than £100,000 to help

Basingstoke and Deane to put in place some homeless prevention projects such as a rent deposit scheme for intentionally homeless people, a mediation service and a supported lodgings scheme for 16 and 17-year-olds. Funding is also being used to employ a specialist housing advice officer and a new homelessness and resettlement officer.

Today the Government announced their proposals in "Sustainable Communities: building for the future" to provide a major programme of affordable homes for key public sector workers and those in priority housing need. In that document there is a commitment to continue with the work on homelessness outlined in "More than a Roof", which goes into detail about how people's individual needs are to be considered when dealing with homelessness.

Our objectives are to develop more strategic approaches to preventing homelessness and to consider how to deal with the subject; to encourage new responses to tackling homelessness such as mediation schemes; and to strengthen the help available to people who are homeless or at risk of becoming homeless.

We have passed legislation to strengthen the help available for people who need it and from April the "supporting people" programme will provide support services to vulnerable people and help them to stay in their homes. I hope that the hon. Member for Basingstoke will be reassured when the programme is implemented and developed.

I thank the hon. Gentleman for raising some interesting and important points, which the Government will consider. It is important that we improve our services, especially when they are provided to vulnerable people. There is a greater range of provision for homeless people in Basingstoke and Deane, which is supported by the Homelessness Act 2002 and from April by the "supporting people" programme.

I assure the hon. Gentleman that the borough council is one of the district councils working in partnership with others as part of its "supporting people" strategy; although it does not come in until April, a great deal of preparation is going on to ensure that it is implemented properly. Hampshire has always worked well with its district councils and with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and continues to do so.

I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on raising the issue and I hope that I have been able to reassure him.

Question put and agreed to.

Southern Africa Food Crisis

[Relevant documents: Minutes of Evidence taken before the International Development Committee on 29th October 2002, HC 1271-i, 25th November 2002, HC 116-i, 3rd December 2002, HC 116-ii, 14th January 2003, HC 116-iii, 23rd January 2003, HC 116-iv, together with memoranda received by the Committee.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Derek Twigg.]

2.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Ms Sally Keeble): I welcome a debate on the southern Africa humanitarian crisis, which has gripped public consciousness, combining as it does some of the worst natural disasters with some of the most chronic human disasters. I want to set out some of the latest developments and explain how Britain's assistance has helped those most in need. The world is of course very concerned about the immediate humanitarian disaster, but underlying it is a long-term problem of food security in southern Africa, which we need to address urgently.

I shall set out some of the history of the crisis, which has been the subject of considerable debate in the House and among the wider public. Seven countries in southern Africa—Angola, Lesotho, Malawi, Mozambique, Swaziland, Zambia and Zimbabwe—are facing food shortages. The crisis began with poor rains throughout the region in the 2001–02 growing season. Reporting from non-governmental organisations that started in August 2001 stated that many families in Malawi and Zimbabwe would face major food insecurity during the following year. In Zimbabwe, that view was corroborated by evidence of disruption to agriculture and of late planting. However, the Government of Zimbabwe continued until early 2002 to predict high levels of maize production. In Malawi, the Government and donors agreed in August 2001 that action needed to be taken, but the Government decided not to ask for outside help. An emergency was finally declared in February 2002.

The World Food Programme launched an appeal in July 2002 for $507 million to cover nearly 1 million tonnes of food for six of the seven countries of southern Africa. Angola was handled separately because of its particular requirements linked to the end of the civil war. WFP planning assumed that additional food aid imports of 200,000 tonnes would flow through channels other than the World Food Programme, and that Governments and commercial suppliers would import further supplies. In many cases, it was assumed that governmental and commercial supplies would be much greater than the level of food aid.

When the WFP appeal was launched, it was widely recognised that the crisis was not only about food supplies. Health and other issues were affected too, including disease, water and sanitation services and, perhaps more significantly, HIV/AIDS. The appeal for food aid was part of a wider United Nations appeal to cover those other needs as well.

There has been considerable debate about the scale of the crisis. By any standards, it is large. Assessments made by international teams in September 2002 show that more than 10 million people throughout six countries were in immediate need of food aid. They also agreed that that number would rise to more than 14 million by March 2003. Subsequent assessments have found an even higher number in need when taking into account some urban populations, particularly in Zimbabwe. In addition to the sheer number of people involved, the complexity of the crisis is unique.

The countries involved face different problems. Malawi has chronic food security problems, but, traditionally, Zimbabwe has food surpluses. Mozambique has had both chronic food shortages in the south of the country and surpluses in the north. On the whole, the region was less used to and prepared for a major crisis than other regions, such as the horn of Africa. I am referring to some of the least developed countries in the world as well as to one of Africa's few middle-income countries. The crisis has covered countries in which there have been significant problems of poor governance. In terms of the range of problems that the international community has had to deal with, the number of countries involved and the relative lack of preparedness, the crisis was, by any measure, severe.

The causes of the crisis were also complex. Poor rainfall was a central factor, but that alone should not have caused the scale of suffering that we have seen. Two factors have played a crucial and aggravating role. The first is poor governance, most notably in Zimbabwe, as all hon. Members know. Of a total population of about 11.5 million people, more than 7 million Zimbabweans are now receiving food aid. Sadly, that number could become even higher over the next 12 months if economic conditions do not improve. The Government's handling of the economy has been truly appalling: gross domestic product has shrunk by 25 per cent. in the past three years; inflation is 150 per cent. and rising; the official exchange rate is wildly out of line with reality and has resulted in a foreign exchange crisis; all prices are controlled; fuel is almost unavailable; and even people who have money cannot buy food.

Most worryingly, there has been poor co-operation from the Zimbabwe Government with the international aid agencies—those trying to help most have been hindered most. Import permits for food have been delayed, charities trying to distribute food at community level have been obstructed, and access to some of the most vulnerable groups, particularly displaced farm workers, has been blocked. Although the United Nations has ensured that international food aid is distributed in strict accordance with humanitarian principles, the distribution of food through the Government-owned grain marketing board has been distorted for political reasons and the Government have so far refused to allow independent monitoring of their work.

The second aggravating factor has been the highest HIV/AIDS infection rates in the world: 34 per cent. in Zimbabwe, 33.4 per cent. in Swaziland, 24 per cent. in Lesotho, 20 per cent. in Zambia and 16.4 per cent.

[Ms Sally Keeble]

in Malawi. We are still trying to understand the full impact of that, but some things have already been made clear. HIV/AIDS strikes at the heart of the coping mechanisms that people have developed. Those whose contributions are most needed are those least able to contribute. Millions of households throughout the region have lost one or both working-age adults and many of the adults who are alive are too ill to work in the field, scavenge for food or seek work elsewhere. Children and the elderly are bearing the burden of providing for those households in such difficult times.

I draw attention to the prospects for those with HIV. Good nutrition is essential for prolonging life and delaying the onset of AIDS, and that is obviously impossible when food is scarce. Information is still poor, but there are signs that mortality rates from HIV/AIDS in Zimbabwe have increased from between 1,500 and 2,000 a week to between 2,000 and 2,500 a week over the past 18 months or so. There is a vicious two-way circle: food shortages impact by weakening the resistance of those with HIV and tipping them into full-blown AIDS, while illness and early deaths from AIDS of many adults make it harder for communities to cope with food shortages. That is a key area for all of us who are committed to development.

The international response to the crisis has been effective, if perhaps limited in scale. As of this month, $396 million has been provided in response to the UN consolidated appeal—65 per cent. of the total requested. The UN has distributed more than 200,000 tonnes of food aid to 5.5 million people in the six countries covered. The number of deaths directly attributable to food shortages has thankfully been relatively small, and that is the best testament to the success of the relief operation that we could have hoped for. We believe that there are now adequate supplies to cover the needs in the region throughout March and therefore up to the next harvest.

The UK has provided very substantial help to the UN, both in funding and staffing, and the effectiveness of Department for International Development humanitarian operations is widely respected in the international community, as hon. Members of all parties recognise. We have played a strong and leading role in responding to the crisis. In funding, only the United States and the European Community have provided more. Of the EC response, 20 per cent. is provided by our Department. Since September 2001, we have contributed about £130 million. In addition, our contribution has been entirely in the form of cash and not food commodities, which is far more useful to the agencies and allows for a much more flexible response.

We have also been the most active donor in pushing for improved co-ordination, providing practical help and trying to address the underlying issues affecting the crisis. The response from the rest of the international community has been patchy, and we have urged others to increase their contributions. The Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for International Development wrote to colleagues in other countries to press for contributions. The British public have been typically generous in their response to appeals for funds by organisations working in the regions. The organisations have also received funding from the Government and play an essential role in the delivery of help to communities in the regions. So far, we are the single biggest funder in Zimbabwe and we feed about 1.3 million children a day.

The severity of the crisis has rung warning bells in many parts of the international community. Normally, the region has coped with poor rainfall; several places are not used to dealing with such food shortages. However, the region is becoming less able to cope. A combination of poor governance, high HIV/AIDS prevalence rates and less predictable weather patterns could send the region into a downwards spiral from which it would be difficult to recover. That would damage all our development efforts, and especially those of people in the countries concerned. We therefore need to work with others, including Governments and communities, to find solutions to a range of problems. We need to improve agricultural techniques, to encourage better management and to ensure that markets work properly so that food can be bought and sold.

It is crucial that we scale up our work to tackle HIV/AIDS, and local leadership is essential for that. The reversal of the infection rate in Uganda—it is now down to 5 per cent.—shows what can be achieved by strong commitment throughout the system. However, all the development achievements in the region will be undermined if that does not happen.

The crisis has been a major test for the international community and the families whose lives have been scarred by the famine. At least we have been able to prevent the crisis from becoming a complete disaster, and Britain has played an important part in that effort. We need to continue to work with international agencies and the countries in the region in order to deal with the underlying issues that the crisis has exposed and to prevent the vicious circle that I described.

There are key issues that must be addressed. First, we must improve the food security of people in southern Africa. Variation in rainfall is a fact of life and we must get better at coping with that. Higher incomes and functioning markets will enable communities to cope with poor harvests. Secondly, we must ensure that we find regional solutions, with leadership from within the region. The Southern Africa Development Community is examining a regional strategy for improving food security and we hope to support that, including through funding if that would help. Thirdly, we need to recognise the dimension that HIV/AIDS has added to the food crisis.

The agenda is large and represents a major challenge for us and the rest of the international donor community. I hope that all hon. Members will agree that the issue is vital for the poor people in southern Africa and Africa as a whole.

2.43 pm

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): We are all glad that the Government have called this debate on a real, massive and terrible crisis that is being overshadowed by two other humanitarian crises nearer home—in Palestine and, of course, in Iraq.

In southern Africa today, 14.4 million people are at risk from starvation. They face a food deficit of 1 million tonnes until March 2003. There is indeed a crisis and, as the Minister said, it has been taken to a new level by the impact of HIV/AIDS. One in three adults in southern Africa is infected. The crisis needs immediate and long-term commitments. We recognise the achievements of the Secretary of State, her Minister and her Department, but many challenges are still not met and many questions remain unanswered.

As the Minister suggested, the grim spectre of AIDS is ever present and intertwined with so many of southern Africa's problems. Sustainable food production requires strong and healthy people to till the soil and to nurture the next generation. However, 60 per cent. of the population in the region are aged under 18. Those countries have the highest HIV infection rates in the world—it is over 40 per cent. according to Save the Children. The infection rate of young women from the age of 15 is usually four to five times higher than that of young men of the same age, which highlights gender and economic inequalities. More children become heads of households, but they lose family rights to property and land, they have less access to social services and they become more marginalised. If they migrate to find food or work, they are more open to health hazards and they have less education, which reduces the human capital producing food. It is our duty and it is in our interest to help these countries break their downward spiral.

When talking water, we British must snap out of our obsession with having too much of it. We are so lucky. Somewhere, a child dies every 15 seconds from waterborne diseases. The World Health Organisation and UNICEF say that worldwide 1 billion people lack access to safe drinking water and 2.4 billion people are lacking basic sanitation facilities. That means that in Africa one third of the population lack water or sanitation facilities. Dirty water and poor sanitation compound the effects of the lack of food and of AIDS. Weakened HIV/AIDS victims are more likely to die from infections, such as cholera or malaria. In southern Africa, the short-term health of 14.4 million people depends not only on food, but on the supply of clean water and the provision of sanitation; currently, they have neither.

In March 2000, the Secretary of State announced that the Department for International Development's financial assistance for water and sanitation would be doubled. That undertaking has barely been met. The current expenditure plan suggests that water and sanitation budgets, particularly in Africa, will continue to fall from their peak in 1999–2000. In this, the international year of fresh water, DFID's water expenditure is significantly less than that of some other donors, such as Germany and Japan and there are, according to the National Audit Office report published last Friday, few substantive country water programmes. That NAO report highlighted the need for DFID to focus the investment of official development assistance on sustainable solutions. WaterAid argues that if investments in water and sanitation are to have a lasting and sustainable impact on the lives of poor people, a significant share of DFID funding should be spent on training local people to administer, deliver and maintain water and drainage systems and on training the trainers. The lack of human capital in such countries is one of their greatest handicaps. Does the Minister agree with WaterAid's analysis?

We cannot avoid coherent discussions on genetically modified food aid, nationally and internationally, nor should we wish to. The United States of America supplies more than 50 per cent. of all food aid and DFID, in its memorandum to the Select Committee of 7 October 2002, said that that US food aid contains genetically modified material, and with drought predicted in America that major source of supply may literally dry up and other sources will have to be found. Non-governmental organisations, such as Christian Aid, suggest that the US should replace its food aid with cash, which they could use to try to buy GM-free food.

We respect the fact that the decision whether to accept GM food lies with individual Governments, but we must have a clear and informed debate. In terms of feeding people in a crisis such as the one that we face in southern Africa and being challenged by long-term population growth, GM technology provides a wealth of opportunities. Dr. Ray Mathias, at a Scientific Alliance conference last month, said that GM crops could be resistant to pests, disease and environmental stress, including drought, and that they produce higher yields more safely without the need for agrochemicals; he added that they could also lead to novel, easy-to-administer medicines, such as vaccines. For example, 80 hectares of greenhouse could provide enough hepatitis B vaccine for the whole of south-east Asia every year.

For those who will not accept GM, there are problems. Over the years, GM food aid has not just been eaten; it has also been planted. It is now estimated that a significant proportion of food sourced in Africa contains GM—as much as 80 per cent. in South Africa, according to the World Food Programme. Where do we get enough GM-free food from? If countries refuse GM food, do they surrender the "right to food"? When they refuse GM food, what provisions are in place to ensure its swift re-allocation? In Zambia, World Food Programme food aid was shipped in but the Government refused it and would not let it out again without export licences, which took a long time to get.

Genetic modification affects everyone in the food pipeline. It is not the only answer to the problem of feeding the world, but it is a very important one. No nation should reject GM food solely on the grounds of ignorance or prejudice; no nation can afford to do that. If we could focus our energies on determining our vision for the environment, agriculture and food supply across the world, we could get both sides of the GM debate together and find a viable solution. I hope that the Minister and the British Government share my view on that.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): I apologise for arriving late and missing the Minister's introductory remarks.

Countries reject GM food for two reasons. They might have a principled objection to it. They might also have a strategic view: if GM crops are planted or if GM gets into the environment by mistake, they will be blacklisted if and when they want to supply food to other parts of the world that have a GM-free policy. That is why Africa is in a double bind.

Mr. Key: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. His comments highlight one part of the hypocrisy of those who are arguing against GM; they argue as though it was not there, but it is—and that is the problem that we have to manage.

Mr. Tony Colman (Putney): Zambia was offered GM-milled maize, which would have had no impact because it cannot germinate. Therefore, it could not have affected future Zambian exports.

Mr. Key: The hon. Gentleman is right, but I am also fairly sure that I am right in saying that Zambia refused oil or soya or anything else that may have come from GM crops. As the hon. Gentleman said, that is totally illogical. That is why we must have a proper debate about this all around the world, which leads me to my next question: what are the Minister and the Government doing to promote the GM debate in developing countries? Even in our country we are strapped for cash with regard to trying to have a GM debate: our Government are allowing £250,000—although that figure has now gone up to nearer £500,000—but the New Zealand Government spent over £2 million on a GM debate. I hope that the Minister will consider that one of her responsibilities is to promote the GM debate in developing countries.

The large-scale provision of free food aid in southern Africa is imperative to address the immediate crisis. What plans have been set up—not only in individual countries, but across the entire region—to manage the effect on prices that this free food will have come harvest time? There has already been a threefold increase in the price of food in some southern African countries, but elsewhere large quantities of imported grain lead to prices in local markets dropping through the floor—or, which is worse, grain is left to rot because there is no need to buy it.

People might also get used to food aid if it is offered to them year after year, with the attendant risk that a dependency culture develops. If food aid is abandoned in favour of cash aid, imports bought from grain-surplus countries such as Tanzania or South Africa cause prices to rise sharply back home, with consequences for the population of the exporting country; that is the case even if the imports are from genetically modified plants.

If we are to work towards long-term solutions, we must provide sustained and strategic support for rural livelihoods, rather than exacerbate the problem by undermining local farmers and their markets: nor can we afford a repeat of the Malawi grain stores fiasco, when the International Monetary Fund advised the Malawi Government to sell most of their grain reserves when the country was facing major harvest failures. The IMF has never been held to account for that. I know that the Secretary of State has said that the Malawi Government accepted the advice and took the decision, but we should question the quality of that advice, and recognise the enormous pressure on African Governments to do what they are told by the IMF.

Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): The International Development Committee went to Malawi and asked that question. The International Monetary Fund firmly denies ever giving such advice. In fact, all the evidence that we received suggests that the decision was taken by people who administer the grain store and was not the responsibility of the IMF.

Mr. Key: I am relieved to hear that, but how did the story get about in the first place, given that an awful lot of people believe it? I hope that this debate will provide an opportunity for people to take a more rational approach and refer back to the evidence put by the hon. Gentleman. That is the benefit of these debates. There is much merit, as the Minister suggested, in a food programme with food stores owned by the Southern African Development Community. Christian Aid says that that would cost less to run and be less prone to corruption.

When poverty reduction strategy programmes were introduced, we all had high hopes for them. Sadly, opinion seems to be growing that they are falling well short of expectations. The world development movement, Christian Aid, Jubilee Research and WaterAid have all been critical of them. There is a consensus that food security and rural livelihood should get greater emphasis in PRSPs.

Following the IMF involvement, it has now been alleged—I look to the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Tony Worthington) to correct me—that the IMF is withholding debt relief to Zambia, where nearly 3 million people are at risk of starvation, until its Government privatise their national commercial bank. Is that true? Once again, many people believe that it is. It would be a strange way for the international community to address the food crisis in southern Africa, much as I would like the bank to be privatised.

In Zimbabwe, 7.2 million people are at risk from starvation. Half of all the people in southern Africa who may die of famine have the misfortune to exist—I can hardly say live—under the regime of President Mugabe. The country that was once the bread-basket of the region is now facing disaster. Political instability, the terror associated with land reform policies, economic incompetence, corruption and indifference to the problem of HIV/AIDS can all be laid at the door of Mugabe's Government.

In Zimbabwe alone, there are about 3,000 AIDS-related deaths a week and a horrendous 35 per cent. of adults there have AIDS. Prostitution is increasing as food security is decreasing, thus exacerbating the AIDS epidemic. Food is being distributed via schools, and thank goodness for DFID's aid programme for the children of Zimbabwe. When children are removed from education as their families struggle with AIDS and famine, how do we ensure free and fair food distribution? We cannot.

In answers to written questions, the Secretary of State has told us that the Department has not had discussions with representatives of the Government of South Africa or the Opposition parties in Zimbabwe about the serious effects of the political situation in Zimbabwe on the national and regional food crisis. Perhaps the Secretary of State will rely on President Chirac of France to have a word in President Mugabe's ear at the Franco-African summit in Paris the week after next. Yes, he will be there. Yesterday, EU Ministers were unable to agree on renewing the sanctions against Zimbabwe, which is disgraceful and shameful.

As the Zimbabwe Opposition leader, Morgan Tsvangirai, said on 23 January:

"Any avenue granted to Mugabe to attend international meetings at which he is treated as a statesman and an equal is an affront to the people of Zimbabwe. It amounts to a recognition and support of Mugabe's gruesome record at home."

To be fair to the Secretary of State, she told the International Development Committee on the same day that she found it "unimaginable" that the French could consider inviting Mugabe to Paris. She said:

"I can only think that in Paris they are not following what's going on. People have got it into their heads that this is just Britain and Mugabe in conflict over white farmers. They are not attending to the reality and the suffering of the people."

We agree, but once again, the Secretary of State has lost the argument and the Government have lost the argument in Europe.

Today, we have focused on southern Africa, but we do not forget the crises, problems and challenges of the rest of the continent. The Sudan peace agreement signed earlier this week gives real hope. The Bishop of Salisbury is in southern Sudan this week, reinforcing the solidarity of our diocese with the Christian communities there. Ethiopia is teetering on the edge of famine. There is dangerous instability in the Maghreb. West and central Africa continue to give cause for real concern.

Mr. Drew: The hon. Gentleman mentioned Sudan, but I should like to talk about Ethiopia. I went on an Inter-Parliamentary Union trip to Ethiopia before Christmas, and one of the sad things was that because of the crisis in southern Africa's food security, donor countries had been reducing food supplies to Ethiopia, which seems scandalous. However, that is the nature of the way that donor countries work. They sometimes deal with what they think of as the most immediate problem, and forget that they cause other problems as a consequence. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree that that is unacceptable.

Mr. Key: That is precisely why I put that in my speech—so that we do not forget those countries. Of course, the hon. Gentleman is right about Ethiopia. One of the great ironies about that country is that although it is suffering from famine, the Nile flows through it. The problem is more a question of failure to manage water. In Sudan, too, food has been a problem from time to time.

In spite of all the distractions, great and small, that grab our attention in Britain, Africa is never far from our hearts and minds, and we are engaged. In most countries in southern Africa, there is not only hope, but real progress. I have seen it myself in Mozambique and in Zambia. Only in Zimbabwe have I seen a sharp decline. We are willing the people of Africa to win, and we must continue to will them the means to win.

Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key). I remember the two visits that I made many years ago to Sudan, and the tribute that was paid there to his diocese for the work that it did in that country over many years. I do not think that anyone appreciates the loneliness of Christians in some parts of Sudan.

In my contribution to this debate, I shall draw heavily on the visit that the International Development Committee made to Malawi, and I shall quote the example of that country more often than any other, although there are lessons to be learned from across the region. It is time that we got frank about the problems. The tendency in such debates is to concentrate on the particulars of a crisis—which deliveries were made, what the climate was like, and so on—but such problems arise so often that we should concentrate on what is endemic. A great deal can be done, and most food crises are down to human inadequacy in one way or another. I shall start with the issue of governance.

The quality of governance in many southern African countries needs drastic improvement. There are more formal democracies than there used to be, but they have not yet delivered the better governance necessary to avoid famine. Democracy is a necessary condition for progress, but it is not sufficient in southern Africa. I should like to suggest some of the things that the New Partnership for Africa's Development should do if a genuine partnership between north and south is to develop, and if we are to avoid such crises.

The system of political parties in southern Africa and Africa generally is woefully weak. Parties are united not by an ideology but by a determination to win the spoils of the state. I used to get hauled off to give lectures on Her Majesty's loyal Opposition—I am not called to do so any more; no doubt the hon. Member for Salisbury is instead—but there is no culture of opposition in southern Africa. Parties fight an election to win. No one knows what to do if they lose, so they join the governing party. Parties are cobbled together by rich men as a result of obligation or for a pay-off. We must seriously tackle why people in Africa go into politics in order to get rich, why it is difficult for anyone other than a rich person to gain a seat, and why politicians need to have money beyond their salaries to fulfil their duties as an MP.

We will not avoid crises until the quality of government in African countries and elsewhere is improved. The hopes that we had for the Government in Malawi a few years ago have declined. They have been obsessed with gaining a third term, contrary to the constitution. Roughly translated, that means maintaining the food chain—not for the people, but for the politicians at the trough. With perhaps just a few exceptions, the motivation for a third term is not the fulfilment of public policy.

We can tackle the problem with traditional methods such as establishing an independent judiciary, a free press, a thriving civil society, an anti-corruption bureau that has teeth, and ensuring that civil servants are paid enough to live on—but new measures are also necessary. Complete transparency over the payments passing from western firms to African Governments is necessary, more in some countries—Angola or Nigeria, for example—than others. With greater transparency, we could have cracked corruption a long time ago. When are we going to wake up to the fact that African elites take far more out of the continent than western investors put in? We must tackle that problem.

The hon. Member for Salisbury helpfully mentioned the grain store. Corruption associated with Malawi's grain store perfectly illustrates my point. The grain store should have been the means by which the state helped the poor, but it became instead a nice little earner for those with access to the grain. It was no doubt sold off at low prices. No one can show where the grain went. It disappeared, doubtless to reappear and be sold back to the Malawians at a higher price. How could the man in charge of the parastatal ADMARC, who presided over this fiasco, resurface as a Finance Minister? How could the director of the anti-corruption bureau be removed from his job and placed in another unspecified one, just when the Finance Minister and other Ministers were being interviewed about the grain store?

Mr. Colman: Does my hon. Friend agree that corruption among African elites is often matched by the collusion of elites in Britain, particularly the Corporation of London? I applaud the Government's work to stop up several avenues down which money moves out of Africa, but more needs to be done to prevent such collusion.

Tony Worthington: I look forward to hearing my hon. Friend's speech, as he knows much more about corruption in the City of London than I do.

How do we explain the fact that the chair of the Malawi agriculture select committee, which was examining corruption, was harassed, detained and imprisoned by the state? Because he was investigating the fiasco, his very status as an MP was questioned.

The situation in Malawi is, in fact, modest, in comparison with what we tolerated for years in Angola, where the Government were financed by oil and the Opposition were financed by diamonds, providing the basis on which the rival armies were maintained. The country might formally have been referred to as a democracy. Action in the UK on the declaration of resources going into the country could have helped to tackle the problem. That could be done with Nigeria today, but we do not do it. Nigeria discovers oil and, with the active connivance of oil companies in the developed world, hurtles towards being one of the poorest countries on the planet. What the ogre Mugabe is inflicting on his people is even worse.

We must examine the political parties in Africa and find ways of structuring democracy so that it is no longer primarily a means of getting rich. We never appreciate just how unbelievably lucky we are in this country, in that the vast majority of us go into politics not in order to make money but because of our political beliefs or out of some idea about public service. That is not true in Africa.

It is striking just how little Governments and Parliaments have done in the past few years to put in place the building blocks for democracy. For example, Malawi, where people are overwhelmingly dependent on agriculture, has never recovered from Banda's repressive regime, with the consequence that there is not a thriving national civil society in Malawi. In such a civil society, people would be linked to professional groups, human rights lobbies or gender groups, but there is no counterbalance in Malawi to malfunctioning politics.

A land registration scheme, which enables title to be proved, is fundamental to agricultural policy and the production of food. The absence of such a scheme is another illustration of the lack of progress. That is especially important now that there are so many male deaths from AIDS and women are unable to retain their land because there is no legal system.

Malawi is a good example of a tiny country that has a rapidly rising population, a huge percentage of which are dependent on peasant farming. It has virtually no industry to employ surplus labour, no land system and virtually no discernable agricultural policy. The country is landlocked and has virtually no air services outside Africa, so production for wealthy overseas countries cannot be achieved. Each year, the population soars, so that the same amount of land has to support even more people.

How can it be—this intrigued us—that Malawi, one of the poorest countries in the world, nearly became a net contributor to the World Bank this year? Why is it difficult to see what strategy there is in the country, 20 per cent. of which is Lake Malawi, for better irrigation? Why is it that the only World Bank programme that we discovered was an untargeted maize-distribution scheme to be administered by a parastatal body in election year? "Vote for me, and I'll feed you", that is what we objected to. How will Malawi solve its problems when it has no substantial indigenous source of fertiliser and the land is already seriously depleted because of overuse and crop rotation? My colleagues and I could find no answers to those basic questions.

The fact that those questions had not been faced meant that the country was vulnerable to the food crisis that hit it. It is difficult to see where a strategy for agriculture will come from. The Food and Agriculture Organisation does not seem to do that sort of work, although its title would seem to imply that it should. There is definitely an impression that agricultural policy by the donor community is being put on the back burner while resources are, rightly, put into education and health. I am pleased that DFID is now producing new policy papers on agriculture and land policy, on which I hope we can build.

We always go on about tariff barriers, but many non-tariff barriers should also be tackled. I do not want to take up too much time, although this is a favourite subject of mine, but I want to consider how Malawi's problems have been worsened by poor reproductive health services and the impact of HIV/AIDS. Malawi has to feed more people every year. According to the United Nations Development Programme, Malawi's population stood at 11 million in 1999 and will rise to 15.7 million by 2015—an increase of 42 per cent. in 16 years. The food production per capita in Africa, never mind in Malawi, is falling and is lower than it was 10 years ago. As the hon. Member for Salisbury said, Malawi already has one of the worst records in Africa for access to safe water. About 50 per cent. of the population do not have access to safe water and 97 per cent. are without access to safe sanitation.

Africa is the least safe place on earth to be born. Africans are five times more likely to die before reaching the age of five than any other people in the world. It is abundantly clear that the intensely rural country of Malawi does not have access to decent reproductive health services such as mother and baby clinics. If it had, mothers would be given the choice over how many children to have. The likelihood is that they would make the same choice as women throughout the world. It will take many years before their birth rates fall to the same level as those in countries such as Italy and Spain, to cite two at random, where the population is diminishing because of the choices that people have made. The people of Malawi should have that choice. There is no chance of their meeting many of the millennium development goals, such as a decline in maternal mortality or infant mortality, all children going to school or a decline in poverty—unless southern Africa gets much better access to maternal health services.

Into that already appalling set of circumstances, we have to factor in HIV/AIDS. Southern Africa is already the most afflicted part of the world. HIV/AIDS affects more than 30 per cent. of the adult population, who are often the wealth creators and who leave behind a population dominated by orphans and old people. I have deliberately brought up AIDS directly after dealing with reproductive health because one of our biggest mistakes in dealing with AIDS has been to separate in our minds its treatment and the provision of reproductive health services.

Developing world family planning associations were very uncomfortable about dealing with AIDS because their traditional clients are mothers and small children, not adult males behaving irresponsibly. Even vasectomies are not suggested because they are seen as threatening in a male-dominated society. It is always more difficult to deal with the powerful.

In the developed world, we put all our resources into managing the disease. Gruesomely, repeat prescriptions of extraordinarily expensive drugs are far more profitable for the pharmaceutical companies than finding a vaccine that cures or a barrier method that prevents the transmission of the disease that is under the control of women. All the private money went into drugs such as anti-retrovirals. Very little private money went into vaccines and next to nothing into microbicides to prevent women from being infected by their husbands. I am delighted that DFID has put money into microbicides. There is something severely wrong with the pharmaceutical industry and our values when we put so little into prevention rather than into management.

I should like to spend a little time on President Bush's extraordinary but welcome statement that he is going to ask Congress to commit $15 billion over the next five years, including $10 billion of new money, in order to turn the tide against AIDS in the most afflicted nations of Africa and the Caribbean. He terms that:

"a work of mercy beyond all current international efforts to help the people of Africa."

It is an extraordinary sum, especially given that a few months ago he was trying to cut funds in AIDS legislation going through Congress. The fact that Senator Bill Frist, who was promoting the Bill, had just become Republican leader in the Senate might have helped.

I have some apprehension, however. Only $1 billion is to go into the global health fund; the rest will be distributed bilaterally by the United States. Why does Bush have so much difficulty with being a team player? He was involved in setting up the global health fund. It makes an enormous amount of sense to have a unified policy and to cut down on the bureaucracy associated with multiple donors.

Mr. Key: Is not the answer to the hon. Gentleman's question that the President would avoid, if possible, financing the United Nations Population Fund, Marie Stopes International and other bodies which do enormous good around the world by tackling the problem? For political reasons, he simply cannot provide the funding. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that that is a terrible shame?

Tony Worthington: The hon. Gentleman will not be surprised to learn that I am going to deal with that.

President Bush introduced the theme into his state of the union speech when he referred to the welcome and incredible fall in the price of anti-retroviral drugs from $12,000 a year to less than $300 a year. He said that he would treat at least 2 million people with life-extending drugs, and that is welcome. However, it is also very ambitious, and I hope that he realises that it is not just a question of dishing out the drugs—a lot of support work has to go on as well.

We rejoice at the fact that the cost of drugs has fallen to less than $300 a year, but that must be seen in context. Total health expenditure per person in Tanzania is between $3 and $4 a year, so we are back to the need for investment in reproductive health. I am afraid that the President's action must be seen in the context of Doha, where the United States recently vetoed a deal, on which all the other participants had agreed, to bring cheaper drugs to the poorest in the world.

I come now to the point that I hope will interest the hon. Member for Salisbury. President Bush claims that the comprehensive plan will prevent 7 million new AIDS infections, but what kind of prevention will it be? It is quite an extraordinary claim. The President is saying, "We are going to prevent 7 million people in Africa and the Caribbean from being infected with AIDS." However, we must see the initiative in the context of his policy on reproductive health. He has stopped contributions to the UNFPA worldwide and has therefore withdrawn money for reproductive health. He has done that because of false allegations that the organisation supports abortions in China as part of the one-child policy.

As the Minister knows, Bush's representatives are attempting to unpick the epoch-making Cairo conference on reproductive health. At the recent Asian and Pacific regional conference on population and development, in Bangkok, which I think the Minister attended, the United States delegation objected to attempts to prevent AIDS by promoting the use of condoms among adolescents on the basis that that would encourage under-age sex. Abstinence is the goal, say the Administration. Mercifully, the wise Asian and Pacific delegates saw off the American proposals by votes of 32 to one and 31 to one. However, hon. Members can see why I am apprehensive when the Americans talk about preventive methods.

We also need clarification in another respect. I was relieved that Mr. Steven Mosher, the president of the Population Research Institute—the other side, as it were—expressed concern about what would happen under Bush's $15 billion AIDS relief plan for Africa. He said:

"the condom-promoting aspect of this campaign is troublesome as well. The massive distribution of condoms in Africa has not only not stopped the spread of AIDS, it has put millions more at risk of infection in the name of prevention."

[Tony Worthington]

That is the view of the Population Research Institute—the biggest of the pressure groups that persuaded Bush not to support the UNFPA. Here, however, is what Mosher said in an article about Bush's $15 billion for AIDS:

"Only groups that are solely dedicated to abstinence—and therefore have no hidden agenda—should be tasked with implementing this program."

It will be very interesting to see the battle that takes place in the United States over AIDS.

The proposed $15 billion is a huge sum, which puts enormous pressure on Europe to reciprocate. When Bush talks about prevention, however, what will it be? In other policies, he has withdrawn condoms—one of the only mechanisms that we have—from Africa. Is AIDS to be controlled simply by abstinence or are methods such as using condoms to be allowed? There is no doubt that when we discuss famine or food crises in Africa, AIDS and our policy on AIDS must be at the centre of our thinking. I hope that the Minister will take that into account in her reply.

3.25 pm

John Barrett (Edinburgh, West): It is a pleasure to follow the Minister's opening remarks and two thoughtful and well-informed speeches. I will not spend too much time on the subject of AIDS or of genetically modified crops, as both have been covered in the debate.

I want to pick up something that the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) said: although the debate is about southern Africa, the food crisis is not limited to that area, but affects other parts of Africa. I agree wholeheartedly with what was said about groups and organisations having to tackle the reluctance to promote condoms, as they are a major factor in preventing the spread of AIDS.

As much of the world's attention is focused on the possible war in Iraq, it is important not to take our eye off the ball in the continuing food crisis in Africa. Reports from Ethiopia and Eritrea say that half the population have been affected by drought and it is estimated that approximately 500,000 tonnes of food aid will be required there this year. In Mauritania, 56 per cent. of children are suffering from malnutrition, and in Madagascar significant levels of malnutrition have been reported. There may be crises in other areas that have not yet hit the headlines.

Often, what keeps a news story on the boil is the presence of television cameras and journalists on the ground. The fact that we are debating the issue today will no doubt be overshadowed by the Defence Secretary's announcement that more aircraft are being sent to the Gulf ready for military action. Continuing the debate in Parliament is important, as it is our duty to keep the subject on the agenda when it is not a hot news story.

The current military build-up shows that where there is political determination resources can be found. Whenever possible, we must continue to highlight the importance of the issue which, sadly, will continue long after a war in Iraq is over. This country has a small but important role that is part of a much wider effort, as the Secretary of State for International Development said. Unlike the situation in Afghanistan, there is much talk of a commitment to keep the peace and to rebuild Iraq after military action. Development budgets are always stretched and there are many questions about where to draw the line between finding resources for military and for humanitarian expenditure, but they are closely linked.

The blurring of budgets was an issue when questions were asked about whether the money spent on humanitarian aid in Afghanistan should rather have been spent on reconstruction. The Secretary of State gave detailed answers on the issue at Select Committee sittings. The budget headings may be fine for accountants, but for the hungry they are of little importance as long as the problem is being tackled. Funding and education projects, for example, which then provide the money to allow someone to buy food to feed the family are one example of the blurring of budgets, and there are countless others.

Just to say that there is a food crisis in southern Africa is a problem in itself, because that might imply that if enough food was delivered the problem would be solved. Many other factors contribute to the current crisis. Problems of drought, erratic rainfall and changes in the global climate all add to the issue's complexity. The problems related to HIV/AIDS and other health issues make the crisis deeper and more difficult to cope with.

There are problems with governance, as has been said, although that is so in many countries worldwide. That would be a major problem in its own right, but it is magnified in developing countries. The availability of support systems is made much more difficult, especially in areas without a good infrastructure, and the magnitude of the problems takes on a different scale. In this country, we are able to cope better with an emergency because we have a good road network, a transport system, a regular power supply and a telecommunications system, as well as the democratic structures and financial might to cope. Sadly, the systems in many of the countries in southern Africa, and many of those most in need of support, have great difficulty in maximising the effect of outside aid. One example is the problem of transporting food aid to remote areas, which can be cut off during the rainy season. The need to repair bridges and roads may not look like a top priority during the dry season, but if food aid cannot be distributed on the ground because of a poor road system and lack of bridge repairs, the hungry will starve.

When the Select Committee visited Malawi last year, we were able to see what life is like in villages and what people are up against. We saw a compound of Red Cross trucks, ready to be used to distribute aid, but we were told that they were the heaviest and most expensive trucks to run. They were designed to be used in areas of conflict and could withstand heavy use, but locally available smaller vehicles were more suitable and cheaper to run.

We met NGOs and spoke to Department for International Development staff about what they were doing. We also met Government officials, MPs, the President and representatives from other countries—many people with a lot of local expertise. I must mention the high regard that we found for the Department's work, and I add my own appreciation for the work of the Secretary of State, whose staff had a level of expertise and commitment that could not be faulted. Naturally, we want more resources to be made available to improve the situation, but it would be hypocritical of me not to give credit where credit is due.

Often the situation was described as a crisis within a crisis, the other crisis being the effect of HIV/AIDS. The huge number of orphans and households with either a child or grandparent at the head was there for us all to see. We saw the inability to prepare the land, even if the seed and fertiliser were available, and the effect of AIDS on the health service, not only on demand, but on the doctors and nurses who suffered themselves, resulting in an already overstretched system losing key workers. The children's malnutrition ward that we visited looked busy enough, as most of the beds were full, but we were told that during the busy season there would be two or three children in each bed. We also saw the effects of tuberculosis at a TB clinic when we visited Lilongwe.

The food and AIDS crises have become interlinked in many southern African countries. Nowhere is the link highlighted more than in discussions about the use and availability of anti-retroviral drugs. To be able to cope with the medication available, people need a good diet and to be relatively strong. For many who are too weak, the use of some medication is out of the question, even if it is available.

Questions about the governance of Malawi have already been asked, and they remain unanswered or only partially answered. I was never convinced that the answers that we received about the sale of the strategic grain reserve were truthful, and I am convinced that some individuals have done very well out of the suffering of others. People's bank accounts have swollen as the stomachs of others have. Whether they are business men, truckers or politicians, there is no excuse for using the food crisis as a method of getting rich.

The prize for the worst example of exploiting the food crisis must go to Robert Mugabe in Zimbabwe. What started as a doubtful election result has now grown into a full-scale humanitarian crisis, with half the population—an estimated 7 million people—suffering from food shortages. As we hear about deaths, adults collapsing and children fainting in schools, there are repeated reports of political bias in the distribution of food aid. In a country that has the capacity to produce food, the expertise to employ people on the land and the possibility of exporting food to neighbouring countries, what is happening in Zimbabwe is a crime against humanity. If ever there was a case for a United Nations resolution, this is it. Robert Mugabe is definitely a weapon of mass destruction.

There is no time today to explore the issue of GM crops, which has already been covered, and the issue of milled grain and the problems that Zambia faces were also mentioned by the hon. Member for Salisbury. The debate has not been helped by some people in the United Kingdom who are opposed to GM research under any circumstances. If drought-resistant crops can be developed and the process of speeding them up can be delivered by science, scientists should be able to do what they can to help with the problem.

We also have the problem of understanding the situation from the point of view of those suffering in Africa. It is impossible for many of us in this country to appreciate what it means not to have a regular supply of nutritious food instantly accessible and available every day of the week.

In an attempt to raise the profile of the food crisis in southern Africa, I agreed to live on a Red Cross food parcel for one week at the start of the year. I agree that that does not equate to living on food parcels alone in the long term, but I can report that it made me think about food all the time—what I was eating, what I could drink, and how to make bread. I never want to see another white bean in my life. Not drinking tea, coffee, fruit juice and alcohol and surviving on the two basics had another effect: it made me realise how significant the lack of nutritional food is. When we talk about keeping people alive by supplying maize or other basics, that is a long way short of a healthy diet, but it is often the basis for living a relatively normal life. Without a decent diet, infections can easily take over, and people are often too weak to do a day's physical work.

3.36 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

3.51 pm

On resuming—

John Barrett: We often hear about how much difference a treadle pump can make, contributing to the production of an extra crop a year in some areas. In countries such as Malawi, the ability to run small irrigation schemes can make an impact. However, I have tried to work a treadle pump and found that to do so one has to be fairly fit to start with. For those who have not seen a treadle pump, it is similar to the type of treadle machine often seen at a gymnasium, which drains the life from one's legs and the stamina from one's lungs in minutes.

The difference between surviving and developing a sustainable existence in many southern African countries is the difference between continuing to supply them with food aid and helping in the reconstruction of individual countries, as happened in Europe after the second world war. It was recognised at that time that rebuilding Europe would provide a market for US goods, and that a successful European economy would also help the USA grow.

Africa has many of the problems associated with war-torn countries, and many regions of Africa have been ravaged by war for decades. If Africa is to grow out of its current crisis, it cannot do so on its own. The rest of the world must play its part. One way of starting that process is to examine the way in which we trade with African countries, how fair trade develops, what barriers we have put in place, and how we are reducing the opportunities for those countries.

We should examine how we in Europe and the USA support farmers, how we dispose of surpluses, the effects of dumping, and how surpluses and subsidies could be better used. Non-tariff barriers and technical standards may also place restrictions on developing countries. If market access was improved, that could be a major step forward.

Some of my hard-pressed constituents might ask why we should continue to help those abroad, when we have enough problems of our own on our doorstep. I argue that we have enough resources to do both, and that it is in all our interests to do so, and not only for humanitarian purposes, although that on its own should be enough—if someone is starving and we have enough food, we should share it.

Even in my constituency, one does not have to look far to see an abundance of wealth. Yesterday, an analysis was published of where millionaires live in the United Kingdom, and second on the list of their neighbourhoods was Blackhall in my constituency. Five minutes away from there are some of the most deprived areas of Edinburgh—Pilton and Muirhouse.

Inequality is worldwide, and it is sad to say that it is sometimes seen at its worst in Africa, with individuals amassing vast sums while others go hungry. We must keep the spotlight on southern Africa and hope that the determination shown to deal with problems in other regions does not, once again, leave Africa out in the cold.

3.[illegible]pm

Mr. Iain Luke (Dundee, East): I am glad to be able to contribute to this important debate on the famine conditions in southern Africa. I have taken part in debates in my constituency, and was invited by NGOs in Scotland to participate in a televised debate on the issues that have been raised in the debate today. I have also had the chance to catch the Speaker's eye and ask the Secretary of State for International Development several questions in the House on the matter.

I have a great interest in this issue and I am glad to have had a chance to read through the evidence that the International Development Committee took over the Christmas period and before, in November and December, which highlighted many of the issues that were raised in the excellent speeches of the Minister, the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key), my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Tony Worthington) and the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett). They all made relevant points. Just to see the depth of analysis has been worth while. We must now move on from all that investigatory work to find a solution, not only to the short-term famine that people are facing in southern Africa, but to the long-term risk of famine throughout that continent.

Many hon. Members could emulate to good effect my friend the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West, who undertook to restrict his diet to the food in a Red Cross parcel for a period of time. Maybe he and I could get together and table an early-day motion along those lines to encourage other hon. Members to follow suit. I do not hold out great hopes of that, but it would be another way of drawing attention to the fact that people throughout the world have to live on significantly lower levels of calories than we do in this rich country.

I was brought up in a Church that put great faith in missionary work. I was enthralled as a child to hear the stories of the lives of the great Scottish missionaries of that Church, such as David Livingstone, who virtually single-handedly opened up vast tracts of the interior of Africa. Mary Slessor, Aberdeen born but Dundee bred, was known as the great white mother of what is now modern-day Nigeria. They and others like them were spurred on by the belief that it was their role to bring the benefits of western civilisation and the teachings of Jesus Christ and the Gospels to the natives who came under their care. Africa as a continent has therefore always had a special interest for me. I welcome the recent setting up of an all-party group on Africa to allow for a focus on the many issues and troubles that beset that continent.

The Africa of the 19th century is to me a vast and exciting place, as described in such stories—a continent of lush, green vegetation and unlimited and bountiful savannah teeming with millions of wild animals. Although it was often described as "dark", it had a romance and exotic appeal that captured my imagination, and excited the thoughts and senses of many like me. Only recently, a well attended play staged at Dundee repertory theatre called "Mill Lavies" featured a poem by a local songwriter, Mike Marra. The play was about the escapism and thoughts of the jute workers in Dundee. The poem was called "If Dundee was Africa", and read:

"If Dundee was Africa . . .
I'd wheel my wheelbarrow up Kilimanjaro.
What a bra sight there would be.
Aw they icebergs in Taiport
when it's bilin in Dundee."

"Bilin" is the word for boiling hot. The hope of escaping from the cold confines of a jute mill to the warm, teeming lands of Africa was certainly at the forefront of some of my fellow citizens' minds, probably during winter times.

Modern Africa has a different image from that of the glamorous 19th-century Africa. Its image is a montage of conflict, poverty, mass suffering from AIDS and dictators, brutal tribal conflicts and genocide, natural disasters, and a myriad of human tragedies, often without hope and frequently with minimal western interest and assistance. As has been said, only when the television cameras capture the problems do such things receive any interest in this country.

By contemplating the swathe of problems encountered there, it should be obvious to all that we in the UK are lucky—indeed, privileged—to have been born in an advanced, affluent, industrial, western-style society, where the basic needs and wants of even the least fortunate are provided through a modern and comprehensive welfare state, without recourse to the Red Cross parcels mentioned earlier. The famines and the disastrous impacts are for us just a distant flicker on our collective consciousness—a phenomenon that has been dispatched, luckily enough, to the pages of our nation's history books.

However, for many of our fellow inhabitants of this beautiful and bountiful planet, famine is an ever-present threat and an everyday backdrop to their lives and their families' well-being. Nowhere is the curse of famine such an ever-present reality than the continent of Africa. Its teeming masses still contend with the basic, daily mechanistic function of grubbing around, begging and struggling for the food necessary to keep body and soul together and to continue to cling to life, however simple and basic that may be.

I recommend to anyone who wants to taste the atmosphere of such an existence Ben Okri's Booker prize-wining novel "The Famished Road". It is a moving human testimony to life in Africa today. My hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie referred to the nature of politics in Africa, and that book gives a real taste of the corruption, the wheeling and dealing and the issues that affect politics locally in rural and urban situations in African countries. It is well worth reading to find out at first hand, through the genius of the author, the problems and the blights that have scarred modern-day Africa in the post-colonial era of African history.

No blight has been so fearful and so collectively borne than famine, which has flared and flickered throughout the continent. It is brought about by a mixture of climatic features; the poor feudal, indeed, prehistoric husbandry and agricultural systems; agricultural mismanagement; and gross governmental inefficiency and corruption. Famine is a movable infamy that has migrated progressively southwards over the past three decades. However, the hon. Member for Salisbury made the point well that we should not be distracted from the fact that, although we are currently focusing on the famine in southern Africa, it could flare up anywhere on the continent. We must keep our minds focused throughout the continent, rather than on specific regions.

Britain, as the pre-eminent imperial power, played such a significant role in the opening of the continent. Our jingoist forebears boasted that they could travel from Cairo in the north to Cape Town in the south without ever leaving the protective shadow cast by the folds of the Union flag. It is therefore right, in the post-colonial era, to discuss an issue that affects many ex-British colonies. I hope that out of the debate will come an agenda whereby we do all that we can to remove from Africa the continuing prospect of famine and to ensure that the aid flowing from this country and our G8 and United Nations partners continues to provide sustenance—the means needed for survival by millions who struggle daily with famine.

It is also right to ask questions. As was asked earlier, why have countries such as Zimbabwe and Malawi, in an area that was once described as a bread-basket and which was self-sufficient in the food required to support its indigenous populations, descended into such perilous conditions? I am talking about a situation in which the spectre of Thomas Malthus and his 18th century theories of population control still hold good and stalk the African landscape.

The journalist Jeremy Laurance, in his article in The Independent on 8 July 2002, reviewed the famine in Malawi, one of the countries in the area that is suffering the most. It is worth posing again the question that he asked: Malawi should be a land of plenty, so why do 3 million people of the 20 million estimated—at that time—to be at risk continue to face the threat of starvation? The truth, as with much of the rest of the area, is that it is a puzzle—a complex mixture of drought, pestilence, war, corruption and mismanagement.

The only relief in the debate, as I found in reading up for it, is the fact that last year's estimates have been revised. At one stage, we were talking about more than 20 million people under threat. The article that I mentioned referred to the 20 million people identified by the non-governmental organisations as under threat. It is therefore good that we are now talking about 14 million people. That is still an enormous figure, but at least it shows that some of the efforts that have been made since the alarm went off have made a difference—they have moved some of those who were under threat out from under it.

The reasons why Zimbabwe and Malawi are in such a situation have been well recited. However, it is an inescapable fact—I must congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie on raising the HIV/AIDS crisis—that were it not for the AIDS crisis, the food crisis would not be as great. Many of the NGOs with which I have been working and whose reports I have read readily identify HIV/AIDS as the root cause of the food crisis affecting southern Africa. That point was made in the reports of the International Development Committee. Indeed, in a press release in December 2002, Oxfam said:

"only a concerted, long-term response will break the vicious cycle of disease and hunger . . . HIV/AIDS is killing the very generation that should be working in the fields to produce food—and the health workers and civil servants who should be responding to the crisis."

There was reference to the need for better and bigger health education programmes, yet the people who should be delivering those programmes are as much under threat as those who are trying to produce food. It will take a greater effort by western countries. I was delighted to hear from my hon. Friend that the American contribution was $15 billion. I was however saddened to hear that the Secretary of State answered a question on Thursday 23 January by saying that the United Nations co-ordinator of funds to counter AIDS did not believe that that sum was enough to tackle the crisis. Unless that crisis is dealt with, unless we can prevent the vast number of deaths that have left so many grandparents and orphans struggling to cope on their own, there will be no progress.

Oxfam estimated in its press release that in Zimbabwe, Malawi and Zambia—the countries suffering most—3 million AIDS orphans have been left to fend for themselves, to be cared for by extended families or to be fed by charitable organisations. It is also significant that of the 13 million or 14 million people facing starvation, 6 million of them, according to Oxfam's figures, are in Zimbabwe. Food shortages have been caused by price controls, a hugely chaotic fast-track land reform that has reduced the number of farms able to contribute to food production by two thirds, and the ruinous economic mismanagement imposed on Zimbabwe by Mugabe and his regime. A country that should be producing food surpluses has been brought low by the hare-brained destructive policies of a President whose grasp on reality is rapidly receding.

It is a real shame that the last vestiges of what was seen as a model of democratic government is being given a last-gasp shot of credibility by the staging of the world cricket competition. It is time for the England cricket team and its managers to take a positive decision not to participate in such an event, no matter what the cost. It is for us politicians to reconsider what more we can do to ensure a radical change of policy by Mr. Mugabe and his regime or to discuss with our allies to see how best we can encourage a peaceful and democratic change in the Government of Zimbabwe. We must work with the French to ensure that they know how ludicrous their policies towards Mugabe's regime are—policies that can only lead to more deaths.

[Mr. Iain Luke]

We must also ensure that our polices on aid and on democratic change are geared towards banishing famine from southern Africa—indeed, from the whole of Africa—for ever. That is why the positive involvement in and endorsement of the NEPAD initiative by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for International Development is welcome. We have heard about Governments not being able to pull strategies together. For the first time we are seeing the formulation of a positive agenda for Africa. At the heart of that agenda we should rightly seek the resolution of conflict and the encouragement whenever and wherever possible of good or at least better governance.

The key to ensuring the success of such an agenda is to allow the responsible African countries a greater and more influential say in how the destinies of the continent are shaped. One of the most important and innovative aspects of the NEPAD initiative is the creation of mechanisms that allow for peer review, the measuring and monitoring of progress and the encouragement of better standards of political and economic governance. Hopefully, those frameworks of partnership and mutual accountability will remove the regional policy constraints between different countries that have inhibited Africa's growth and development.

As part of the efforts to reconstruct and create partnerships, the UK's policy on debt should not go unheralded. It is a positive contribution to the whole situation. There was criticism earlier from Opposition Members, but it is generally seen as positive. The Government's decision to increase bilateral aid to £1 billion by 2006 is to be applauded. Hopefully, that long-term commitment and the commitment to work through NEPAD will in turn remove the requirement regularly to rush emergency aid and assistance to areas of crisis. It is worth noting that DFID has played a major role, and that the UK's contribution to aid relief in that area of £137 million is, after that of the United States, the largest amount of assistance on offer.

I want to stress the objectives that lie at the heart of this activity and assistance, which are eloquently set out in "Food Security and the WTO" by Sophia Murphy, which was published by the Scottish Catholic International Aid Fund in September 2001. It states that the overriding objective—whether in Africa in general or throughout the rest of the developing world—should be to ensure that countries at risk are able to produce enough food to nourish their own populations. Paul Chitnis, the chief executive of SCIAF, says in his introduction to the report:

> "Few things unite human beings as our common need for food. At the same time, nothing so divides our world. 826 million people in the developing world are under-nourished and the UN estimates that the equivalent of 30,000 children under the age of five die every day from preventable causes, one of which is poor nutrition."

That is a grotesque death toll in a world that can feed itself.

In last year's report "Forgotten Farmers" by Kevan Bundell, Christian Aid points out that the populations of the world's poorest countries have grown so rapidly that the demand for food has far outstripped the ability of farmers in those countries to provide the food required. The leading countries and organisations have not created mechanisms that can allow for the easy transfer of agricultural resources from the developed to the undeveloped world at a cost that can be afforded by the undeveloped world. In the face of global protectionism and western self-interest, Christian Aid has been at the forefront of encouraging farmers in the developing world to adopt an approach that is more appropriate to their needs and circumstances. That policy offers a positive way forward to achieving secure, locally accessed, indigenous food supplies that help to sustain life and livelihoods in the developing world.

It should be stressed that DFID has done a great deal in countries such as Malawi to achieve the self-sufficiency goals set by the campaign. It has ensured the widespread distribution of starter packs of seeds and fertiliser to every farmer. I was glad that the Committee had a chance to see what was going on in Malawi last year. I hope that I will get the same chance at some stage.

Despite the initial success of the programmes implemented by DFID and the growth of a sizeable reserve, economic incompetence and endemic political corruption have allowed those reserves to be sold. In turn, that has contributed to the famine in Malawi, where 25 per cent. of under fives in rural areas are severely malnourished. That example of mismanagement—or worse, corruption—emphasises the need for good governance, which forms the major part of our commitment to NEPAD and the new planning structures for Africa.

The Government have done a great deal in the region to cope with the famine conditions flagged up by NGOs that have a presence there. As a result, there has been a reduction in the number of people whom NGOs feared might be affected by famine. The figure has dropped from 20 million to about 14 million—a drop of 6 million, which is a significant number. However, the number of people still under threat is enormous, and the figures clearly indicate the amount of work still to be undertaken. It is right that we should be trying to bring short-term relief by rushing relief programmes to those suffering from the current blight, but the Government, the UN, the G8 and, most importantly, the Governments of responsible African states should be seeking to find a long-term solution to the recurrent scourge and to ensure that the African continent can, just as we have, dispatch the pestilence of famine to the dustbin of history.

I am heartened by the Government's commitments over the past year to give more aid and do more for Africa. In drawing to a close, however, it is right to pay tribute to the work of the many UK charities and Church organisations, such as SCIAF, its English equivalent CAFOD, Christian Aid and Oxfam, to name just a few, which do so much good work in the region to tackle famine conditions and promote the vital health and education policies needed to counter the twin killers of AIDS and starvation.

I started my speech by referring to the work of the eminent 19th century Scottish missionaries, Livingstone and Slessor, and it is fitting that I should end by praising the work done by their counterparts in the 21st century: those organisations that I have just mentioned, which have the same zeal, Christian beliefs and vision to pursue our common aims. Hopefully, the end result will be the banishment of famine from the whole of Africa, not only from its southern regions.

Tony Baldry (Banbury): My mother is a Scot whose family originally came from Aberdeenshire, so I am conscious of the contribution that Scottish Presbyterianism made to the founding of the empire and of the commitment of many of its members to propagating the Gospel. One of the sadder sights that one sees in Malawi is a mission hospital, funded largely by NGOs such as Christian Aid, which is about an hour's drive from Lilongwe. It is a very effective hospital, but behind it is a graveyard full of the graves of early Scots, their babies and young children, who went to that part of the world and were cut down in a year because they did not appreciate the problem of malaria. It is good to see that many NGOs working in Malawi and throughout the world are still supported by churches in Scotland.

I have already apologised to the Minister and I apologise to other hon. Members for the fact that I will not be staying for the winding-up speeches. The burden that used to fall on the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Tony Worthington) has today fallen on me, because a long time ago, I undertook to give a talk to the foreign services programme at Oxford university which trains young diplomats from overseas in the role of the Opposition. I must give a talk, which I hope the hon. Gentleman or his colleagues will be invited to give sooner rather than later, so I hope that hon. Members will excuse me if I cannot stay for the winding-up speeches.

It is good to speak in a debate in which at least three colleagues from the International Development Committee are taking part. I agree with the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) that one should give credit where it is due. It is fair to say that wherever we have been in Africa this year, Governments, non-governmental organisations and others have given credit for the work of the Department for International Development. DFID officials have often been able to respond speedily to immediate concerns. A good example is the way in which the Department galvanised the World Food Programme and other agencies by rehabilitating the rail link in Malawi and so improving logistics.

The debate is also welcome because, all too often, media and political attention moves from subject to subject. A couple of months ago, it was southern Africa, then it was Afghanistan and now Iraq is obscuring everything else. However, the issue that we are debating this afternoon is enormously important. The Select Committee, of which I am fortunate to be Chairman, will shortly publish a report on our findings drawn from our work on the food crisis in southern Africa. The papers and the evidence that we took are tagged to today's debate. I hope that hon. Members will have a chance to read some of those documents.

I sometimes think that the figures are so enormous that they are difficult for us to grasp. I shall share with hon. Members three quick glimpses of experiences that I had in Africa this year which, in their different ways, sum up something of the tragedy and the difficulties that we confront. On an afternoon in September, I went for a walk in the Simian mountains in Ethiopia and found myself on a hill looking down on a farmer who was trying to make a living. He had two oxen and a yoke, and he was ploughing a field under a blazing sun on a hill with a 45-degree incline which was strewn with the hardest of boulders. That was the only way in which he could earn a living, as other land in the village had become so depleted that, without access to fertilisers and nutrients, the villagers were constantly being forced out to the edge of the village.

There is an underlying issue that we will all have to address: in Ethiopia and, I suspect, in other countries, the number of food-insecure people increases even in years when there is no drought, because when there is a drought, people sell off their assets—cattle and any other possessions—so that they are almost unable to recover in years with no drought. We are faced with the dilemma of not wanting to over-dramatise what is happening but not wanting to be complacent about it either.

I was struck by the informal evidence that James Morris of the World Food Programme gave to the Select Committee. He shared with us his concern that the numbers of food-insecure people in the horn and in southern Africa were reaching such a level that he was no longer confident that he could raise the money to buy the necessary food for them, and even if he could raise that money, he was no longer confident that the food pipeline could manage to distribute it. I noted with interest the Secretary of State's candid remarks in her evidence on this topic to the Select Committee last week. She told us:

> "I am really worried that we are getting to a point where the capacity of the international system to deal with the crises that we have got in the world is being stretched to the level where I do not know whether it will carry on functioning."

We must all share that concern.

My second experience was at a feeding station in Malawi, run by a non-governmental organisation supported by Christian Aid. It was about four times the size of the Chamber. Mothers with young babes in arms were patiently waiting to receive food supplements. A young child, who could only have been 14, came to the head of the queue with her two younger siblings, aged six and five, and they wanted something to eat. She was the head of her household. Her parents had died and she was one of the many orphans in Malawi, a country with a population of 11 million, of whom more than 1 million are orphans.

Later that day, I went to a village. There are now ad hoc orphanages growing up all over the country. The person running the one that I visited invited me to speak to the orphans, who ranged in age from about 18 down to three. I did not know what to say, and I found myself telling them the story of the three little pigs—Malawi has many brick houses. I could think of no other way in which to engage them. I was struck by a 16-year-old girl who asked, "Who will now provide for my education? Without any money for education I shall get into a cycle in which the only way for me to have protection is to marry, to have children and not to advance."

I wondered who on earth would look after those huge numbers of orphans. There did not seem to be any policy of registration. In many villages, grandmothers are looking after the children, but many of them will die before the children become teenagers. We have to face that issue. I agree with the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie that the scope of governance in Malawi is pitifully small. Outside Lilongwe, there was no sense of the Government's having any reach, and within Lilongwe the only thing that people were concerned about was whether the Government had a third term.

[Tony Baldry]

The likelihood of people looking after large numbers of orphans seemed small. We have heard a lot about the link between HIV/AIDS and food shortages, which interplay with each other, and we have to address both catastrophes simultaneously. It is important to recognise the scale of the underlying problem. Without wishing to dramatise the issue, there is now a general recognition that, as the Secretary of State candidly acknowledged to the Select Committee, we are going to the limits of what organisations such as the World Food Programme can do.

We must think about how we enable countries such as Malawi and Ethiopia better to feed themselves. Part of the problem is poor governance, but it varies from country to country. Prime Minister Meles, who will give evidence to the Select Committee shortly, has done an enormous amount in Ethiopia, which has made great progress in governance. Other countries, such as Zimbabwe, have suffered. As has been said, President Mugabe has done a lot that has been extremely damaging. I was interested in the comments that President Mbeki made immediately after his press conference with the Prime Minister.

Last week, I was fortunate to be in Sierra Leone and I met President Kabbah, who happens to have trained here in law. He is a barrister who, at one stage, was a member of my chambers. I was interested to hear that he said candidly that the problem is seen in Africa as a legacy of colonialism. We see it as land being confiscated from farmers who have worked it up over a number of years. It was striking that somebody as reasonable and as moderate as President Kabbah should signal that for many African leaders it is seen as a key issue of land. There is still—it may seem unreasonable from our perspective—lingering support for what they see as a concern about sorting out a post-colonial issue. We must be sensitive to that. Shouting at South Africa for not doing enough will not necessarily solve the problem, although South Africans sometimes get confused between support for Zimbabwe and support for Mugabe, which are not necessarily the same thing.

Of course we must address the issues of governance and of HIV/AIDS, but we must accept that there are no simple answers. One of the problems of media attention suddenly focusing on an issue such as this is the belief that if only we did more of X or Y, everything would resolve itself.

I commend to hon. Members the evidence given to the Select Committee by academics from Wye college and agricultural experts from Oxfam. The witnesses made three points, the first of which was the complexity of risk in Africa. Farmers there take a much greater risk than those elsewhere. The second was the role of the state and liberalisation, which is a much more complicated matter.

My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) and I are natural one-nation Conservatives and we would always take the view that the state should do only what it absolutely has to. However, it seems from the objective evidence that we heard that such issues are much more complex in countries where the liberalisation of organisations such as state marketing departments has been of a kind, and at a pace, that has left many poor farmers bereft of support. The debate about seeds and fertilisers in Malawi, and about who encourages farmers, is extremely complex. It is not simply that DFID should have done more to provide seed packs, fertilisers and so on; we must look at the role of the state and of the organisations supporting individuals.

The witnesses' third point concerned the question why this issue is so difficult in Africa when parts of Asia have seen the best of the green revolution, and China and other countries are becoming much more self-sufficient in foodstuffs. Dr. Dorward of Wye college said that issues other than governance are involved; for example, climate, access to irrigation, population density, health problems and access to markets and to the sea. There are many interlocking issues.

It is crucial to continue to press the Government on these matters. There are no easy answers, and the UN agencies, the UK Government and the NGOs are doing their best to deal with a serious humanitarian crisis, which, in Zimbabwe and in the wider region, has not been helped by the Government of Zimbabwe. We still have to get to grips with the nature and scale of the crucial underlying problems. For example, how do we enable more farmers in Africa to grow and buy food for themselves so that they can be self-sufficient and not dependent on food aid? What can we do to tackle not just the immediate impact of HIV/AIDS but its longer-term consequences, when the families of people who are suffering from the disease are unable to look after them?

We must be sensitive about addressing some of the complex issues relating to agriculture in Africa. No one would suggest that there are simple answers, and that if we tick the right boxes or follow the right theorem all will be well; these issues will take a long time to resolve. However, I hope that the House will continue to take the closest possible interest in these matters, notwithstanding what is happening elsewhere in the world, because from a humanitarian point of view, if we are not advocates for the needs of people and their children in Africa, who will be?

4.34 pm

Mr. Tony Colman (Putney): It is a privilege to follow so many of my colleagues who have spoken with such authority. I do not intend to repeat what they said, but I agree with the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) about the need to deal with the GM foods debate, with my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Tony Worthington) about the need to develop good governance, and with the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) that the New Partnership for Africa's Development is the way in which that could be achieved. I also agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Luke) that agricultural mismanagement is the source of many of Africa's problems. Other areas were, of course, mentioned by hon. Members, but I wish to associate myself with those issues in particular.

I am pleased that the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry), the Chairman of the International Development Committee, on which I am proud to serve, has passed on to us the view of President Kabbah about land reform being an issue that is left over from the colonial era. I am proud of the work that I did in Kenya from 1964 to 1966, and it is amazing that the issue of land reform has been left to fester for so long since then. That does not excuse what is currently being done in Zimbabwe, but the world should have addressed the issue long ago.

I was unable to take part in the International Development Committee's visit to Malawi because of constituency duties, but in August, on my way to the world summit for sustainable development, to which I was a delegate from the Committee and the House, I was able to visit Zambia. My hosts were Dr. Guy Scott and his wife. I pay tribute to them for enabling me to meet a number of NGOs and representatives of the World Food Programme. I also pay tribute to the work done by the British high commissioner and the representatives of the Department for International Development to ensure that I understood fully the range of problems affecting that country. I had long discussions with the Minister of Agriculture there, who was concerned that we should not give up on Zambia. I assured him that we would not do so.

I made a second visit to Zambia in October with World Vision—the visit is noted in the Register of Members' Interests—to examine the issue of HIV/AIDS. I spent a memorable three days with the deputy Health Minister at the Chirundu stop—the lorry stop between Zambia and Zimbabwe. It is a hell-hole of about 1,000 vehicles waiting to cross the border. The stop is served by increasingly younger sex workers who are seeking cash to provide a living for their families.

I pay tribute to the work that World Vision is doing there and elsewhere in Africa to deal with the way in which truck drivers contribute to the spread of HIV/AIDS across southern Africa. The trucks and their drivers are needed, but it is crucial that the health aspects and the impact that they can have on the food crisis in southern Africa are addressed.

On resuming—

Mr. Colman: Travelling to Zambia on the excellent Kenya Airways, I flew in and out of Malawi and over the vast sheet of water that, as other hon. Members have said, covers some 20 per cent. of Malawi and could provide fresh water for irrigation. Flying in and out of Zimbabwe on the way to Zambia, I saw the dammed areas that are full of water and the potential that exists for irrigation. Issues of agricultural mismanagement come to mind in both those countries, but I have four points to make. They come from the Zambian visit, as I was unable to visit Malawi.

First, I believe that southern Africa, and Africa in general, could become the bread basket of the world and feed itself in the coming years. As my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East said, it is a puzzle, but there are ways forward. We need to return to the situation that I left in the 1960s, when I worked for the United Africa Company. There was a massive investment in agricultural extension workers and many of the subsistence farmers, and there was increased working with the various agricultural and veterinary colleges. Farming was seen as a premier industry that should be backed and have first call on the budgets of many of the countries of southern Africa. That starting point from the 1960s needs to be carried through to the 2000s. Some may say that those were colonial days, but Africanisation and empowerment ensured in Kenya that there was a transfer from ownership by European farmers to, in that case, Kikuyu farmers. An impressive productivity gain of about a hundredfold was recorded, and it is important to see how change can come. It is not impossible for Africa to become the bread basket of the world.

To kick-start that process, there needs to be strong support for commercial farming and farming for a surplus. The key role of DFID is in sustainable livelihoods and dealing with the poorest people in the poorest countries, and I do not want to change that, but benefiting commercial farmers will also benefit the poorest. Other hon. Members have talked about the need to build roads, and when the International Development Committee visited Ghana, we saw the tremendous advantages that were emerging for surplus farmers—those supplying local markets—through the 58 bridges that DFID had financed. I notice that, in opening the debate, the Minister focused on the need for functioning local markets, which is a starting point in developing food security. Local farmers must feel that it is worth planting a bit more because they can sell it along the road in the nearest market or large town, rather than feeling that they need produce only for their immediate family.

Another aspect of commercial farming is the external focus, and I was pleased that when I asked whether the UK supermarket chains should continue to purchase food from southern African countries that are in food crisis, all the NGOs that gave evidence to us said yes. I added the caveat in my question that it should be done within the ethical trading initiative, to ensure that benefit is felt by all parts of the supply chain from the village to our local supermarket shelf. Countries such as Zambia and Zimbabwe should feel the benefits of having the skills of agricultural input and training that are needed to supply Tesco or Sainsbury's—to choose two UK supermarkets at random.

I checked carefully to see that none of the green beans coming from Zimbabwe came from farms that had been seized illegally by the Mugabe regime. None did, and although the supply came from one such farm for one week, the contract was terminated. It is important that people know that a close watch is kept down the supply chain and the fact that the NGOs on the spot are pleased with how the ethical trading initiative, backed by the major supermarkets in this country, is working in the supply of vegetables and horticulture to the UK, the rest of Europe and the world. It is providing the tremendous fillip that is needed to put agriculture on a sound basis.

I pay tribute to the work that has been done by the Southern African Development Community and the Common Market for Eastern and Southern Africa, the trade organisation that works for Africa from Egypt down to, but not including, South Africa. COMESA has done a great deal to ensure that vegetables, flowers and many other products get to Europe and north America, and it has been negotiating with the Agriculture Secretary in Washington DC over the past two months to get access to north America for agricultural produce from southern Africa.

[Mr. Colman]

Thirdly, it is important that if there is a food crisis, the relief food that is purchased by, say, the WFP is bought locally in-country or in-region, if at all possible, and the Minister mentioned that. Certainly, James Morris, whom we interviewed, and Judith Lewis of the WFP—I pay tribute to both of them—would prefer to buy locally, but they do not have the cash, because not enough of their means is in money. The residuum is in food, and largely comes from north America.

5.9 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Colman: As I was saying, the key thing is that, if there is a food crisis, relief food should be bought locally. It was interesting to listen to members of the delegation from the Inter-Parliamentary Union branch here, which visited Ethiopia recently. Before hitting the drought areas, they drove through places with good crops and significant harvests. It would be much more advantageous for Ethiopia if the WFP purchased from areas of Ethiopia that have crops. Apparently, there was an excellent yield in Ethiopia the year before last, but hardly anyone harvested it—James Morris himself confirmed that. The problem arose because Ethiopia received the same amount of food aid that it would have received during a food crisis. It is important to work out a way forward. I visited Burkina Faso two years ago with directors of the World Food Programme for Burkina Faso. I said that there was no food crisis there, and they agreed, but they had contracts to deliver food aid there.

One of the good outcomes of the price in Zambia of genetically modified food was the search for food locally, in Tanzania—the hon. Member for Salisbury referred to that—and from elsewhere in southern Africa to supply Zambia. I understand that that was how Zimbabwe survived until recent weeks, when it had to call on significant WFP supplies. We must ensure that when there is a food crisis, food comes from other parts of the affected countries or from near countries.

My last point is perhaps the most important: there is a need for accurate data. We have all seen the recent correspondence in The Times. The original article by Michael Dynes appeared on 22 January and there was a response by Judith Lewis. A letter was published on Monday from Guy Scott, Zambia's Minister of Agriculture, Food and Fisheries between 1991 and 1993, and the host of my first visit there. I e-mailed him after reading his letter, and I have received, in the past 24 hours, a full report on food insecurity, HIV/AIDS and children, which he submitted with Charlotte Harland, his wife, to Family Health International on 21 January 2003. With his permission, I shall pass the report to the Secretary of State, the Minister, the WFP and the Food and Agriculture Organisation, because it is important that we learn the lessons of the situation in Zambia.

The e-mail says:

"We are complaining of hype, of exaggeration, of sensationalism by the UN agencies. Specifically we are complaining of the way a moderate food shortage"— that refers to Zambia, and nowhere else—

"has been hyped into a famine of (one might easily be led to believe) biblical proportions ... While we have a profoundly serious HIV/Aids problem in this country, and while we have been in the forefront of demands for practical action against it, we object to the way the virus is being hyped by some UN people as the basic cause of the alleged 'famine'. There are many problems with Zambian agriculture but a shortage of available labour resulting from Aids is not one of them (not yet anyway)."

The e-mail continues to address the link between the famine and AIDS by saying:

"Yes, there is a new theory about Southern Africa which goes by the name of 'New Variant Famine'. It holds that Aids is putting so much pressure, directly and indirectly, on the rural labour supply that famines arise more easily and recovery from them is difficult. We do not know what the situation is elsewhere in the region, but we doubt that Aids is a factor in our intermittent food shortages. The rate of HIV infection in Zambia's truly rural areas is not sufficiently high for 'New Variant' to occur. Yes, there are orphans coming in from the urban areas and there are adults coming home from town to die ... and this places demands on rural households, in terms of cash and labour. But the idea that there is virtually no labour available—" in Zambia, that is—

"for crop production is patently untrue. The surest evidence of this is the fact that the area planted to cotton, a very labour consuming crop, has been climbing by between 10 and 15 per cent. every year since 1992 and is continuing to climb."

Guy Scott goes on to criticise the World Bank, which apparently is not listening locally and has published an advertisement inviting tenders for the distribution of food security packs containing seed and fertiliser. The date of the advertisement was 4 January and the closing date for tender was 15 January. He says:

"Perhaps they are assuming that this season's weather will be imperfect, and that people will need early delivery of food security packs for planting next November! And don't forget, dear readers, that this money is a loan to Zambia. This crazy stuff increases our national debt."

His last point is that he believes that there is a tendency to overplay humanitarian crises and that is misguided:

"We appreciate that it is not always easy to excite the concern, and activate the pocketbooks, of Western governments or of old ladies in Cheltenham, but hype carries severe dangers. The greatest, obviously, is that people will come to recognise it as hype and will never believe you again, even about a true calamity. You should not cry wolf, as we say in Zambia."

He is a forthright man, and one needs to hear his words in those terms.

That is a voice from the south saying that we should make our enumeration and our checking better next time round. Guy Scott was one of those who sat under the tree with me for hour after hour when we met last August, worried about the millions he thought would die in Zambia. His view is important. The whole text is much longer, and I have passed it to the Minister.

On 4 February, I was reading the Morning Star and I saw:

"Zambia will offer thousands of hectares of free farmland in a bid to end persistent food shortages and encourage agricultural exports ... Only 2.7 million hectares of Zambia's 18.2 million hectares of arable land is utilised. With five rivers and a high water table, Zambia is a prime target for irrigation farming."

I do not say that anything that has been said by anybody else is wrong, but it is interesting that a voice from the south wants us to think again. The fact that he wanted me to make those points in the debate makes it important to listen to them.

Where do we go from here? I was honoured to attend the world food summit last June, and it is interesting that ours is the one embassy that reports to its country's international development Ministry. All the others report to agriculture. The Food and Agriculture Organisation's ambassador reports to DFID for pay and rations, but all the others do not—they go to agricultural ministries. Ours was the one country pushing the concept not just of food security, but of developing agriculture. We must remember that we have two White Papers on the go at the same time. They are different but interlinked, so if we go for food security, we should not forget about developing agriculture.

We have a global compact with the United Nations, which seems to deal with manufactured goods. Can we please have a global compact with the UN for food importers? It would be easy to run, and I can see the Secretary of State hosting it within the next month or so. We really could create a situation that allowed the matter to go right to the top of the agenda.

Finally, my father was a member of the National Union of Agricultural Workers. It is an honourable role for people in developing countries as well as developed ones to be agricultural workers in a commercial establishment, so long as they receive a good cash wage—my father did not, but we now have the minimum wage under a Labour Government. It is important to recognise that commercial farming can take families out of poverty in developing countries, rather than leaving them scratching a living on land that might be unusable for sustainable agriculture.

5.19 pm

Mr. Key: With the leave of the House, may I say that I have featured only twice in the Morning Star and I cannot claim to be a regular reader of it? On the first occasion, I was shown in a photograph at the head of an anti-racism march in Camden, in about 1978, when I was fighting the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) for his seat, which he held. On the second occasion, I had penetrated the old headquarters of the African National Congress in Lusaka at the invitation of its representatives. I went through the steel doors at the end of a somewhat intimidating concrete-walled lane, the gates were flung open and a photographer popped out from behind a pillar and said that he was from the Morning Star. However, I digress—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Edward O'Hara): Order. I was beginning to wonder when we would be getting to the point.

Mr. Key: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This has been an excellent debate, which has illustrated that Members of Parliament in Britain are engaged with the issues; it is important that people know that. The hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Tony Worthington) made an impassioned plea for better government and talked about the contribution made to the problem by human inadequacy.

Only a few weeks ago, I thought of the somewhat absurd situation in my constituency. If we measured the amount of assistance for development that is available in our constituencies against what is available in southern Africa, we would blush. My constituency is fortunate because it has the second lowest unemployment rate in the country, 0.3 per cent. One person unemployed is too many, but approximately 400 people are unemployed in my constituency out of a total of 103,000. In spite of that, and our hugely diverse and prosperous economy, it turns out that, in my county alone, there are about 249 economic specialists and advisers in seven organisations, ranging from the county council to Business Link, which advises businesses on how to become even more prosperous.

By contrast, I understand that, in Angola, one official is seconded from, I think, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, to negotiate 17 international treaties on behalf of that nation. That puts things into perspective, and I agree with what the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie said not only about that but about reproductive health issues. I would only add that I wonder how long it will be before the European Union aid programme is subverted by MEPs who oppose the inclusion of reproductive health care components in the EU budget.

Certain groups are very active on that issue; they are largely from the United States, which is opposed to those components of public spending. As the hon. Gentleman well knows, a delegation from our all-party group went to China. One of the members of the delegation was my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh). He was deeply sceptical before he went, but when he got back, he said that there was absolutely no evidence of the United Nations Family Planning Association engaging in any coercive action in China with regard to abortion or anything else. We must acknowledge that there are some unhelpful forces at work out there.

I very much enjoyed the speech of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett). He was right to concentrate on issues such as the dumping of surpluses, market access and questions of trade. To inject a note of optimism, I point out that one thing that we could offer, but which we have not developed as fully as we might, is distance learning and use of the internet. I shall not mention my website, which the hon. Member for Putney (Mr. Colman) always teases me about. Not only are there educational benefits to be gained from the worldwide application of the internet; there are secondary benefits, because the internet promotes political stability and is a weapon against corrupt government. It improves transparency and is a weapon against despotism and tyranny because it enables people to know the truth. They do not have to huddle around a crystal set or a portable wireless; they can have the world at their fingertips if they are allowed access to the internet.

I was also very impressed by the speech of the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Luke), whose sense of history, mission and commitment shone through. That is very important. In the rough and tumble of this place we forget that there is massive commitment by communities in our constituencies the length and breadth of the country. It is often based on a Christian tradition but other faiths also have the tradition of duty to the rest of the world. I salute the hon. Gentleman.

[Mr. Key]

My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) also talked about the importance of education. Two Fridays ago I was in Shrewton, a little village on the edge of Salisbury plain. I visited, as I regularly do, the Church of England primary school where on Friday mornings they have an enrichment class for the senior children. The enlightened teacher who looks after them, Hilary Storer, had been a global teacher and done an exchange with a primary school in South Africa.

The school is building on that; it hopes to receive exchange teachers, and the children are engaged with those in the South African school. We had a very sophisticated discussion for an hour and 20 minutes about issues such as water, poverty, food, and government and democracy, all of which they are covering in their key stages now. That is a huge hope for the future. When I say that our country is engaged on the issue, I mean that it is engaged in the long term as well.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Putney on his stamina in sustaining the quality of his argument through our many Divisions. He rounded things up very nicely by ending with a reference to a real person, with a real point of view from southern Africa, who wants us to listen. This debate has been not just about lecturing, but about listening. I hope that the Minister will respond in the positive spirit in which we have contributed to the debate.

5.29 pm

Ms Keeble: With the leave of the House, I shall respond to this informed and thoughtful debate. As I said in my opening remarks, I welcome the chance to set out the current position. I also said that I wanted to consider some strategic issues. I particularly welcome the fact that Members did not simply focus on the short term, but looked at the longer-term issues and made thoughtful, well argued points. I shall pick on three points that were highlighted and respond to them—before there is a vote in the House, I hope.

First, obviously the conditions for the poor people in southern Africa have been quite desperate over the past 12 months. A number of hon. Members talked movingly about that. The hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) described what he saw and the people he spoke to in Ethiopia. There have obviously been widespread food shortages, increased disease and a great deal of uncertainty for many people about their very survival.

I take the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Colman) made about HIV/AIDS. Clearly, poor nutrition has contributed to the rise in mortality rates for AIDS and other diseases. There is a complex syndrome there. Many people have had to take desperate measures to survive. Indeed, as many hon. Members have highlighted, the position has been made worse for many because of the poor governance and the politically motivated distortion of food distribution.

Secondly, the international community, with the UK playing a leading part, has responded effectively to the complex crisis, and we have learned profound lessons in the process. The UN has established a regional team, bringing all the relevant agencies together to provide the leadership that we look for in such crises.

The UK has made an important funding contribution to that and has also supported the co-ordination machinery. The British public can take real pride in the work that has been done on their behalf, although we must be careful not to become complacent as there are still serious, long-term challenges that those involved in development must face. One of them is Zimbabwe, where the situation is very bad and likely to get worse. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has frequently outlined her genuine concerns about what is happening there. The numbers in need of assistance are increasing, and its problems are caused not by climate, but by politics and by appalling economic mismanagement.

Thirdly, Members highlighted the fact that the crisis has not occurred in isolation. There have been droughts in the past and there will, sadly, be droughts in the future, but there is something different about this crisis, because southern Africa should be able to cope with variations in rainfall. That has not happened this time, and there are signs that food insecurity is a growing problem. HIV/AIDS is an important factor, as it is a cause of much of the hardship and the reason that the suffering is so severe.

Falling income adds to the problems of the region. Many Members mentioned the lack of alternatives to subsistence agriculture and the real difficulties in agriculture. Another worrying factor, which was raised by the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) in particular, is that although food aid is necessary in the short term, it has long-term repercussions as it damages local markets and removes the incentives for local farmers.

The hon. Gentleman raised several other issues, among them water. The Department has played a substantial role in providing developing countries with a safe, clean water supply. He highlighted investment, and it is true that the sector-specific spending on water does not appear massive—£82 million to £91 million to £87 million now—but that does not include the budget support for water, which will be substantial. It is, however, difficult to disaggregate it from the support that we give to the budgets of such countries.

Much of our spending goes precisely into what the hon. Gentleman supports—education and water management, not infrastructure development, which is often done by other agencies. I have seen some work that our grant to WaterAid has enabled it to do in Bangladesh. An important part of that work was to establish an education programme to help people to manage their new water supply and to discuss water-related and health-related issues.

However, I take issue with the hon. Gentleman on one matter: deaths from water-borne diseases are not necessarily associated with water shortages. What happens to the water supply determines what happens to children's health. He also pointed out that many of the illnesses are preventable and that there is a real need to tackle that.

The hon. Gentleman also raised the issue of genetically modified food, which was a complicating factor in Zambia. We have been through the issues quite a few times. The international community was absolutely right to say that the decision had to be for the national Government, but the repercussions have been huge and it is extremely regrettable that some countries were not prepared to accept the milled food, as that would have dealt with the issues raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Putney.

One of the issues that has not been discussed before is that there was a problem in the Zambian scientists' report, which did not distinguish properly between the wider concerns posed by GM technology and the immediate question whether it would damage people if it were introduced to meet the food shortages. It seems that there was never a proper analysis and discussion of the different kinds of risk, and that they talked about environmental rather than health risks. I understand that it has been possible to source some food from non-GM products, but that has been a major problem.

The hon. Member for Salisbury also talked about what happens to the prices of food as a result of food aid. As I mentioned previously, we would certainly agree that that is a problem. It appears that there is now more awareness and concern in the international community about that unintended consequence of food aid and about the need to resolve it.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the International Monetary Fund and the price of wheat—there is no truth in the suggestion that has been made, and he and his hon. Friends have heard a rebuttal from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on several occasions. It is extremely damaging that that rumour has got about, because it has misled people about the nature of the wider debate, what is happening in Malawi and the role of the IMF. He then talked about debt relief and Zambia—

Mr. Key: Privatisation.

Ms Keeble: I thought that the hon. Gentleman talked about debt. It is not true that the IMF is denying debt relief. The heavily indebted poor countries agreement for Zambia includes conditions on economic reform that the Zambian Government have yet to meet, but we hope that they will do so soon. As he knows, terms are attached to the conditions of aid or relief in relation to a number of measures, and the current situation relates to those.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned Zimbabwe and asked what pressure is being put on Robert Mugabe. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that we have not had direct discussions about food aid, but when the executive director of the World Food Programme met Mugabe in Harare recently during a regional tour, he stressed the seriousness of the humanitarian crisis and the need for the Government to ensure that the food distribution is not biased. The WFP has put the case clearly.

My hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Tony Worthington) set out clearly some big issues concerning development and, in particular, problems facing Africa, including governance, the need for transparency in payments, the massive problems relating to the lack of domestic investment and the fact that so much African capital is invested outside the continent. He highlighted the twin problems of the financial and political economies, which need massive restructuring. Sometimes, I think that the financial economy will be restructured long before the political. It seems that there are fewer levers for dealing with the political systems.

When considering all the difficulties of Africa, it is possible to miss areas of hope—for example, South Africa's management of the macro-economy and the role that it has played in terms of political leadership in southern Africa. South Africa has also played its part in respect of Mozambique, which has made considerable progress since liberation, and in respect of the glimmerings of a settlement and hope in Angola after nearly 30 years of the most desperate civil war. We need to consider the positives in Africa, as well as recognising its serious problems.

The hon. Member for Salisbury rightly highlighted the problems of reproductive health and the importance of ensuring that we have a sound international policy framework to deal with that issue. He also mentioned the pressures that could be imposed if we restrict options due to views on sex education, abortion services or family planning. I share his views on that, because if the countries concerned are to be able to overcome the profound difficulties involved with people dying of HIV/AIDS and the associated problems of infant and maternal mortality, they must have a full range of services at their disposal. They cannot be subject to limits set by people on the other side of the world and in very different circumstances.

The hon. Gentleman also raised the issue in respect of European Union spending. The EU picked up the tabs left by the United States when it cut off funding to the United Nations Family Planning Association. The amounts were substantial and the EU, where movement can be glacial, acted quickly. The views of the development Commissioner and the development directorate-general are extremely clear—they were most supportive to the UNFPA in taking forward its programme and they, too, believe that it is important for people to have a range of options.

Mr. Key: I am not casting aspersions on the Commission, as the Parliament is the problem. If it starts flexing its muscles in this area, there could be difficulties.

Ms Keeble: I also recognise the problems that the hon. Gentleman describes, because although many MEPs have a big commitment to development issues and share our views, some do not agree with us and they met delegates from the United States recently to talk about the issue.

I have a feeling that the hon. Gentleman has more access to those MEPs than I do, so perhaps he could use his influence to persuade them on the subject. I am grateful to him for raising the matter, as it is important that people understand that lobbying and discussion go on in private. All that should be out in the open so that people can take part in the debate. I am sure that the vast majority of people in this country and in Europe agree with us on the matter.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) spoke a great deal about political will in relation to funding, and he is right. That is why the Government have increased the amount of money going into the developing world and why the Chancellor has made proposals for the international financing facility to provide upfront the volume of money needed to implement the millennium development goals.

[Ms Keeble]

However, many key issues that Members mentioned involve not just money, but will—in this country, the international community and the developing countries. Conflict has cost Africa 2 per cent. in growth, and issues such as trade, agricultural reform and HIV/AIDS, which is linked to behaviour change, are tackled by having the will to provide the right policies and a regulatory framework to make it possible to overcome the legacy of Africa's problems. That is why cross-party engagement and the engagement of this country and the international community are so important.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned, at considerable length, the problems of Zimbabwe and the shock of that country being unable to feed itself. I have lived in southern Africa, and I find that almost impossible to believe. He pointed to the lack of a distribution system for drugs and other things, which is why the Department for International Development takes such a strong systems-based approach. There is no point in providing Africa with goods, be they medicine, food and so on, if there is no distribution system.

The hon. Gentleman and other Members mentioned the importance of market access. My hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Luke) made a thoughtful and informed contribution, as he spent a great deal of time reading the evidence presented to the Select Committee to prepare for the debate. He welcomed the establishment of the all-party Africa group, as do I. It will provide a forum for discussing and advancing many issues that we have discussed.

My hon. Friend also highlighted the need to find long-term solutions, especially in Malawi and Zambia, to the problems faced by the agriculture sector. He spoke at length about the damage in Zimbabwe. One thing struck me as he was speaking about what is happening there: the sobering realisation of the impact of bad governance on a country.

For example, Uganda, the pearl of Africa, is only just starting to return to how it was before Idi Amin's regime. It missed out on an era of development, as did Angola, because of conflict. I have no doubt that the recovery from what is happening in Zimbabwe will also take a long time and cost the people of Zimbabwe dear. My hon. Friend's contribution emphasised the damage that one person or one regime can do to an economy and an entire people.

The hon. Member for Banbury obviously spoke from his enormous experience and knowledge, especially about things he saw in Ethiopia. He picked out particular themes. One was the problem caused by the change of family structures brought about by HIV/AIDS and the stripping out of the middle age band. Another was the problem of governance. He rightly said that we should be advocates for Africa and that the international community has a role to play.

My hon. Friend the Member for Putney also spoke with a great deal of knowledge, especially about his visit to see World Vision work at the truck stop between Zambia and Zimbabwe. The work being done there is an example of what is possible when care is put into finding out how HIV/AIDS is spread and what interventions are needed to prevent that. It shows how it is possible to get behaviour change from people, even when one might not expect it.

My hon. Friend spoke about the role of southern Africa as the bread basket of the world, which was emphasised by many Members, and stressed the importance of social responsibility in investment and development, the development of local markets and local sourcing of relief food supplies, which was also mentioned by several Members when we discussed the disastrous impact that food aid can have. Although it meets a short-term need, it destroys long-term gains.

My hon. Friend also stressed the need for accurate data. If he provides the document he mentioned, we will give it careful thought and give him a considered response. He is right about the need for accuracy. Clearly, there is a problem if famines are hyped, but the complexity of the difficulties that southern Africa faces means that, without a lot of international effort in examining other issues as well as providing food, the situation could have been even worse. I will ensure that he gets a considered response to his point.

Mr. Colman: Will the Minister also respond to my point about the supermarket chains continuing to buy from countries such as Zambia and Zimbabwe and helping those economies to develop their farming base, which is good for them in the long term?

Ms Keeble: Yes, indeed. One of the interesting pieces of work undertaken by my Department is an examination of supermarket sourcing of food in Ethiopia as part of providing sustainable agriculture in that country. The Government will continue to work with the countries in the region, the UN, other donors and the agencies operating on the ground in the short term to ensure that food and other supplies continue to be delivered to those in need.

We very much welcome the efforts that have been made to prevent large-scale death in the region. Although we expect that operations can be scaled down in April in most places, Zimbabwe will continue to need massive amounts of aid. We need to consider the longer term, in which we will work with others to reverse the downward trend in food security in the region. That means improving agricultural techniques, as several Members said, as well as tackling HIV/AIDS, reforming Government policies and reviewing our systems for providing food aid.

Those issues are important in themselves, but they are also absolutely key to the international community's aims of achieving the millennium development goals by 2015 and reducing poverty, as most issues that we have talked about are poverty related. We must deal with them if we are to end the poverty from which so many people in Africa suffer, as they are some of the really big problems for the development community. Solving them is vital for the region and the rest of Africa.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at nine minutes to Six o'clock.

Congestion Charging

[Relevant document: First Report from the Transport Committee on Urban Charging Schemes, HC 390–I]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Derek Twigg.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Nicholas Winterton): I call Mr. Mark Field, who has arrived in the Chamber in the nick of time.

9.30 am

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster): I have hot-footed it from the Upper Committee Corridor, you will be glad to know, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

It may not surprise the Minister that, in securing this debate on congestion charging, I have elected as a central London Member to focus on the practical application rather than simply on the general principles. However, I am aware that the Chairman of the Select Committee on Transport is present, and no doubt she will wish to address the issues that go beyond central London.

There is no doubt that the clock is ticking. There are now six days to go until Ken's car tax turns London's already congested roads into utter chaos. Opposition Members have warned and warned again that this ideologically motivated assault on the freedom that comes with the ownership of a private car is being rushed through with woefully inadequate technology. I hold responsible not only Ken Livingstone and his absurd crew of sidekicks at Transport for London, but the Labour Government.

It is not good enough for the Prime Minister simply to wash his hands of the matter, as he did at Prime Minister's Question Time only last week. The new tax is a gross betrayal of the people of London by those who now think that they are capable of hosting the Olympic games. As the Member of Parliament most directly affected, I have had a huge mailbag in the past 18 months since the programme came on stream.

As the Prime Minister pointed out at Prime Minister's Question Time last week, congestion charging may well be part of devolved power, but, unlike this Government, whose Ministers will continue to use their chauffeur-driven cars and be exempt from the tax, I do not consider that our approach should be, "I'm all right, Jack." Residents in my constituency are appalled at the misleading claims of a 90 per cent. discount for those who live in the zone; angered by the discourteous and unprofessional service of Transport for London; and bemused by the amateurishness of the registration process. I understand that only last week Transport for London had to add 300 staff to the 500 in its call centre. They have been drafted in very much at the last minute.

The devolved government argument adopted by the Government seems to be flawed on two main grounds. First and foremost is the Treasury's refusal properly to fund London. I have said in a number of debates in the House on the underground and a range of devolved issues that I have some sympathy with Ken Livingstone, the Mayor of London, on that limited point. He is desperate to have ring-fenced funds. That is one reason why he is pushing ahead with the congestion charge.

When Ken Livingstone was elected almost three years ago, his manifesto made it clear that congestion charging would be brought in only after there had been measurable improvements in public transport. Now, even by the Mayor's admission—all 7 million people living in London would vouch for this—the London underground will require at least a decade of sustained investment before standards reach even a satisfactory level. That was clear before the Central line shut down. It has become apparent this morning that the Central line will not open until well after the 17 February start date for the congestion charge.

The argument is made about buses. Anyone who has used buses over the past couple of years will admit that there have been improvements. There is no doubt about that, and those improvements are to the Mayor's credit. However, the notion that a small increase in the number of buses will relieve our roads of the enormous congestion is clearly nonsense. That is only a small part of the answer.

Deliberate sabotage by Transport for London seems to have led to an 18 per cent. reduction in the number of private motor cars on London's roads over the past two years, yet congestion has got worse. Indeed, the raison d'être for the congestion charge is a further 15 to 20 per cent. reduction. Where will all the commuters, tourists and residents go? If the Minister had recently used the tube, he would realise that there is no capacity, not only in rush hour but through much of the day. I first suggested as long ago as autumn 2001 that the narrowing of bus lanes and altered sequencing of traffic lights was a deliberate attempt to justify the need for the car tax that is now upon us. That was vehemently denied at the time by the Mayor and Transport for London. They now admit that I was right all along. I still reckon that those measures will be reversed after 17 February and used to spin the notion that the new tax is a success.

The experiment is a test case for the principle of road charging in this country, yet, amazingly, no system is in place to measure its effectiveness in cutting congestion. The Mayor of London and Transport for London assure us that they have their own criteria on which to judge its success. Clearly that is important, because if we are to consider congestion charging beyond central London, we must know whether this big experiment is a success. Unbelievably for such a keen advocate of open government as Mr. Livingstone has been throughout his career, the guidelines for the success of the congestion charge are being kept secret.

I recognise the excellent work of my local authority, Westminster city council, and in particular the leader and deputy leader, Simon Milton and Kit Malthouse, who have highlighted five main tests for approval of the congestion charge. I am not sure where I have heard the idea of five tests before, but they will be readily quantifiable. We will not have to wait till June. I suspect that it will be only a matter of weeks before we can determine whether the tests are satisfied.

Mr. Gareth Thomas (Harrow, West): The hon. Gentleman has made it clear that he is opposed to the principle of the congestion tax. What is his alternative to tackling London's congestion problems?

Mr. Field: I am opposed to this congestion charge being rushed in now. Having been in business, I approve of market solutions, so I do not rule out a congestion charge as the right solution. However, this charge, which is being rushed through before there has been any improvement in the public transport system—indeed the tube will get worse over the next 10 years—is the wrong way forward. As the hon. Gentleman says, congestion is a problem. Although the changes that Transport for London has implemented over the past two years have resulted in a reduction in the number of cars on the road, congestion has become ever worse. There are no easy solutions, but this charge is not the right way forward, not least because of the way in which it penalises some of the worst off.

There is no doubt that I have a considerable number of relatively wealthy constituents who will grin and bear it and pay their £5 a day, but the people for whom I have most regard are the relatively poor. Only yesterday I was at Knightsbridge barracks, where I met a young mother who was quite desperate. She has two young children; one is at school in the zone and one is at school outside it. There is no way that she cannot use a private car. A charge of £25 a week will blow an enormous hole in her disposable budget. No one seems to be taking any notice of concerns of that kind. Although we must ensure that there is less congestion on our roads, the charge is simply an ideological attack: it is being rushed through at the wrong time and in the wrong way.

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington): I want to encourage the hon. Gentleman to speculate. If now is not the right time to introduce the charge, when does he think would be?

Mr. Field: I am with Professor Galbraith on that. Speculation is always a bad idea: one never knows what will happen. I am looking at the here and now. We must consider the problem that will beset Londoners in six days. That is what concerns me above all. There is no doubt that the tax is precisely the wrong way forward.

I was addressing some of the issues raised by Westminster city council's five tests. The council considers that cutting congestion is one of the most important tests. By that I mean—I am sure that it means this, too—congestion not just in the central zone but in the area around, much of which is also in my constituency. If the result of the tax is simply to displace traffic, it will have failed. The Mayor reckons that the deterioration in the life of those living around the boundary of the central zone will be a price worth paying, but they will suffer the double whammy of no discount and increased traffic. Again, the tax will have failed if there is increased rat-running and destruction of quiet in residential streets around the main central zone.

The third test is cost of living. A number of small businesses inside the zone will not only lose passing trade if the charge is successful in reducing day-to-day traffic by 20 per cent.; they will, indirectly, have to fund the cost of deliveries. According to a number of head teachers to whom I have spoken during the past six to nine months, teachers may have to use their motor cars to get into central London. There is therefore great worry about recruitment and retention of teachers in central London at an already difficult time.

The fourth test concerns the overcrowded tube, to which I have already referred. Will the tube be able to cope? Next week, when the Central line will still be down, we shall see ongoing problems. Even with a fully working Central line there is a question mark over whether the current underground and train system can cope with the increased traffic for which it is supposed to cater when people leave their motor cars and take public transport. If the tube and railways become a lot worse, there is little doubt that the tax will have failed.

Finally, I hope to see tangible evidence that the car tax will generate sufficient income to pay for the new transport schemes promised. Many of us appreciate that part of the raison d'être for the tax—this is one of the points on which I symapthise with the Mayor—is to use the £130 million or so raised annually to secure Crossrail and other transport projects. That is admirable in many ways, but we must keep an eye on precisely what is happening. Our great worry is that not only will the £130 million be a fantasy—net income may end up being considerably less—but that much of the sum raised will be squirreled away for other projects and the large infrastructure projects that we all want will not occur.

We shall no doubt hear more about the Olympic bid in the next 48 hours, but it is interesting that there has already been an attempt by the International Olympic Committee to decouple its bid from Crossrail. The great worry is that Crossrail will somehow fall through the middle because, on one hand, there will be insufficient funds from the Mayor and the congestion tax, and on the other, Crossrail will not be part and parcel of an Olympic bid.

I am also concerned about the prospect of civil disobedience in central London. I want to make it absolutely clear that, as a Member of Parliament, I do not support civil disobedience and people who break the law. However, one must contrast the actions of Mayor Livingstone today, who is a hardline, no-nonsense tax collector, with those 12 or 13 years ago when the community charge or poll tax came in and he was fined £600 for non-payment. How will he have the authority to uphold a law with which so many of his constituents disagree so vehemently? My own view is that an untried, untested and unready technology is likely to bring the scheme down. I suspect that many people will not be forced to pay, and there is a risk that the experiment will collapse in ridicule, which will make a great difference to any future schemes in other parts of the Untied Kingdom.

I appreciate that other hon. Members want to speak, so in conclusion I look to the Minister to answer a few questions today. I want to hear what he has to say to elderly folk who live within the zone in my constituency, many of whom will be unable to have so many visits from relatives and carers because the use of a private motor car will simply not be affordable and, for reasons of infirmity, they might not be able easily to use public transport. What will he say to small business people in my constituency whose heads are barely above water owing to the difficulties in London and the south-east during the past year or two? What will he say to representatives of some of London's key bigger tourist industries—those industries are already depressed as a result of BSE during 2000 and 2001 and 11 September 2001—many of whom feel that the tax will have a devastating effect?

The Minister, on behalf of the Government, cannot simply say that congestion charging is a matter for local government to decide and that it is devolved government. In central London, we are not talking about a small parish council; we are dealing with the most important commercial centre in our entire nation. We all know that if London catches a cold, it applies to the whole country within a matter of months and certainly years. I end this speech with great sadness because a nightmare is about to befall the city that I represent and love. The Government must take a share of the blame.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the next speaker I remind the Chamber that the Select Committee on Transport's first report of this Session on urban charging schemes, which was published on Sunday 9 February, is relevant to the debate. With the permission of the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field), it has been tagged on to this Adjournment debate, as is clear from the Order Paper. A number of Members want to speak; with self-discipline, I am sure that all of them will be able to do so.

9.46 am

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): I am grateful for the opportunity to discuss the Select Committee's report on congestion charging and I am grateful to the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster for raising the subject. As he made clear, the matter is of considerable importance to us all. In a capital city, the movement of goods and people is fundamental to the way in which the economy operates. Any attempt to deal with the enormous problems of traffic movement must be of concern not only to the Government, but to the people who are involved.

The other Committee members and I decided that we would not debate in principle the right to apply congestion charging to an urban situation, because the principle had already been conceded by Parliament in the Transport Act 2000, in which it was agreed that, since we were obviously going to have to plan the movement of traffic, congestion charging was one way forward. However, we thought that we should consider in detail the scheme that was being proposed, because we were aware that certain difficulties had arisen. The report highlights not just the advantages, but some of the disadvantages. That is important.

The advantages to a congestion charging scheme are obvious. If traffic continues to grow at the present rate, we will not have to debate whether congestion charging is the alternative because, frankly, the entire city will simply grind to a halt. That already happens on occasions—one can see what happens to the movement of traffic above ground if there is a problem on the London underground. If the city ground to a halt, it would have a direct effect not only on businesses, but on the quality of Londoners' lives.

We know that we will have to face up to the problem of more and more people trying to work and live in a congested space, but there were things about the London scheme that worried the Committee. The fundamental worry was whether the Mayor had properly organised the scheme. Were the lines in the right place? Was the equipment efficient? Would it work? Would it be capable of doing the task for which it was employed? Above all, would we be able to explain to the public why such schemes are essential?

There were other things that worried us. For example, we were not at all clear whether the indicators currently used to measure congestion, which may be all right for national policy modelling, were any good at all in demonstrating the problem of congestion in urban areas. Anybody who listens to drive-time radio can say where the congestion points are, yet there do not seem to be a set of indicators that we can all use as a basis for transport planning.

Committee members were very clear that the scheme could contribute enormous amounts of money to improving transport systems, and the Mayor should have access to that revenue stream. However, we were also convinced more than 10 years would be needed. We could not understand why the Government are not taking the lead by saying that if the trial scheme works, those responsible for the 20 others that we have calculated will be necessary during the 10-year transport plan can learn from what happens and improve the operation of their schemes.

The Mayor's suggestion that one can run the scheme for two months and then decide whether it is a failure seemed to us not only unrealistic, but rather petulant. That is not the way to proceed. The assessment will take much longer than that. We were pleased that the Mayor said that he would allow an independent scrutiny body to review the scheme—that is absolutely essential. We must judge whether the scheme does what it is supposed to do and whether it offers lessons for the future.

Many of the likely difficulties will, no doubt, arise at the commencement of the scheme. Contractors are responsible not only for putting the number plate recognition system into operation, but for the way in which people will pay the charges and access information. If those arrangements work efficiently, it will very soon become clear whether the scheme is producing a result.

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall): My hon. Friend mentions contractors. Is she aware of how everyone in Lambeth feels about contractors? Capita absolutely ruined the housing benefit system in Lambeth and its contract was eventually terminated. Many people in my borough cannot understand why that failed operator, which seems to fail at everything it does, has been given the job of congestion charging.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I would not disagree with that point of view. Frankly, if the company fails in this scheme, I do not how much longer it will be able to continue in business. There is a limit to the tolerance that even the British are prepared to extend to people who are not capable of doing the jobs for which they are paid vast amounts of money.

The contractor that operates the automatic number plate recognition system must be able to build up a robust database that matches the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency database so that information is accurate. Nothing would destroy the scheme more quickly than large numbers of people being charged for journeys that they have not taken, or people successfully avoiding the system and messing it up in different ways. An accurate database is an essential precondition for efficient working.

The Government should give a very clear lead on their attitude towards congestion charging, but they are standing back. It appears that they are prepared to let whatever happens remain the responsibility of London's elected representatives. I have spent some 30 years having good fights with the Mayor, and I remind every taxi driver to whom I speak to that I did not vote for him—he is aware of the fact that I did not vote for him. However, in fairness, it is not only what happens to him that should be of importance, but whether the scheme works and whether the various alternative schemes that have been suggested would, in fact, work better.

It is vital that additional capital and revenue funding are made available to local authorities through local transport plan settlements. That is the only way in which they will be able to address the problems with the alternative services that must be put in place. Furthermore, electronic charging standards must be developed. What happens in London will determine what happens in many parts of the United Kingdom. If we get the standards right, the benefit will be felt by all.

I do not wish to take too much time in this debate, so I shall make just a few further points. Before the 1997 election, when it had a Conservative Chairman, the Select Committee considered congestion charging in other nations, many of which not only operate successful schemes, but do not experience the trauma and difficulties that we envisage. I shall not pretend that the population will enjoy being charged for the use of road space, but they will see positive benefits when the money is put into transport schemes. Many businesses benefit from such planning, because people are more able to visit those businesses when they are able to move more freely. They understand that that is possible only because of a form of controlled traffic movement.

However, the Committee made it plain that it was worried about the scheme. We highlighted the fact that there may be immediate problems for low-paid workers because of the way in which the lines had been drawn within the inner ring road. It is not a secret that many of the services provided to areas the north of the river come from people who live to the south, many of whom use cars because of the unsocial hours that they work or the difficulties that they have getting to and from their employment. Their cars may be very old or inadequate, but they need to use some form of transport.

We were concerned that it would be disastrous if the scheme acted as a deterrent to public service workers or teachers working in inner-city schools. The cost to the community as a whole would be extremely high. We look to the Mayor to produce an immediate and flexible response to those difficulties as soon as they become plain, and to respond in the best way possible either by having differential schemes of charging, or by considering some other way of compensating those who are desperately needed to run our cities. We took evidence from my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey), who not only highlighted those problems, but made it plain that she thought that they would exist from day one.

I return to the matter that worried the Committee most, which was that the Government, having put the machinery in place, seemed to be standing back and saying to London, "Get on with it." I think that leadership in transport matters is tremendously important. It amuses me to see how transport schemes become ideological or non-ideological depending on what people happen to believe at the time. If they agree with a scheme, it is non-ideological; if they disagree with it, it is a barmy idea that no one should have had in the first place.

The London scheme may be a very brave attempt to face up to a real problem. We are not able to move around in our capital city in a way that makes our lives more pleasant and productive. The Committee has produced a report that should be taken seriously, not only by the Mayor but—I say this with the greatest respect—by Her Majesty's Government. That is not always the case with Transport Committee reports. Nevertheless, I commend the report because I think that Londoners deserve high-quality, day-to-day management of their lives. They suffer the disadvantages of being in a crowded, urban environment, and they should have the right to ask of those who plan their transport systems that their real needs be taken into account.

9.58 am

Angela Watkinson (Upminster): I should like to confine my remarks to what I perceive to be the purpose of the scheme. I submit that it has nothing whatever to do with traffic congestion. There can be no doubt that traffic in London is congested, but let us consider it in the grand scheme of things. If one were to go to Cairo or Tehran—or, a bit nearer home, to Rome or Paris—one would see real traffic congestion.

The scheme is simply a tax on drivers and driving. People do not drive in London just to annoy Ken Livingstone; they do it because it is necessary, and because they have no choice. They work unsocial hours, do shift work, or have to carry equipment with them. There are all sorts of reasons why people have to undertake all the component parts of their lives in the time available to them. The use of a car is necessary for them.

People also use cars because they want to. Some prefer to use a private car rather than public transport, and I defend their freedom to do so. The attractions of private transport are obvious. For a start, people can travel from door to door—from their own home to their destination. Private transport is clean, or as clean as an individual cares to make it, and safe. The safety of the vehicle is the responsibility of the owner. Driving in privacy means that one is safe from possible dangers from other passengers on public transport. I have met such dangers several times.

People driving are safe from the weather, can carry goods and can travel at unsocial hours, as do so many these days. Many such people are on modest incomes, such as postmen, who have to get up at an unearthly hour of the morning—I understand that 4.30 am is not unusual. Other people whose jobs require them to get up very early in the morning include cleaners, hospital workers, firefighters and police. The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), the Chairman of the Transport Committee, spoke about the possibility of differential payments, and I defer to her great depth of knowledge on transport matters. There could be so many exemptions that a system that takes them into consideration would have to be administratively very complex, and I wonder how on earth it could work.

The first great purchase of any young person once they have an income is their car. It gives great freedom. I defend the freedom to be able to travel.

Tom Brake: Does the hon. Lady not agree that the poorest people—I presume that she wants to represent them as well—do not tend to own cars, so are most likely to benefit from the scheme that Ken is introducing?

Angela Watkinson: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman raised that point, because I was just coming to it. I disagree totally that poor people do not own cars. Poor people often rely on their cars to a great extent. They are often old cars because those people do not have the capital investment to buy reliable ones. A comment made by Ken Livingstone some time ago is very telling. He said: "I hate cars". I understand that he has never owned or driven one. That demonstrates his deep lack of understanding of car ownership and use, and of how many people that involves.

How many of us cannot name non-drivers—those crusading, oh-so morally superior greens—who see no contradiction or offence to their principles in accepting lifts from people who own and run cars? They wear that like a badge of honour. I suggest that, if we all ceased to offer them lifts, there would be a few more cars on the road by next week.

I should like to examine the effects of the scheme, which are twofold. The first is cost. A charge of £5 per day can perhaps be shrugged off by someone on a comfortable income, but £100 from the net monthly income of someone on a modest wage is very serious. We have already heard reference to the groups likely to be affected. Mothers taking young children to school or to carers in the mornings will be caught in the net. I look forward to the day when I see the Mayor of London and his partner with their baby, pushchair, all the paraphernalia one needs for a child and 10 bags of shopping from Tesco, getting on to a bus.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire): Will my hon. Friend comment on another important group? I refer to essential workers who will be coming into or leaving the metropolis when the congestion charge is active. Many are on very low incomes, and many who might not be caught coming in at antisocial hours, when public transport is not available, will be caught going home. How will such people be able to fund the extra £1,000 a year, or whatever sum they will have to pay, when as public sector workers their pay rise is some 2.9 per cent?

Angela Watkinson: My hon. Friend is right. There is already a crisis in attracting essential workers into London because of the high cost of housing. The additional cost of travel will exacerbate that problem, making it even more difficult to get teachers, hospital staff and a range of workers on modest incomes to come into London. Such people will look elsewhere for employment. It is also possible that the day will come when people on low incomes, who have to use their cars to get to work, are unable to pay their £5. They will have to take a chance, because they have to get to work, and they will incur fines that they are even less able to pay than the original charge.

There is also the inconvenience. The Mayor of London has kindly set out a range of ways in which people may pay the charge, all of which are highly inconvenient. If someone is going to work in the morning, the last thing that they will want to do is to stop and pay, get on the internet, or try any of the wonderful ways that have been devised to allow people to pay. If it is inconvenient, it is anti-motorist. I deplore the entire scheme.

I wonder what will happen to people whose cars have been stolen. My constituents whose cars have been stolen often contact me, because months afterwards they are still receiving fines for illegal parking. I foresee the same thing happening in the case of congestion charging. Car theft is not unusual in London—many cars are stolen every day. How will the system cope with people whose cars have been stolen? Those people may incur enormous rafts of fines if their cars are driven backwards and forwards through the boundary of the congestion zone? I hope that the Minister will enlighten us on that point.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): May I add to my hon. Friend's most telling point? There is a further argument that very poor people who notice every penny will have more incentive to go in for motor crime and stealing vehicles. That is already a serious problem, especially among young people in the capital. This is an utterly pernicious proposition.

Angela Watkinson: I should like to explore the purported desired effect of the scheme to reduce congestion in London. It is intended that many of the people who currently use their cars will be deterred by the charge and seek other modes of transport. As a regular user of the tube, I shudder to think what the Circle line, for example, would be like if large numbers of people decided to abandon their cars and joined me. It is not unusual, even at peak times, to wait more than 10 minutes for a Circle line train and for the carriages to be filled to bursting point when it arrives. There is no spare capacity at the moment, and certainly not on the underground, to absorb large numbers of disgruntled drivers. The tube is also unreliable and uncomfortable. Even the public-private partnership would support only sufficient growth to maintain passenger numbers and not—as is needed—embrace very many more.

It has also been suggested that there will be environmental benefits in terms of air quality. I understand, however, that experts have claimed that, although there might be a minor improvement in the middle of the congestion zone, the area is too small for there to be any appreciable benefits. The outer edge of the zone would be adversely affected and prevailing winds would blow the fumes back into the centre, so the net effect would be nil. Even Ken Livingstone has conceded that:
